It has survived long enough for the copyright to expire and the book to enter the public domain. A public domain book is one that was never subject to copyright or whose legal copyright term has expired. Whether a book is in the public domain may vary country to country. Public domain books are our gateways to the past, representing a wealth of history, culture and knowledge that's often difficult to discover.

Marks, notations and other marginalia present in the original volume will appear in this file - a reminder of this book's long journey from the publisher to a library and finally to you.

THE UNITED KINGDOM OF GREAT BRITAIN AND IRELAND APPOINTED TO MEET 4 AUGUST 1892, IN THE FIFTY-SIXTH YEAR OF THE REIGN OF

NINTH VOLUME OF SESSION 1893.

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

Friday, 11th August 1893.

PRIVATE BUSINESS.

LONDON COUNTY COUNCIL (GENERAL POWERS) BILL.

Lords Reason for insisting on certain of their Amendments to which this House had disagreed, and Lords Amendments to Commons Amendments to Lords Amendments considered.

*MR. SNAPE (Lancashire, S.E., Heywood) said, he had put down certain Notices of Motion with reference to the Lords Amendments which, however, he would not move, as he did not wish to jeopardise the Bill; but he would like to take the opportunity of saying a few words. He was a Member of the Select Committee which considered this Bill, and the Committee came unanimously to the conclusion that a larger number of representatives than those approved in the Lords Amendments should have been given to the London County Council upon the Thames Conservancy Board. The Members of the Committee also came to the unanimous conclusion that there should be an addition to the representation upon the Lea Conservancy Board of two other members. He regretted that when such a decision had been arrived at, after many days of patient investigation, and been confirmed by that House, it should then have been altered by the other House. He could not understand on what grounds the reduction in the number of representatives was made: for the conviction was forced upon him that, instead of the number to which the Committee agreed being too many, it was inadequate. The number was only consented to by the Select Committee in the expectation that at some future date there would be a re-constitution of the Thames Conservancy Board, when a larger number of representatives would be given to the London County Council.

MR. BENN (Tower Hamlets, St. George's) did not intend to persevere with the Motion which he had placed upon the Paper for the rejection of the Lords

VOL. XVI. [FOURTH SERIES.]

Amendments. As representing an East End constituency, however, he felt bound to say that the decision of the Lords, with regard to the River Lea, was of a most disappointing and discouraging character. He would remind the House that the late President of the Local Government Board (Mr. Ritchie) said—

“If there is one river which the London people are more concerned about with regard to its purity than any other it is the River Lea. The London Council have already got a representation of one; and looking to the fact that the Committee of the House of Commons has considered that that representation ought to be increased from one to two, I shall certainly support the clause.”

Again, the present Attorney General (Sir C. Russell) said—

“I do not know a more disgraceful history than the history of the River Lea, and I am satisfied that if the Council had had a share in the control of the river, and possessed representatives who were directly interested in maintaining the purity of the Lea, it would not have been reduced to the shocking position which it has occupied of late years in the lower parts of the river.”

He (Mr. Benn) must say that when the Bill left this House with a view to some sort of a compromise, he certainly expected the compromise would extend to the River Lea as well as the Thames Conservancy. The compromise with regard to the Thames Conservancy was disappointing enough, but he regarded the rejection of the Lea clause as a very great grievance. The Committee were unanimous in their decision that two representatives should be given to the River Lea. He thought, therefore, the question of the Lea should be considered an open one, and he hoped next year they should have an opportunity of re-considering the whole question.

THE PRESIDENT OF THE LOCAL GOVERNMENT BOARD (Mr. H. H. FOWLER, Wolverhampton, E.) desired to say a few words not as representing the Government, but as, in some sense, representing both sides of the House, inasmuch as on the Debate that took place a fortnight or three weeks ago he had a good deal to do with, and was to a great extent responsible for, the compromise to which the hon. Member had just now referred. The House would recollect that the position of the matter was this: A Committee of the House decided—he thought very properly—that there should be four representatives of the London County Council upon the Thames Conservancy. The House of Lords were of opinion that that alteration should not be made without a preliminary inquiry into the whole question, and that the matter should be postponed for that purpose. The Lords sent the Bill back to this House with the clause struck out, and, of course, if that Amendment had been assented to the London County Council would have had no representation whatever on the Thames Conservancy. A Debate arose in this House, and, as a result of that Debate, the representatives of the London County Council declared that they were quite willing that the great riparian counties should have representation on the Thames Conservancy Board as well as themselves, and the great riparian counties who had previously opposed the action of the London County Council said that they were quite willing that the London County Council should have representation if they also were allowed representation on the Board. In that state of affairs, when the Bill was last under discussion, he ventured to submit to the House that it was possible to meet both these views by means of a compromise. He did not disguise from the House that there was some technical difficulty in carrying out that plan. The House dissented from the Lords Amendments with the hope that some compromise might be arrived at. He need hardly say that as between two Houses of Parliament as well as between two Parties compromise meant concessions on both sides—one side could not have its way. When the authorities of the House of Lords, with whom he was brought in contact to discuss this question, met to go through the various points, there was no feeling of irritation because of the action this House had taken, nor any indisposition to meet the views of either the London County Council or the riparian counties. But they were met with difficulties of a technical character affecting the proceedings of the House; and he believed that, in accordance with the Rules and Orders, it would not have been practicable to have added more than seven members this year to the Thames Conservancy. The four principal riparian counties desired to have one representative each, and, that being so, he was responsible for the suggestion that, in order to meet the view of the riparian counties, the London County Council should be content for the present with three instead of four representatives. The House of Commons said give four members; the House of Lords said give none; the compromise was three, and three was the number agreed upon by those who represented the House of Lords——

SIR W. HART DYKE (Kent, Dartford): Is there not a statutable objection to increasing the number?

MR. H. H. FOWLER said that, if the House of Lords had pressed certain technical objections which no doubt existed, he was afraid this provision could not have been put in, but the House of Lords waived these technical objections in order to carry out the compromise. The whole thing was regarded as provisional, and was only for a period of three years. A clause was inserted in this Bill making it compulsory on the Thames Conservancy Authority to come to Parliament next year, when the whole question of the rights of the London County Council and of the riparian counties would be considered, and then his right hon. Friend the President of the Board of Trade would have to say a word or two in the public interests. The Thames Conservancy Authorities, as he had said, were to come forward next year with a Bill, and if they omitted to do so the London County Council were empowered to come forward and promote a Bill. As to the non-extension of the representation on the Conservancy Board of the Lea, the hon. Member would recollect this was not parallel with the Thames Conservancy. There was no representation of the London County Council on the Thames Conservancy; there was a representation of one member on the Lea Conservancy; and although he quite admitted there should be an increase, the House of Lords were of opinion that the question should not be altered until there had been an inquiry into the whole question of the Conservancy of the River Lea. There, again, he thought it was necessary such an inquiry should take place. He could only say, in conclusion, that he did the best he could. He was very sorry he had not given satisfaction to the hon. Member (Mr. Benn) and some other

hon. Members, who thought that a better arrangement ought to have been made with the House of Lords. As he had said, he did his best, and he could only regret the matter was not placed in somebody else's hands, who might have done better.

LORD G. HAMILTON (Middlesex, Ealing) said that, speaking on behalf of one of the counties interested in this matter, he was bound to say that he was satisfied with the way the right hon. Gentleman had undertaken the part which he promised to take on the last occasion this question was before the House. At that time there was no objection on the part of the County Councils outside London to the London County Council having representation on the Thames Conservancy; but the objection was that this representation was to be given to the London County Council in such a way as might give the go-by to the just claims of other counties. He was doubtful then that the right hon. Gentleman would be able to carry out all they wished; but he thought the arrangement which he had made was a good and legitimate compromise; and, so far as the County of Middlesex were concerned, they felt indebted to the right hon. Gentleman. He hoped this compromise would get rid of any suspicion or irritation which might otherwise have existed between the London County Council and the other County Councils concerned, all of whom, he hoped, would now be able to work together in harmony.

MR. BARTLEY (Islington, N.) thought it was a pity the first two speeches should have been made, because in this compromise—effected largely by the present Government—the other House had done a great deal to make it much fairer than it otherwise would have been. The hon. Members made their speeches, and then had not the courage of their opinions to move the Resolution which they had placed on the Paper. The action of the House of Lords had been to make this a workable scheme, and it should be distinctly known that their efforts had been directed towards securing such an object so desirable in the interests of the public.

SIR J. LUBBOCK (London University), as the Member in charge of the Bill, desired on behalf of the London

County Council to thank the President of the Local Government Board for his assistance in the matter. He hoped the representatives of the riparian counties would feel that the London County Council had done what it could to secure representation for them also. As regards the remarks of the hon. Member for Islington (Mr. Bartley), he wished to observe that the Amendment disagreeing with the action of the Lords was not put down on behalf of the London County Council. At the same time, no one could wonder that the hon. Member for St. George's-in-the-East (Mr. Benn) objected on behalf of his constituents, who were so much interested in the Lea. He hoped another year the matter might be re-considered; but, having regard to the technical difficulties, he was glad that his hon. Friend did not intend at present to press his objection, and he desired to acknowledge the conciliatory spirit in which they had been met by the other House.

SIR R. TEMPLE (Surrey, Kingston), as one of the few Surrey Members in the House at that moment, desired to say that, so far as he could judge, this arrangement seemed fair to the riparian county, in the representation of which he had the honour of having a share.

QUESTIONS.

THE POSSESSION OF ARMS IN IRELAND.

MR. DANE (Fermanagh, S.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland if he can now say whether it is the intention of the Government to re-enact during the present Session of Parliament the Act of 1881 regulating the carrying and possession of arms in Ireland, which expires with the present year?

THE CHIEF SECRETARY FOR IRELAND (Mr. J. MORLEY, Newcastle-upon-Tyne): This matter is under consideration.

LEAVE FOR BELFAST WORKHOUSE OFFICIALS.

MR. MAINS (Donegal, N.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether the attention of the Local Government Board has been drawn to the fact that the Chairman of the Belfast Board of Guardians, at a recent meeting of that Body, brought before them a Report, founded on his own personal experience and inquiry from the books of the workhouse, that the master, accompanied by an officer named Wilson, were absent from their duties without leave from 3rd to 6th May, from 12th to 15th May, and on 17th and 18th May, 1893; whether the matron was on leave at the same time; whether he is aware that the assistant master Ball stated to the Chairman that the master was only absent a short time, when in fact he was absent for days; whether an inquiry will now be ordered to ascertain the relationship or collusion between this workhouse master and his subordinates, as to their general trustworthiness and veracity, and also with a view to eliciting why such serious misconduct and neglect of duty was not entered on the minutes of the proceedings of the Belfast Board of Guardians, and why no punishment was meted out to either of these officers?

Sir J. Lubbock

MR. J. MORLEY: (1 and 2.) The absence of the master for about 28 hours on the 17th and 18th May was referred to at a recent meeting of the Guardians, but there was no reference at this or any other meeting to the master's absence on the other dates mentioned. Mr. Wilson was absent at the same time, having previously obtained permission from the master, and the matron left the workhouse on the 18th with the approval of the Board of Guardians. (3.) The assistant master states he was asked by the Chairman whether he knew of the whereabouts of the master, and replied that he did not. (4.) The Guardians having since expressed their desire that the matron and assistant master should be in the workhouse during the master's absence, no further cause of complaint is expected to arise in this respect, and the Local Government Board, under the circumstances, do not think the matter calls for further inquiry on their part.

THE LOSS OF THE "VICTORIA."

MR. HANBURY (Preston): I beg to ask the Secretary to the Admiralty whether it is intended to take a Supplementary Estimate in order to replace as soon as possible the first-class battle-ship Victoria ?

*THE SECRETARY TO THE ADMIRALTY (Sir U. KAY-SHUTTLEWORTH, Lancashire, Clitheroe) : It is not thought necessary at present to take any special steps to replace the Victoria otherwise than by pressing on the completion of the battle-ships which are already building.

MR. HANBURY : But these battle-ships were not intended to replace the Victoria. Do I understand that the Admiralty have deliberately decided to lose a whole year before endeavouring to replace this valuable vessel ?

*SIR U. KAY-SHUTTLEWORTH : The hon. Member seems not to be aware that the Mediterranean Fleet, and indeed all our squadrons, are at their full strength. The British Fleet has not such a narrow margin as to render it necessary to rush into the construction of a new vessel immediately on the loss of one ship.

*MR. GIBSON BOWLES (Lynn Regis) : As the right hon. Gentleman states that our fleets are at their full complement, will he inform the House what vessels have replaced the Sultan, the Howe, the Camperdown, and the Warspite in the fleets of which they formed a part ?

*SIR U. KAY-SHUTTLEWORTH : I cannot, of course, answer such a question at a moment's notice, but I may say that another vessel has replaced the Warspite as flagship on the Pacific Station, and that each of the other ships named has been similarly replaced.

THE FORTIFICATIONS OF RANGOON.

MR. HANBURY : I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for India whether it is the fact that the heavy guns ordered for the fortifications of Rangoon, and which have been lying on the wharf for some months, are not to be mounted at Rangoon, but sent to some other port ; and, if so, whether it is intended to replace them by other guns, or to leave Rangoon without land defences ?

*THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR INDIA (Mr. G. RUSSELL, North Beds.) : Only two 10-inch guns were ordered for the Rangoon defences ; of these one is now there, but will be removed, no doubt, shortly ; the other is at Bombay in reserve. The Government of India decided last year that guns of this calibre were not required for Rangoon, the defence of which was sufficiently provided for by the remainder of the armament fixed for that port. These two 10-inch guns constitute only a portion of the defences.

SIR R. TEMPLE (Surrey, Kingston) : Will the hon. Gentleman assure the House that Rangoon has got proper land defences ?

*MR. G. RUSSELL : I believe I can assure the hon. Baronet, and the House generally, that Rangoon is adequately defended. If it will be any satisfaction to my hon. Friend to have more precise information on the point, I shall be happy to place at his disposal what information we have.

THE POST OFFICE AND THE NATIONAL TELEPHONE COMPANY.

CAPTAIN BAGOT (Westmoreland, Kendal) : I beg to ask the Postmaster General if there is any clause in the proposed agreement between the Post Office and the National Telephone Company, which will permit that company to put telephone wires or tubes under the streets within the County Council area in London, or under the streets of any other town ; or if there is any clause by which the Post Office agrees to lay telephone tubes or wires, with the view of afterwards renting the use of the same to the National Telephone Company for telephone purposes ; and whether either could be done without the consent of the County Council or Municipal Authority ?

THE POSTMASTER GENERAL (Mr. A. MORLEY, Nottingham, E.) : I must refer the hon. and gallant Member to my reply to a question on the same subject on the 31st ultimo. The powers to place telephone wires or tubes underground, either in London or other towns, are regulated by Statute, and are in all cases subject to the consent of the Local Authorities with an appeal in certain cases to a Police or Stipendiary Magistrate or County Court Judge, and a further appeal to the Railway Commissioners.

WEST CORK TRAIN SERVICE.

MR. E. BARRY (Cork Co., S.): I beg to ask the President of the Board of Trade whether he is aware that the train service in West Cork is inadequate and insufficient to meet the requirements of that extensive and populous district; and whether, in view of the existing defective postal service in West Cork, he will compel the Railway Directors to give such train accommodation as would facilitate the Postmaster General in improving the present defective postal arrangements?

THE PRESIDENT OF THE BOARD OF TRADE (Mr. MUNDELLA, Sheffield, Brightside): Complaints have been made with regard to the train service in this district; and if I receive some specific statement from the inhabitants of the increased facilities they require, I will use my good offices with the Railway Company on their behalf. The question of the postal arrangements is one for my right hon. Friend the Postmaster General.

RAILWAY SERVICE BETWEEN CHARING CROSS AND LONDON BRIDGE.

MR. BARROW (Southwark, Bermondsey): I beg to ask the President of the Board of Trade whether he can state what was the average time occupied by the South Eastern Railway trains that entered Cannon Street Station in completing the journey between Charing Cross and London Bridge Stations and vice versa (a distance of less than two miles) during the month of July last?

MR. MUNDELLA: I am informed by the South Eastern Railway Company that the average time taken throughout the month of July by all trains from Charing Cross to London Bridge calling at Cannon Street and vice versa was 17 minutes. The Company state that on the 6th July the traffic was considerably disorganised owing to the Royal Wedding, and that on Saturdays the trains were delayed by heavy excursion traffic. I shall be happy to show the hon. Member the statement the Board of Trade have received from the company.

POSTAL DEFECTS IN WEST CORK.

MR. E. BARRY: I beg to ask the Postmaster General whether he is aware that owing to the defective postal arrangements in West Cork a letter posted in Glandore for Rosscarbery, a distance of four miles, is taken a round of 106 miles before being delivered in Rosscarbery; and whether he will take any steps to remedy this extraordinary and anomalous state of things?

MR. A. MORLEY: The two places mentioned by the hon. Member are served from separate post towns—namely, Skibbereen and Bandon; and the communication between them is necessarily circuitous. But the postal arrangements are not defective, inasmuch as a letter posted at Glandore up to 4.20 p.m. is delivered early next morning at Rosscarbery. The local correspondence would not admit of a special direct communication being established between Rosscarbery and Glandore.

SCOTCH SCHOOL TEACHERS' GRIEVANCES.

MR. MACFARLANE (Argyll): I beg to ask the Secretary for Scotland if his attention has been called to the grievance of school teachers in Scotland who are liable to dismissal by Local Boards without appeal; and whether he proposes to take any steps to remedy the possibility of harsh and unjust treatment?

THE SECRETARY FOR SCOTLAND (Sir G. TREVELYAN, Glasgow, Bridgeton): The School Boards are primarily responsible for the efficiency of the schools under their charge, and that responsibility necessarily involves the power of dismissing teachers, nor does any appeal which has been suggested appear likely to work satisfactorily. The Public Schools (Scotland) Teachers' Act, 1882, imposed a course of procedure which, to a certain extent, protects teachers against capricious action by certain safeguards which do not exist in England; but, while prepared to consider any proposals, I cannot pledge the Government to legislation on the subject.

MR. MACFARLANE: I only wish to know if it is possible for the Education Department in Scotland to exercise a power of appeal in any cases of harsh treatment by School Boards?

SIR G. TREVELYAN: I am afraid that the same latitude in these matters must be given to School Boards as is allowed to managers of voluntary schools and to all who are responsible for the education of children.

FOREIGN JOINERY.

MR. BROMLEY DAVENPORT (Cheshire, Macclesfield): I beg to ask the President of the Board of Trade whether he has any reason to believe that in the case of imported foreign joinery the mark imposed under the Merchandise Marks Act is frequently planed out; and, if so, whether he can devise any means for preventing such an evasion of the Act of Parliament?

MR. MUNDELLA: Neither the Board of Trade nor the Commissioners of Customs, whom I have consulted, have received any information upon this subject. If any evidence as to the fraudulent sale of such goods is brought to my notice it shall be carefully considered. There is no obligation to mark these or any other goods.

BANGOR HARBOUR WORKS.

MR. M'CARTAN (Down, S.): I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury whether he will state what is the amount of loan which has been applied for by Mr. R. E. Ward for making harbour works and other improvements in Bangor, County Down; what is the date of the first application made by Mr. Ward in respect of the same; whether he can give the estimated value of the security offered, and explain the cause of delay in advancing the loan; and whether he is aware of the great advantage the people of Belfast and Bangor would gain by the proposed improvements?

*THE SECRETARY TO THE TREASURY (Sir J. T. HIBBERT, Oldham): I have not had time to obtain the particulars asked for by the hon. Member, but I think it may be sufficient at present to say that the Public Works Loan Board are waiting for the applicant to make out his title to the property offered as security.

THE NAVY ESTIMATES.

LORD G. HAMILTON (Middlesex, Ealing): I beg to ask the Financial Secretary to the Admiralty when it is proposed to resume the discussion on Navy Estimates; and when the Bill will be introduced to give legality to the expenditure upon the dockyard-built ships above the sum fixed by the Naval Defence Act?

*SIR U. KAY-SHUTTLEWORTH: We hope to proceed with Navy Estimates immediately after the Government of Ireland Bill. A Bill amending the Naval Defence Act has been drafted, and will be introduced as soon as possible.

MR. HANBURY: Does that mean after the Third Reading of the Irish Bill?

*SIR U. KAY-SHUTTLEWORTH: That depends on circumstances.

SLAVE TRADE IN THE GULF OF SYDRA.

MR. SNAPE (Lancashire, S.E., Heywood): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether he has any objection to lay upon the Table of the House the last Report received from Her Britannic Majesty's Consul at Ben Gazi, in the Gulf of Sydra, on the north coast of Africa, relative to the Slave Trade carried on from that and other adjacent ports?

*THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR FOREIGN AFFAIRS (Sir E. GREY, Northumberland, Berwick): There is no objection, and the Report will be laid.

SLAVES AND AGRICULTURAL LABOUR IN EGYPT.

MR. S. SMITH (Flintshire): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether his attention has been called to an account of an interview with Sir C. C. Scott-Moncrieff, published in The Pall Mall Gazette on 16th June, in which it was stated that, in Egypt in 1884, the rich landed proprietors always managed somehow or other to get their slaves and retainers exempted from service upon the corvée; whether this statement that slaves were employed in agricultural labour in Egypt after the British occupation is accurate ; and whether slaves are now employed ?

SIR E. GREY : The Slave Trade is illegal in Egypt, and is rigorously punished, but the possession of slaves in the country is not illegal. Slaves have, however, a right to claim their freedom on application to the Manumission Office, and as from time to time they continue to do so, and fresh slaves are not being imported, slavery is dying out. The owners of slaves employ them on agricultural as on domestic work.

SAILORS' LOSSES BY SHIPWRECK.

MR. ROSS (Londonderry) : I beg to ask the Secretary to the Admiralty if the Admiralty have any power to make allowances to the officers and men of the Victoria to compensate them for private property lost in the ship ?

THE CIVIL LORD OF THE ADMIRALTY (Mr. E. ROBERTSON, Dundee) : The Admiralty have no power to give compensation, except for the loss of necessary articles of clothing or equipment, or for books, instruments, and tools used in connection with the duties of officers and men on board ship. As I informed the hon. Member for Devonport on 25th July, every survivor of the Victoria is entitled to have all loss of kit (which includes clothing) made good to him, either by fresh articles being issued free of charge, or by money compensation.

SCATTERY ROADSTEAD.

MR. MAGUIRE (Clare, W.) : I beg to ask the Secretary to the Admiralty whether his attention has been directed to the advantages afforded by Scattery Roadstead as a station for war-ships ; and if he will consider the propriety of placing there Her Majesty's ship which is about to be sent to the Shannon ?

SIR U. KAY-SHUTTLEWORTH : Yes, Sir ; attention has been called to this and several other suggestions. But it is not at present intended to alter the stations of Her Majesty's ships on the coast of Ireland.

VOTES FOR THE NAVY.

MR. TOMLINSON (Preston) : I beg to ask the Secretary to the Admiralty if the money already granted for this year's Naval expenditure, £5,024,000, will be sufficient to meet the requirements of the Service beyond the 15th August ; and, if so, how long beyond that date ; and will he put the Estimates down for consideration in ample time to allow a full discussion, and avoid having to prefer or claim urgency for the Votes on the grounds of the necessities of the Service ?

SIR U. KAY-SHUTTLEWORTH : So far as can be foreseen, our present resources will carry us beyond the time, when we hope to proceed, as I have today announced, with Navy Estimates. Whether the "ample time for full discussion" desired by my hon. Friend will then remain depends mainly upon him and other Members of the Opposition, and on the amount of time which they may expend on the business that has to be dealt with before the Navy Estimates are reached.

MR. TOMLINSON : Then are we to understand that adequate discussion upon one part of the business of the nation is to depend on the time taken up by other important business ?

*SIR U. KAY-SHUTTLEWORTH : I take it that that is always the case in the House of Commons.

SIR J. GORST : I understood the right hon. Gentleman to say the Navy Estimates are to be taken immediately after the Irish Bill. Now he indicates that other Government business may be interposed. What does he mean ?

*SIR U. KAY-SHUTTLEWORTH : The business to which I referred was the Government of Ireland Bill.

WEATHER FORECASTS.

MR. STRACHEY (Somerset, S.) : I beg to ask the President of the Board of Agriculture whether he will try in the West of England, as he is doing in the North and East of England, the experiment of having the weather forecasts published at the post offices ?

THE PRESIDENT OF THE BOARD OF AGRICULTURE (Mr. H. GARDNER, Essex, Saffron Walden) : I am sorry to say it is not in my power, on financial grounds, to give effect to the suggestion of my hon. Friend ; but if the results of the present limited experiment are favourable, as I hope they will be, we shall have to consider whether it ought not to be continued on a more extended scale next year. In that case we should certainly include one of the western counties in our scheme.

THE MERIONETHSHIRE EDUCATIONAL SCHEME.

SIR W. HART DYKE (Kent, Dartford): I beg to ask the Vice President of the Committee of Council on Education whether the Clause 91, Sec. B and C, in the Merionethshire Scheme, under the Welsh Intermediate Education Act, prohibits the user of the formularies of any particular denomination in the family worship of a hostel or boarding-house of a school connected with such denomination, and the teaching of the distinctive tenets of any particular denomination to boarders in any such hostel unless the County Governing Body so allow; and whether he is aware that the Welsh Intermediate Education Bill, as introduced by the President of the Board of Trade, was amended so as to confine its operations to day scholars only, so far as the prohibition of distinctive religious teaching is concerned?

THE VICE PRESIDENT OF THE COUNCIL (Mr. ACLAND, York, W.R., Rotherham): The right hon. Gentleman is perhaps aware that in this case I approved, with a very slight alteration, the Scheme of the Charity Commissioners in preference to that of the Joint Education Committee. On the general point the Charity Commissioners inform me that there is not, and cannot be, under this Scheme, any school connected with any particular denomination. The clause does not affect private lodgings, boarding-houses, or hostels not belonging to the school or foundation. The statement in the question as to the amendment of the Bill in Parliament is correct.

SIR W. HART DYKE: Do I understand the right hon. Gentleman to say that this clause is less intolerable because there is no school in the district that can possibly be affected by it?

*MR. STANLEY LEIGHTON (Shropshire, Oswestry): I would ask the right hon. Gentleman whether this clause would not affect a hostel or boarding-house connected with an intermediate school, the master of which was the master of the school?

THE PARLIAMENTARY CHARITY COMMISSIONER (Mr. T. E. ELLIS, Merionethshire): I think the Scheme would apply to all hostels that are in any way part of the foundation of the school, or in any way supported out of the county rate or out of the endowments which are included within the scope of the Scheme.

MR. STANLEY LEIGHTON: Then, under what Act—the Welsh Intermediate Education Act or the Endowed Schools Act—is the right to give instruction to boarders in the distinctive tenets of any denomination prohibited?

MR. T. E. ELLIS: I do not think it is prohibited in either, or in the Scheme. The County Governing Body have power to appoint head masters and to lay down any conditions as to their tenure of office both under the Welsh Intermediate Education Act and the Endowed Schools Act.

*MR. STANLEY LEIGHTON: Then what is the meaning of this clause in the Merionethshire Scheme—

“No distinctive tenet of any religious denomination shall be taught in boarding houses unless the County Governing Body shall allow?”

Under what Act is such a prohibition made?

MR. T. E. ELLIS: Under the Endowed Schools Act, 1869, and the following Acts.

MR. STANLEY LEIGHTON: Can the hon. Gentleman tell me the section?

SIR W. HART DYKE: Can the hon. Gentleman quote any Scheme under the Endowed Schools Acts of 1869 and 1875 where such a restriction is in existence?

MR. T. E. ELLIS: I must ask for notice of the question.

THE FOREIGN BASKET TRADE.

MR. HAYDEN (Roscommon, S.): I beg to ask the President of the Board of Trade whether baskets imported into Ireland from the Continent have upon them any indication of the place of their manufacture?

MR. MUNDELLA: I have no information upon this question, which is a general one. I have, however, made inquiry of the Commissioners of Customs, and will furnish the hon. Member with a copy of their reply. There is nothing illegal in the importation of unmarked goods.

FOREIGN OFFICE MESSENGERS.

SIR A. HAYTER (Walsall) : I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether any, and if any what, steps have been taken by the Foreign Office to carry out the recommendation of the Ridley Commission, to substitute for the present expensive service of Foreign Office messengers, drawing £400 a year each, and travelling allowance, a staff of retired non-commissioned officers of good character and long service?

*SIR E. GREY : No vacancy has occurred since the present Government came into Office, and they have, therefore, not taken any decision in the matter.

REPAIRS IN ROTTEN ROW.

MR. A. CHAMBERLAIN (Worcestershire, E.) : I beg to ask the First Commissioner of Works whether his attention has been called to the repairs now being carried out in Rotten Row ; and whether he will cause them to be deferred until after the House rises for the Autumn Recess?

THE FIRST COMMISSIONER OF WORKS (Mr. SHAW LEFEVRE, Bradford, Central) : The repairs being carried on in Rotten Row cannot be altogether deferred until after the rising of the House for the Autumn Recess without inconvenience and increase of expense, but they will be carried out with the least possible inconvenience to those using the Row.

THE ANGORA PRISONERS.

MR. S. SMITH (Flintshire) : I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs if he is aware that the remaining 58 Armenian prisoners at Angora were accused in the same way as Professors Thoumaïan and Kayayan, by means of forged documents and false witnesses, and that their fate will be terrible unless influence is brought to bear on the Porte ; and what steps Her Majesty's Government are taking to prevent this frightful abuse of justice?

*SIR E. GREY : The Turkish Government have promised to supply the procès-verbaux of the trials to Her

Mr. Mundella

Her Majesty's Embassy at Constantinople, and until they are received I can express no further opinion on the matter.

*MR. GIBSON BOWLES : Is the right hon. Gentleman aware that large numbers of prisoners have been sent to Siberia without any documents, forged or otherwise ; without any witnesses, false or otherwise ; that their fate will be terrible ; and what steps is he taking to prevent this frightful abuse of justice?

*SIR E. GREY : I cannot answer that question. Doubtless the hon. Member has information at his own disposal which he thinks justifies him in putting the question.

SWAZILAND.

SIR R. TEMPLE : I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies whether it is true that, as distinguished from Protectorate, the British share of protective obligations towards Swaziland, its Chief and people, is being relinquished?

THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE COLONIES (Mr. S. BUXTON, Tower Hamlets, Poplar) : I very much regret that I cannot make a definite statement on the whole subject ; but as regards the question of the hon. Baronet, I may say at once that no arrangement in regard to the future government of the Swazis will be come to which will not involve the full and free assent of the Swazi nation.

THE ASSAM TEA GARDENS.

SIR W. WEDDERBURN (Bauflshire) : I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for India whether the attention of the Secretary of State for India has been drawn to a recent Judgment delivered by Justices Prinsep and Trevelyan, of the Calcutta High Court, in the case of George Murray, manager of a tea garden at Raugamati, who appealed against the decision of the Deputy Commissioner of Jalpaiguri, convicting him under Sections 341 and 342 (wrongful confinement) of the Indian Penal Code, and sentencing him to one month simple imprisonment and a fine of Rs.500 ; whether the Secretary of State has observed that the Judges, in upholding the conviction, remarked that the evidence shows that particularly the coolies employed on this tea garden were always in a state of durance; when off work they were kept within a guarded enclosure, and even when they were at work on the tea garden they were watched by guards, that the manager dealt with his labourers in such a manner as completely to deprive them of any freedom of action, and thus practically reduce them for the term of their engagements to a state of slavery, that Mr. Murray had the assistance of the police, and that the circumstances of this case go to show the necessity for efficient inspection of the gardens; and whether, looking to the state of affairs disclosed by this Judgment, the Secretary of State will order a full and independent inquiry into the present condition of the coolies in Assam, and the working of the system under which their labour is obtained for the planters?

*MR. G. RUSSELL: (1 and 2.) Yes, Sir. The attention of the Secretary of State has been drawn to the report of the Judgment referred to in the question, which relates to a garden situated not in Assam, but in the Dooars, where the Inland Emigration Acts are not in force. Full provision is made by these Acts for the efficient inspection of tea gardens and for the lodging of complaints by coolies in districts where they are in operation. (3.) The condition of the coolies in Assam has recently been the subject of a protracted investigation by the Government of India; and certain Amendments of the Inland Emigration Act have consequently been passed by the Legislative Council. The general result of the investigation has, however, been to show that the condition of the labourers on tea gardens is superior to that of the masses in the districts from which they emigrate. It does not appear to the Secretary of State that it is necessary at present to have another inquiry; but the attention of the Government will be called, in reference to this case, to the necessity of enforcing a thoroughly efficient inspection. If any breach of the law is committed by interference with the liberty of the coolies, either in Assam or elsewhere, the offender, as shown by the result of the case referred to in my hon. Friend's question, is liable to conviction and punishment.

SIR J. GORST: Will the hon. Gentleman have any objection to lay on the Table the recent correspondence about the Assam Tea Gardens and the alterations in the laws regulating them made in consequence of it?

MR. G. RUSSELL: No, Sir; there is no objection.

THE LISNAGOON RIOTS.

SIR T. LEA (Londonderry, S.): In the absence of the hon. Member for South Tyrone, I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether the police have made any Report of riotous proceedings on the 14th and 17th July at Lisnagoon, near Cootehill, in the County of Cavan; and if he can state whether any arrests were made or summonses issued in connection with the affray?

MR. J. MORLEY: On the 3rd instant, in reply to a question addressed to me by the hon. and learned Member for North Fermanagh, I referred to the facts connected with the disturbances at Lisnagoon on the 17th July, which were promptly reported upon by the police, and further stated that the names of the ringleaders on this occasion had been taken, and that the question of a prosecution was under consideration. Directions to this end are now about to be issued to the police. With regard to the alleged riotous proceedings of the 14th July, I am informed that all that occurred on that date was that the workmen were cheered by about 25 persons and that the affair was insignificant.

THE PROGRESS OF INDIA.

SIR C. W. DILKE (Gloucester, Forest of Dean): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for India why the Statement exhibiting the Progress of India, for 1891-2 (28th Number), has not been presented to Parliament, that for 1890-91 bearing date 24th May, 1892, and that for 1889-90 bearing date 15th May, 1891?

MR. G. RUSSELL: The forthcoming Statement exhibiting the moral and material progress of India will, according to previous custom, review the progress of the past 10 years. It therefore takes longer to prepare than the usual yearly Statements. It will be presented to Parliament soon after the end of December next.

THE FFRWYD DISASTER.

MR. KENYON (Denbigh, &c.): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he has received any intelligence as to the cause of the disaster at the Ffrwyd Colliery, near Wrexham?

THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE HOME DEPARTMENT (Mr. ASQUITH, Fife, E.): I have received the following telegram from Her Majesty's Inspector with reference to Ffrwyd Colliery:—

"I have no information as to the disaster at Ffrwyd Colliery beyond what has appeared in the Press. No one was injured; consequently no Report has been made to me."

COOLIE LABOUR IN THE WEST INDIES.

MR. A. SMITH (Christchurch): In the absence of the hon. Member for the Widnes Division of South-West Lancashire I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for India whether Surgeon-Major Deane Comins, Protector of Emigrants at Calcutta, was instructed by the Government of India in the early part of the year 1891 to proceed on an official visit to the British and Foreign Colonies in the West Indies, and to report upon the condition of the coolie immigrants in those Colonies; whether, as the result of repeated applications to Her Majesty's Government, the Government of India telegraphed to the India Office on the 5th April, 1893, that Dr. Comins' Reports were nearly ready, and that no time would be lost in sending them on receipt; and whether the Reports have yet been received and transmitted by the Government of India to the Secretary of State; and, if not, what is the reason of the delay which has occurred in connection with them?

*MR. G. RUSSELL: Surgeon-Major Deane Comins, Protector of Emigrants at Calcutta, was instructed by the Government of India in the early part of the year 1891 to proceed on an official visit to the British and Foreign Colonies in the West Indies, and to report upon the condition of the coolie immigrants in those Colonies. On April 15 last the Government of India telegraphed that the Reports on the West Indies were promised at the end of the following month, and that no time would be lost in sending them on receipt. The Reports have not yet been received by the Secretary of State. The delay has been caused by Dr. Comins' duties as Inspector General of Gaols leaving him little leisure for the preparation of his Reports.

MR. A. SMITH: Will the hon. Gentleman press for the early production of this Report?

*MR. G. RUSSELL: Yes, Sir; intimation has been sent already to the effect that it is desirable to have it as soon as possible. I have no doubt it will be ready shortly.

MADRAS AND BOMBAY ARMIES BILL.

SIR A. HAYTER (Walsall): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for India whether it is the intention of the Government to deal with the Despatch received to-day from Lord Lansdowne, the Viceroy of India; and whether the India Office is going to modify the Madras and Bombay Armies Bill in conformity with the views expressed by the Viceroy?

*MR. G. RUSSELL: I have had no opportunity of consulting the Secretary of State since the Despatch was received. The views of the Government of India will be carefully weighed, and I may add that they are in consonance with those favoured by the Secretary of State, who only consented rather reluctantly to an alteration in the Bill in order that it might pass through another place.

ORDERS OF THE DAY.

GOVERNMENT OF IRELAND BILL.

(No. 428.)

CONSIDERATION. [FIFTH NIGHT.]

Bill, as amended, further considered.

MR. COURTNEY (Cornwall, Bodmin): When I was addressing the House last night in support of the clause standing in my name, I intimated that I should not deem it necessary to deal with the subject at any length, because it is a very simple matter, exciting no Party feeling and no Party passion, and being put forward in the interest of no one section. The facility of enabling a Minister to pass from one branch of the Legislature has many advantages, and it has been found to be extremely useful in other countries. Although the system is not in force in this country, it is not unknown in some of our colonies. It is practised at the Cape of Good Hope without any loss or disadvantage—on the contrary, with much practical gain. In this country the experience of hon. Members must have made them conscious that if this power existed in this country cases would often arise when it would be of great advantage if a Minister were enabled to accompany his Bill from one branch of the Legislature to another, this Minister, of course, being the most competent person in the advocacy of his Bill. Take, for example, the Bill which is now under discussion. Everyone is conscious of the advantage which would accrue to the advocacy of the Bill in the other House of Parliament if it could be accompanied by its author, the principal constructor of the measure. Without any disrespect to the noble Lords, I may say that if the Prime Minister were enabled to advocate the Bill in the Upper House he would, to use a popular phrase, make their Lordships “sit up.” I think, also, that the House has enjoyed some experience occasionally in the past when it might have been useful to have had a Minister from another place. I do not refer to the present Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, who has discharged his duties with remarkable ability; but I have known some inarticulate Under Secretaries for Foreign Affairs who have not given the House that complete advantage in expressing the views and the policy of the Government of the day—information which might have been obtained if the Secretary for Foreign Affairs had himself been enabled to come to the Lower House to expound the Government policy himself. I admit, of course, that the business of the Government Departments is so great that it has been found necessary to double the political officers; but I would now impress on the Government the propriety of considering this question apart, and with reference to the circumstances of Ireland itself. If the Irish Government are to be required to have an officer in each branch of the Legislature to answer for the particular Department for which he is responsible it will be necessary to have more officers than would otherwise be required.

If this scheme were carried out there would be some officer responsible for the administration of law and justice in Ireland. How great would the advantage be to the conduct of affairs in Ireland if that officer could pass from one House to the other, and vindicate the conduct of his Department against any charge that might be brought against it! The responsible person would be able to reply to any attack that was made upon him in the discharge of his functions. It could not be the object of the Prime Minister to make an unnecessary number of officers of the Irish Government. He was at a loss to discover any argument against this proposal. It might be suggested that it would, perhaps, give too much authority to the Executive Government as against the Legislature. That might be true if the Executive Government occupied the position that they did in Germany, where the officers did not hold their offices simply at the pleasure of the Representative Body; but in the Parliamentary system initiated in this Bill, and which was proposed to be given to Ireland, the Members of the Executive Committee were to hold Office at the pleasure and according to the determination of the Legislature itself. The proposal would not make them subservient to the Executive Government. It seemed to him that his proposal was of a thoroughly practical character, and he submitted it to the Prime Minister with some hope that it would receive favourable consideration at his hands. Of course, things did not always appear the same to different observers; but he understood that the right hon. Gentleman was prepared even to stretch a point to accommodate critics. He (Mr. Courtney) submitted, as to his proposal, that it would be really valuable in the administration of the Government in Ireland; that it would largely assist that economy which the right hon. Gentleman had at heart in arranging for the Irish Government; and that it would make the conduct of affairs more easy, rapid, and satisfactory to all concerned than would be the case if it were rejected.

Clause (Attendance of Member of Executive in Legislature,)—(Mr. Courtney,)—brought up, and read the first time.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Clause be read a second time."

THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY (Mr. W. E. GLADSTONE, Edinburgh, Midlothian) (who was very imperfectly heard) said, the right hon. Member understood him to be willing to give impartial consideration to reasonable proposals for the amendment of the Bill, implying that the present Amendment was a reasonable matter. Well, he (Mr. Gladstone) did not intend to discuss this proposal on its merits. He differed from his right hon. Friend in thinking that it was a very simple matter, for he considered it was a large question upon which much might be said on the one side and the other. Speaking for himself, he could only say that it would have taken a great deal to induce him at any period of his life to address that House in any other capacity than that of a Representative. The House should give attention to any strong feeling that might be entertained by the Irish Members on the subject. In his opinion, the question was one wholly and solely for the consideration of the Irish Legislature. This was not a question of the constitution of the Irish Legislature, or of its composition; and, even if it were, it would be within the power of that Legislature to deal with it after a short term of years. There was an example which proved distinctly that that was so. Nothing could be more rigid than the manner in which Congress was absolutely precluded by the Constitution of the United States from altering that Constitution. That was absolutely excluded from it, and yet it had been thought convenient to introduce a provision of this kind. His right hon. Friend was, of course, quite justified in deriving all the sanction that he could from foreign practice; but he was liable to be met by the objection that it was contrary to British practice. He (Mr. Gladstone) must repeat that this was a matter which, beyond all doubt or question, lay in the power of the Irish Legislature. If it did not, there might be some ground for obliging them to deal with it in the House. But were it so, he should be inclined to say that he would very much rather have the matter considered at large, and with reference to the exigencies of this country as well as of Ireland, than make a random experiment in Ireland only. But his present ground was that there could be no doubt that this was a matter for the consideration of the Irish Legislature. It was a matter exclusively Irish, and therefore the doctrine of the Government was to leave it to the discretion of the Irish Legislature, and the Irish Legislature alone, subject, of course, to proper Constitutional safeguards. He could not consent to the introduction of the clause into the Bill.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR could not help regretting that the Prime Minister had not gone into the merits of this question, because he was quite sure that what he could have laid before the House would have been of extreme interest with reference to Constitutional practice and procedure. He could not, however, blame the right hon. Gentleman for the line he had taken under the circumstances. The right hon. Gentleman held that it would be in the power of the Irish Legislature to carry out this reform, and that it ought to be left to that Legislature to determine what course should be pursued. The British practice was not, in his opinion, really a proper analogy in the case of a new Constitution; and while he must concur in the observations that in our historic House of Commons and House of Lords any change which permitted Members of one House to go and speak in the other, to which they did not belong, would, indeed, be a great and doubtful innovation. He did not know what effect would be produced if the Prime Minister were permitted to give the benefit of his eloquence to the House of Lords. It might have far-reaching and startling consequences, and, for his part, he should be sorry to sanction so important an innovation. But when they were considering from the beginning a new system in which there was to be a Second Chamber, which, whether better or worse, at all events bore no resemblance to an Hereditary Chamber, the state of things had no resemblance to our historical Houses of Parliament; and he thought the right hon. Member for Bodmin (Mr. Courtney) had made out an overwhelming case, both on grounds of economy and administrative expediency, for permitting a Minister to defend in either House where his acts or the policy of the Cabinet of which he formed a part might be attacked the Department for which he might be specially responsible. If, however, it were generally accepted by the Legal Authorities in the House that the Prime Minister was right in his interpretation of the Home Rule Bill, and that the Irish Legislature, if ever it was called into existence, would have power to carry out this reform on its own motion, he would not advise his right hon. Friend opposite to take the sense of the House upon his proposal. If, however, that was not the view of the Legal Authorities, and it was necessary to give these powers to carry out the object which had been explained, he hoped his right hon. Friend would press his Motion to a Division.

SIR J. LUBBOCK (London University) said, they were all agreed that this was a matter on which they should defer to the feelings of the Irish Members: but, in the absence of any expression of opinion on their part, he thought it was the duty of the House to consider what plan would work best on the whole, so far as the future government of Ireland was concerned. It was perfectly true that the Irish Parliament might adopt this plan if they liked, and it was equally true that if the House passed the clause it would be in their power to do away with it if they chose. But the Irish Parliament, when it first came into existence, would have an immense number of pressing matters before it, and it was unlikely that it would be able to find time for a considerable period to discuss matters of this kind. If, therefore, the House were of opinion that it would be for the advantage and better government of Ireland that this principle should exist, surely this was the time to adopt it. The Irish Legislature should be started under the most favourable conditions. The right hon. Gentleman the Prime Minister, who objected to this Proviso, said that, although the experience of other countries could be quoted in its favour, on the other hand, our own experience was against it. But the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Bodmin had shown that that was not entirely the case. He had shown that, on the contrary, in some of our Colonies which approached most nearly to the constitution of the Irish Legislature, this plan was in operation, and was allowed to continue in operation. Therefore, they might reasonably conclude that it had been found to be of advantage. There was an additional reason why the proposed system might be of advantage in Ireland, although it was not of advantage in this country. Our House of Commons and House of Lords were large bodies, and it was, therefore, reasonable to conclude that gentlemen could be found within them fully qualified to represent all the great Departments. But where bodies were smaller, as in many of the Colonial Governing Bodies, it was often convenient to allow Ministers to go from one Chamber to the other. In the absence of expressed opinions on the part of the Irish Members, or from Ireland, surely they had to consider what was the best form for the future Government of Ireland. This was not a Party question, and the right hon. Gentleman who had moved the Amendment and many hon. Members felt that the right hon. Gentleman, in moving the Amendment, had only been anxious, not to advance the interests of any political Party, but to advance the interests of the Irish Legislature generally. He regretted that the Prime Minister did not see his way to accept the Amendment.

MR. T. M. HEALY (Louth, N.): I do not rise for the purpose of saying anything as to the clause; but I rise to say something about the Deceased Wife's Sister Bill. There is no reason why we should not deal with that, and I do think that upon that subject, and also on the subject of vaccination, we should be enlightened from the Unionist Benches.

Question put, and negatived.

*VISCOUNT WOLMER rose to move in page 5, after Clause 9, to insert the following Clause:—

(Boundary Commissioners.)

“The following persons, that is to say, of whom not less than three shall be a quorum, shall be appointed Boundary Commissioners for Ireland, and they shall immediately after the passing of this Act proceed by themselves, or by Assistant Commissioners appointed by them, to inquire into the existing boundaries of every borough or division of a borough and county or division of a county in Ireland, and they shall with all practicable despatch report to one of Her Majesty's principal Secretaries of State how those boundaries may be best re-adjusted, so that the total number of Members returned to Parliament from Ireland shall be 80, and so that the population in each group of boroughs, borough, or division of a borough, group of counties, county, or division of a county, returning one Member to serve in Parliament shall be as far as possible equalised, and their report shall be laid before Parliament. It shall be the duty of the above-mentioned, one of Her Majesty's principal Secretaries of State, to draw up a scheme to give effect to the report of the said Boundary Commissioners, which shall be forthwith laid before both Houses of Parliament, if Parliament is then sitting, or, if Parliament be not then sitting, within three weeks after the beginning of the next Session of Parliament; and if such scheme has lain before Parliament for not less than two months during the same Session, then, unless an Address has been presented within such two months by one or other of the Houses of Parliament praying Her Majesty to withhold Her consent from such scheme, or any part thereof, it shall be lawful for Her Majesty by Order in Council to declare Her approbation of such scheme, or any part thereof, to which such Address does not relate. Nothing in this section shall affect the boundaries of boroughs or counties returning Members to serve in the Irish Legislature."

*MR. SPEAKER : I would call attention to the fact that the question of the Boundary Commission has been considered, both with reference to single-Member constituencies and proportional representation—I understand that something has passed between the noble Lord, or another hon. Member, and the Government; and the Government have expressed their intention to bring up an Amendment later on. Perhaps the Government will now state what is their intention. In any case, I do not think the noble Lord can bring forward the question of Boundary Commissioners at this stage with reference either to single-Member constituencies or proportional representation.

MR. W. E. GLADSTONE : I am glad, Sir, that you have drawn the distinction between the two questions. I do not think, upon an examination of what it would involve in future proceedings, that the Government could accept the clause enacting a Boundary Commission in the present Act. When I spoke of a contingent willingness—I will not say desire—on the part of the Government to entertain the question of single-Member constituencies, I referred to the method of proceeding by Order in Council, subject to the power of intercepting the operation of the Order by Parliamentary intervention, as the mode by which the whole subject could be handled. No doubt, that proceeding would involve something in the nature of a Boundary Commission; but it would have a very limited operation indeed. I think that the cases in the whole of Ireland in which the Commissioners would have to act is only 10, and if anything were done I think it ought to be by Order in Council checked by the power of Parliamentary intervention. As has been stated by you, Sir, the question of the Boundary Commission has been disposed of, and the Government are not disposed to revive it. The more important question is that of single-Member constituencies. I am anxious to be well understood upon this question, though I am conscious that it would be contrary to the spirit of the Orders of the House, even if I were permitted to do it by indulgence, to enter upon a vindication of the Schedule. Therefore, I will not do that further than to state what the intentions of the Government have been, and what their belief is. I at once admit that if it could be proved upon a discussion of the Schedule that it was unjust as between Nationalists and Unionists, not only would a very grave charge of indiscretion and neglect be made good against the Government, but likewise a very strong case would have been made out for a compulsory rectification, at whatever cost of time, of that error. We are under a very strong belief that there is no foundation whatever for that charge. We may be wrong, but our belief is that the distribution of the 80 Members under their Schedule with the constituencies voting in a lump would be a more favourable division to the Unionist Party, compared with their present proportion, than the single-Member system, with the single exception, I admit, of the provision made with regard to the University of Dublin. I am not referring to that, but am only speaking of the town and county divisions. That being so, we, from our point of view, entirely throw aside that consideration of unfairness. We have to consider that, while there are a multitude of questions upon which various constituencies in England are divided—in one constituency there is a strong Temperance Party, in another there is a strong opinion in favour of Parish Councils, and so on—that is not so in Ireland. There the one division at present is that between Nationalists and Unionists, and that is one upon which I frankly admit that the Government are under a primary obligation to do nothing less than justice to the minority. Then, I proceed upon the assumption that the real question before us is not that of justice between party and party, which I understand to be provided for, but is a question of the merits of single-Member constituencies. That is not an important question at all. How do we stand with regard to business? We stand laden with difficulties of every kind, and it is as much as we can possibly hope for that, during the time that remains to us, we shall be able to deal with the Bill as it stands, and to deal with the Bill effectively in our legislative capacity is what the Government consider to be their primary and absolute duty. Very well,

(1) I arrive at this point—that we are not in a position to accept the introduction of any subject which will seriously or appreciably add to the amount of debateable ground which still, unfortunately, remains to be traversed. We could not declare ourselves prepared to deal with the question of single-Member constituencies, even if we agreed to the clause the noble Lord has put down.

MR. SPEAKER: I invited the Government to state what they proposed to do.

MR. W. E. GLADSTONE: Yes, Sir; I began, I admit, by stating what we could not do.

*MR. SPEAKER: I do not think it would be in Order for the right hon. Gentleman to discuss the question of the Schedule now, but it is in his power to say that there would be a period of the Bill when he would introduce an Amendment to carry out the principle of single-Member constituencies. Then that would be the time to consider the matter as against the Schedule as it stands at present. Everything beyond that would be out of Order.

MR. W. E. GLADSTONE: I have stated what I could not do, and I have just arrived at the point when I would state what I would do. The Government cannot bind themselves to introduce a provision for single-Membered constituencies; but we consider it a matter on which we might be able to agree through friendly communications. I do not wish to bind anyone on any other subject, or to say—"Because we have entered into friendly communications on single-Member constituencies, we therefore expect you to abate your hostility to the Bill." Hon. and right hon. Members might come into these communications on this one separate and limited subject, and, at the same time, remain free to pursue the course they have taken on the Bill as a whole. The real question is whether the advantage of single-Member constituencies is such as to induce hon. Members to enter into these communications? We have had examples of the value of these communications on a larger scale in former years. I know we cannot hope to return to those happy times; but if hon. Gentlemen opposite think they can do this, and if we do enter into such communication, it will be a matter of honour to see that gentlemen are not placed in difficulty at a subsequent stage, but the Government will make such provision that there shall be no technical obstacle to prevent the insertion of the plan. That is the only way in which the Government can see an opening for possible dealing with the question of single-Member constituencies.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: It would be quite out of Order if I were to deal with that part of the interesting and useful statement of the right hon. Gentleman which touches upon the Schedules. I would only say that what he has stated as to the importance which attaches to the fairness of this Schedule conclusively shows that we shall have an opportunity of discussing these matters in detail. I understand the right hon. Gentleman to say that the Government, though they do not pledge themselves to any such policy, are prepared to consider and discuss a scheme whereby single-Member constituencies will be substituted for the plan in the Schedule, and in which Boundary Commissioners will have to be appointed—not in the manner proposed in the clause of my noble Friend, but by Order in Council. I believe there are precedents for such appointments, and for their being subject to Parliamentary supervision. That being the proposal, it appears to me there is little difference between the scheme the right hon. Gentleman is prepared to discuss in a friendly spirit and that of my noble Friend; and I would therefore ask you, Sir, on what part of the Bill can the scheme which may result from such friendly discussion be introduced, and if my noble Friend is out of Order how can the clause embodying such a scheme be introduced at any later stage of the Bill?

*MR. SPEAKER: That difficulty occurred to me whilst the right hon. Gentleman was speaking. Of course, if I rule the noble Lord out of Order in now discussing the question of a Boundary Commission to carry out single-Member constituencies, I shall have to give the same ruling in regard to the Boundary Commission which the Government now indicate that they may possibly propose to the House. Of course, any difficulty may be got over by recommitting the Bill for the purpose of dealing with Boundary Commissioners. That would be a complete answer to the question of Order; but unless it is shown to me that the possible scheme of the Government would differ from the boundary scheme in the clause of the noble Lord, if I rule the latter out of Order I should be bound so to rule the former.

MR. W. E. GLADSTONE: I have considered the circumstances so as to avoid running any risk of betraying hon. Gentlemen opposite into a false position. We have already decided that there shall be no Boundary Commission by enactment: but we have in view a possible recommitment of the Bill for a limited purpose by general consent, when I say it would be an absolute obligation on the part of the Government to take care that hon. Gentlemen are not tripped up by any difficulty of form.

*MR. SPEAKER: The distinction in my mind is very fine between appointing Boundary Commissioners under the Bill and proceeding by Order in Council, because I imagine the Commissioners would be named by Order in Council in any case. The point is one on which I should not like to commit myself to a final opinion without further consideration. But, as I have said, any difficulty would be got over by re-committing the Bill, supposing any difficulty arose.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: The best course, perhaps, would be for my noble Friend to re-cast his clause, substituting appointment by Order in Council by Her Majesty for the proposal in the Bill. It would then be open for you, Sir, to determine whether that is or is not in Order, and give time to consider the proposal the Government have made.

SIR J. GORST (Cambridge University) said that on the point of Order, supposing the House on the 9th clause were to resolve that each constituency named in the Schedule should return one Member to represent Ireland in Parliament, would it not be in Order afterwards to amend the Schedule by stating, for example, that the County of Cork should contain three divisions such as Her Majesty should hereafter by Order in Council appoint, if necessary inserting a provision to the effect that the Order in Council should lie on the Table of the House like an Education Order?

*MR. SPEAKER: That would take the Boundary Commissioners out of appointment by this House. I think that course might be adopted.

*VISCOUNT WOLMER asked whether it would be in Order if he omitted that part of his clause which dealt with the Boundary Commissioners and proceeded with that which required the Secretary of State to prepare a scheme for one Member constituencies (leaving the Government to appoint the Boundary Commissioners in their own way), and provided the machinery for carrying the scheme out?

MR. W. E. GLADSTONE: I should not object to the re-casting of the clause, but not until notice has been given.

*MR. SPEAKER: I do not think the noble Lord could do what he suggests now, because it would amount to the introduction of a new clause, and that would require notice.

SIR H. JAMES (Bury, Lancashire) asked at what stage of the Bill would the Government plan be placed before Members?

MR. W. E. GLADSTONE: The mode of proceeding I should propose ought to be made intelligible by the reference I made to the year 1885. When I spoke of general consent I meant general consent of the same kind as that arrived at in 1885. That would depend upon communications, and upon the possibility of arriving at a satisfactory conclusion.

SIR H. JAMES: What I wished to know was whether we should have any outlines of the plan before we arrived at Clause 9, or whether the plan was to be outside this Bill as the Redistribution Bill of 1885 was outside the Franchise Bill of 1884?

MR. W. E. GLADSTONE: No. My opinion is that we might very easily ascertain whether we agreed or differed before we passed Clause 9.

MR. COURTNEY : I do not wish to enter into any discussion now. I am manifestly in a very peculiar position, as the conversation which has been exchanged between the two Benches is technically of a slightly irregular character. I only wish to guard myself against being a party in any way to an agreement. We were taken very much by surprise in 1884-5, and certainly we claim to retain full liberty of action on the present occasion.

MR. GOSCHEN (St. George's, Hanover Square) : It is most desirable that there should be no misunderstanding, and I should, therefore, like it to be distinctly understood what the general consent the Prime Minister asks for is to have reference to. Is there to be a preliminary agreement with regard to the geographical constitution of a single-Member district, or is there to be no agreement before the matter is threshed out in this House? I should think it would be very difficult to agree beforehand to any kind of plan in detail. The right hon. Gentleman will himself be as anxious as I am that the matter should be made so clear that there should be no misunderstanding either on one side or the other when it comes up for discussion.

MR. W. E. GLADSTONE : I think I have made myself as clear as the case admitted by saying that we are unable to adopt any scheme which would make an appreciable addition to the amount of debatable work done in this House. I said, however, that the door was not wholly shut. If there were a disposition to consider the question we might by conference ascertain outside these Debates whether there was a substantial agreement, but pray let it be understood that we are not at this moment seeking to do more than ascertain whether there could be any agreement. As to any liberty of action of any Member being affected, no such thing was contemplated by me.

*MR. SPEAKER : The discussion which the hon. Member for the Bodmin Division said was slightly irregular will, before long, become of the highest irregularity. I thought it my duty to permit it for the sake of convenience, but there will be plenty of time to put down Amendments upon the clause, and before that time arrives the Government can say what they will do. I do not think the subject ought to be discussed any longer.

*VISCOUNT WOLMER proposed, after Clause 20, to insert the following clause :—

(Procedure in cases of doubt as to powers of Irish Legislature.)

“(1) If any question arises as to the powers conferred on the Legislature of Ireland under this Act in connection with any Bill introduced or passed by the two Houses of the Irish Legislature, the Lord Lieutenant may refer such question to Her Majesty in Council, and thereupon the said question shall be forthwith heard and determined by the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council constituted as if hearing an appeal from a Court in Ireland.

“(2) The decision of Her Majesty in Council on any question referred under this section shall be final, and a Bill which may be so decided to be, or contain a provision, in excess of the powers of the Irish Legislature, shall not be assented to by the Lord Lieutenant, and until such decision all proceedings on such Bill shall be postponed.”

He said, that by Clause 20 of the Bill it was provided that any Act of the Irish Legislature might be submitted to the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council on the question whether it was invalid as being beyond the powers of that Legislature. The present clause would simply enable the Lord Lieutenant or the Secretary of State to submit a Bill to the Privy Council before it actually became an Irish Act. He submitted that this provision was necessary and good in itself, and that it would tend to avoid friction. It seemed to him better that a Bill, which, if it became an Act, would be invalid and ultra vires, should be stopped before it became an Act. Otherwise an Act might be declared invalid by the Privy Council even possibly many years after it had been passed, and the result would be that all that had transpired under it in the interval would be null and void. It was difficult to contemplate with equanimity the amount of friction which might be caused if such a state of things occurred. On the 6th of July the Solicitor General opposed an Amendment of an analogous character, arguing that it was quite without precedent and quite irregular and objectionable that any speculative question should be submitted to the Privy Council. But Clause 20 of the Bill as it stood empowered the Viceroy to make what the Solicitor General would call a speculative reference to the Privy Council. As to its being novel, he would point out that the clause was taken almost verbatim from the Bill of 1886. It was, therefore, for the Government to explain why a provision which they thought useful in 1886 was now in their eyes objectionable. He would refer the Solicitor General to a remarkably analogous provision in the Act of 1885 for establishing a Federal Council for Australasia. Section 17 of that Act empowered the Governor of the Colony to reserve his assent to a Bill, and to state what he would be prepared to assent to, subject to certain Amendments specified by him. He thought the present proposal was much better, and would cause far less friction than the scheme of the Government.

Clause (Procedure in cases of doubt as to powers of Irish Legislature,)—(Viscount Wolmer,)—brought up, and read the first time.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Clause be read a second time."

THE CHIEF SECRETARY FOR IRELAND (Mr. J. MORLEY, Newcastle-upon-Tyne): The noble Lord represents the new clause as analogous with the provision which was inserted in the Bill of 1886.

VISCOUNT WOLMER: I said it was taken almost verbatim from it.

MR. J. MORLEY: But I would point out to my noble Friend that there is an immense difference between the new clause he has undertaken and the clause of the Bill of 1886. The noble Lord is mistaken in his recollection of that Bill. The 25th clause of the Bill of 1886 referred exclusively to Bills passed by the Irish Legislature. The noble Lord's clause goes very much further than that, because he proposes that if any question arises in connection with any Bill introduced into the Irish Legislature, it may be referred to the Privy Council. This is not an idle distinction on my part. The effect of this clause would be to put it in the power of any Member of the Irish Legislature to introduce a Bill for the mere purpose of raising a specific question, and obtaining the decision of the Privy Council upon it. I do not wish to press the noble Lord too hard, but he has inadvertently misrepresented the clause of the Bill of 1886. There is a much more serious objection than the one I have already indicated. The clause would introduce a legal tribunal into legislative operations whilst those operations were in progress.

*VISCOUNT WOLMER: There is the case of Australasia.

MR. J. MORLEY: I have nothing to do with that. I am arguing the question on the facts of the case we are now discussing. The clause would introduce a general tribunal with authority to advise the Legislature upon legislative proposals then under discussion. I think the noble Lord will see that this, from a Constitutional point of view, is a very grave objection. On these and other grounds, which I will not trouble the House with, I cannot assent to the proposal.

SIR H. JAMES said, he would suggest, after the remarks of the Chief Secretary, that it would be well to omit the words "introduced or" from the new clause, and to accept the proposal that the Lord Lieutenant might obtain the judicial decision of the Privy Council, as to whether a measure exceeded the powers of the Irish Legislature or not, after the Bill was passed. He thought there could be no doubt that some practical difficulty would be found to exist in the way of a Parliament with limited powers. The difficulty would not be of the Parliament, but of the people. The people of Ireland would be subject to the laws that were passed by the Irish Parliament, and in their interests and for their protection it was of the utmost importance that the validity of every Act passed should be safely established. He would remind the House that an effort was made in Committee to allow the Lord Lieutenant to give a qualifying approval of a Bill—that if he had a doubt as to whether a particular part of it exceeded the powers of the Legislature he might suspend his action on that portion, but give assent to the other portion. That proposal was not accepted. By the Bill the Lord Lieutenant would be bound, in any case, to give a total veto or a total acceptance. Unless some provision of the kind proposed was adopted the subject might be placed in a very great difficulty with regard to any Act passed by the Legislature, for he would have no opportunity, before acting under it, of ascertaining whether the measure was ultra vires or not. It might be said that anyone having doubt of the validity of an Act might test it by a legal suit; but was it right or just that they should throw such a burden on the subject? It was certainly the duty of a Government and Legislature to see that, when a Statute was passed, the burden and cost of contesting it should not be thrown on the subject. Why should not the Lord Lieutenant, who was primarily liable and responsible, be entitled to take the judicial advice of the Privy Council as to whether a Bill was ultra vires or not, before he gave his assent to it, instead of giving his assent and leaving the subject to contest the matter? Clause 20 was insufficient to meet the difficulty, because before a judicial decision could be obtained under that arrangement many acts might have been done under the Statute, and these might possibly turn out to have been illegal. All difficulty and injustice, however, would be avoided if the Lord Lieutenant were permitted to take the judicial advice of the Council before a Statute was finally passed. He would hope no undue burden would be placed upon Irish subjects by the Irish Legislature legislating on Irish questions; but his suggestion was, he thought, well advised, and perhaps it would be considered whether it could be adopted.

MR. SEXTON (Kerry, N.) said, it was quite evident that the new clause as it stood on the Paper would not bear discussion for a moment. If the Lord Lieutenant had the power cast upon him of considering whether any Bill introduced was beyond the powers of the Legislature or not, he would have to become the critic of all the proceedings of the Irish Parliament, and it was evident that if, in virtue of this function, he were to interrupt the proceedings of either Chamber in order to obtain a judicial decision on Bills introduced, a state of affairs would be brought about which existed in no other country. It would certainly produce great difficulty and disorder if the Legislature were to be interrupted in that way. That part of the new clause, however, seemed to have been abandoned, and now the proposal was that after a Bill had been passed the Lord Lieutenant, instead of proceeding to give the Royal Assent to it, should first have the power to refer it, if he desired, to the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council. He submitted that if any Act was passed by the Irish Legislature which was ultra vires, and which materially affected any interest, the question could speedily be tested—

MR. T. H. BOLTON (St. Pancras, N.): How?

MR. SEXTON said, it could be done by some person who was affected by the Act testing it in the Courts. He did not think it was a very great misfortune to add one more to the many questions in which an individual had to maintain his rights at law, as to testing whether a Statute was valid, or repelling unjust infraction by the Act. It did not add to the burdens of the subject to so look after his rights. He presumed that in the case of any Act passed the question would be speedily raised whether it was ultra vires; and when once the question was raised, operations under the Act would be suspended until the validity of the Statute was determined. On the other hand, if the new clause were adopted, it would effect a very unfortunate change in the functions and position of the Lord Lieutenant, because by the structure of the Bill he was bound, unless he received instructions from the Imperial Government, to take the advice of the Irish Executive Council in regard to withholding or giving the Royal Assent. If the Lord Lieutenant, instead of acting on that plain rule and confining himself to his Ministerial functions, were called upon to form a preliminary or tentative judgment of his own as to whether a Bill just passed was beyond the powers of the Legislature or not, and in virtue of that referred the Bill to the Privy Council instead of giving his assent to it, he did not think it would be possible to preserve harmonious action between the Lord Lieutenant and the Executive Committee of the Irish Privy Council. It would draw him away from his proper functions to bring him into conflict with those officers who were appointed to assist him and advise him. After a Bill was passed, which was not considered, perhaps, a proper Bill, the Lord Lieutenant should be left simply to confirm the will of the Privy Council in regard to assent or withholding assent, unless, of course, he received instructions from the Imperial Cabinet. Otherwise, it was obvious, he thought, that there was an impossibility of a speedy settlement.

*MR. T. H. BOLTON said, it was provided by Clause 20 that the Lord Lieutenant or the Secretary of State should be the only person who, in the public interest, should take steps to speedily determine whether any Act passed by the Irish Legislature was beyond its power, or had been improperly passed. The initiative lay with them and not with the private individual, as the hon. Member for North Kerry supposed.

MR. SEXTON: Sub-section 3.

*MR. T. H. BOLTON said, the hon. Member referred him to Sub-section 3; but he would like to ask what remedy a private individual would have if an Act were passed that might deprive him of liberty or property without due process of law? Of course, an individual might petition the Queen, or write to the newspapers on the subject, but that was not a judicial proceeding; and he would have no power to raise the question judicially in a direct manner so that it could be tried by the Exchequer Judges in the first instance and remitted on appeal to the Privy Council. He would have no power in that respect at all. In that particular this provision differed from the provisions of the American Constitution and judicial system, which allowed the individual to raise such questions. What was the law in the United States? Why that Statutes enacted by States, or passed by Congress, might be subjected to judicial scrutiny at the suit of an individual, and set aside if found to be at variance with the higher organic law. There was no such provision in this Bill. He would press upon the Solicitor General (Sir J. Rigby) that he should tell them whether, in his opinion as a lawyer, Sub-section 3 of Clause 20 would enable and authorise an individual who was dissatisfied with an Act of the Irish Legislature on the ground of its alleged invalidity to bring the question promptly and directly, as opposed to incidentally—it could, of course, be raised incidentally—before the Privy Council? There were other learned Gentlemen in the House whose opinions they would like to hear upon the subject. If the sub-section would give no remedy to the individual, even in an informal way, to question the validity of an Act of the Irish Legislature, it was all the more necessary that this Amendment should be made to give a wider power in relation to the question of considering Bills. The hon. Member (Mr. Sexton) said it would be in the power of the individual to call attention to a Bill, and that it could then be referred to the Privy Council for determination on the question of validity. He (Mr. Bolton) denied that. He would most strongly appeal to the Solicitor General to explain the bearing of the sub-section, if he agreed with the hon. Member for Kerry. It was to be remembered that when an Act passed people proceeded under it; but under the new Irish Constitution, suddenly, in some lawsuit between private individuals, it might be decided that the Act was invalid, and all the transactions under it would then be more or less affected. Very great risk therefore, was incurred, and he thought there was great necessity for some such provision as this now proposed to enable Bills to be fully considered, and considered judicially, before they became Acts.

MR. COURTNEY said, so far as Clause 20 was concerned, a good deal might be said against the concession of an abstract right to test the validity of an Act judicially. To raise the question of the validity of an Act in an abstract manner would be a course which the Judges themselves would not greatly favour. It was a matter of great delicacy, and they did not care to decide such questions. But the Government proposed to enable a private person who was engaged in legal proceedings under an Act of the Irish Legislature to call upon the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council to pronounce upon the validity of the measure. The hon. Member for St. Pancras (Mr. Bolton) might be right in the view he had taken; he (Mr. Courtney) did not know. But the Government had gone a certain length to enable private persons to take proceedings, and the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council were to pronounce upon the validity of the Act. It would, however, take some time before this decision could be given, and, in the interval, many things might have been done, and many obligations entered into under the Act, so that if it were declared invalid great difficulties and complications would be caused. The whole question now in dispute was this: whether the process of giving the Royal Assent to a measure should be gone through before its validity could possibly be tested, or whether means should be given to test its validity before that assent was declared? It had been argued that if the second course were determined upon it would breed difficulties between the Lord Lieutenant and his Executive Ministers. Those who so argued did not quite appreciate what the position of the Lord Lieutenant would be. Whilst it might be said generally that the Lord Lieutenant would assent to measures on the advice of the responsible Irish Ministers, he would also, like a Colonial Governor, have directions of a general or specific character from the Imperial Government as to giving or withholding his assent. A general Bill might be passed affecting certain relations between the two countries, and it might be referred to the Cabinet in London. Was it expedient that the Lord Lieutenant should be authorised to give his consent to an Act of doubtful validity, or to allow the question to be referred to the Judicial Committee before he gave his assent in order to determine whether the proposed Bill was or was not ultra vires, the inference being that if it was not the Royal Assent would be given? The Government had gone the length of admitting the expediency of allowing the question to be tried the moment an Act was passed. He would put it to them whether it was not better that the matter should be tested before the assent was given in a case where bonâ fide doubt existed as to the validity of the Bill? The alternative was that if this power was not given and the Imperial Parliament disallowed the Act, very critical relations might be raised between the Governments of the two countries. As a matter of expediency, the Government having, rightly as he thought, gone so far, they were bound to assent to the new clause proposed by his noble Friend. Upon these grounds, he submitted that a case had been made out for the proposal which that clause contained.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I think, Sir, we should have some explanation from the Government, for reasons which I will explain. I fully admit that many Amendments from this side of the House have had for their avowed intention the minimising of the scope of the Bill; but there is another class of Amendments which are intended to make the Bill, if passed into law, work more smoothly. I support this Amendment as belonging to the second category. The Government will not be prepared to deny that one of the weakest points in the Bill is the extraordinarily ambiguous and difficult position in which it places the Lord Lieutenant. He will have to carry out functions partly as the Representative of the Sovereign, advised by the Irish Administration, and partly as advised by the British Administration.

MR. SEXTON: It is the same in the Colonies.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I will not discuss that point further than to say that when we consider the relations of this House—the Imperial Government, I should say—to the Lord Lieutenant, and those of the Lord Lieutenant to the Irish Legislature, there is a great difference between the Lord Lieutenant and a Colonial Legislature. Those functions which the Lord Lieutenant will have to perform are functions of extraordinary difficulty; and if the Government wish the Bill to work smoothly, they are bound to accept everything which will prevent undue and unnecessary friction between the Lord Lieutenant and the Irish Executive. If a Bill were passed by the two Houses of the Irish Legislature and doubts as to the legality of the Bill were raised in his mind, what course is he to pursue? If he exercises his prerogative and refuses his assent, he places himself in the most critical position with regard to the Irish Legislature and Executive in which a man professing to exercise Constitutional authority could be placed. Why, Sir, we know what would occur if he were to exercise his veto on a Bill affecting some vital matter in Ireland. There would be an agitation from one end of Ireland to the other denouncing his un-Constitutional action in refusing assent to a law passed by the Legislature. But if he had the power suggested in this clause, he could say—"I am quite willing to admit that the Bill may be all right, but let us submit it to a competent tribunal, and try its legality." If he did that, and the proposed Bill were pronounced ultra vires, he would be amply protected and justified in the exercise of his Constitutional authority, and no agitation need arise. That is the broad ground on which I venture to think that in their own interests the Government should accept this clause. What are the arguments against it? We are left to our own ingenuity in the matter. The Chief Secretary, as I understand, confines his attack almost entirely to certain technical objections. I confess I am utterly at a loss to understand what difficulty would be introduced into the working of the Irish legislative machinery by a provision so obviously innocuous. I would most respectfully press upon the Government the advisability of accepting a clause which would, as I am firmly convinced, make the relations between the various constituent parts of this very difficult and complicated machine they were to set up work together with far greater smoothness than they can possibly do if the Bill is left in its present shape.

MR. W. E. GLADSTONE: I do not see, Sir, the primâ facie grounds on which a proposal of this kind is made. The right hon. Gentleman seems to think that there is something peculiar in the nature of the case we are going to create which must produce conditions altogether new, and he is supported by the hon. Member (Mr. T. H. Bolton). I am inclined to the opposite view. What is the case? It is that of a subaltern authority, which is empowered to make laws for certain purposes. Upon some of the laws made by that authority the question is raised whether it is within its competence to make such laws. Is that a new case? It is the case substantially created wherever we have a subaltern authority empowered to make laws—in the case of a Town Council or Municipal Corporation, for instance. In that case you have the power to make byelaws, and the question of ultra vires is just as legitimate in regard to the byelaws and Ordinances of those Councils as in regard to the Statutes of the Irish Parliament. There is nothing new in the principle. The question is whether the clause in the Bill as we have placed it before the House is defensible; and, if it is not, whether the mode proposed for remedying the defect is good and wise. I am at a loss to see, even if we had made no provision at all, but had contented ourselves with saving all existing rights, how it could be alleged that there was any great defect in the Bill. I do not know that the present law is essentially defective with regard to the means which it allows of questioning the validity of particular documents which claim to possess legislative authority. I am disposed to contend that the Government have gone a very long way in the direction of supplying what, so far as I understand the matter, it is not necessary to supply, but what we do supply out of that desire for which we never have had credit, but which has actuated us in a number of the provisions of the Bill—namely, to go to the extremest length that we could without absolute mischief in providing against the possibility of wrong which we believe to be in the main imaginary, and for the removal of defects which have not been proved to exist. We have left to every Irishman under the new law every provision which Englishmen and Scotchmen now enjoy for questioning the authority of the various kinds of subordinate legislation. But, Sir, we have gone a great deal further, and, in the interests of the public, have given, first to the Lord Lieutenant, and then to the Secretary of State, the power of trying the question of the competency or validity of any particular law. It is said we can go further. It is said we can do this wisely. But, Sir, is the proposition that is put before us sound in principle, or agreeable to the usual practice of the law? If a question were raised under an Act, it may usually be raised in a concrete form in relation to, or directed by, somebody who has suffered and is suffering actual wrong by the Act. But if we are to say that the question may be raised by the Lord Lieutenant before the Bill receives the Royal Assent, we are causing the question to be raised in an abstract form when nobody is injured, and when it is a matter of speculative argument what the effect of the Bill would be. Is a provision of that kind in consonance with the principles of our jurisprudence? Do the practical habits of Englishmen encourage the raising of legal questions in that form?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: Section 20.

MR. W. E. GLADSTONE: I beg pardon?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: It is done by Section 20.

Mr. A. J. Balfour

MR. W. E. GLADSTONE: I am very much obliged to the right hon. Gentleman. He is aiming to prove that we have already gone too far. Is there anything in the text of the law that admits this?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I do not say that. I only say that, as you already contemplate the principle that abstract questions should be brought before the Privy Council, you ought not to argue that that principle should not be extended further.

MR. W. E. GLADSTONE: I take it that the point where the right hon. Gentleman made his objection is the first point at which he saw occasion to interpose. The right hon. Gentleman does not deny that the spirit of our jurisprudence is against the raising of these questions in an abstract form, or that this proposition would have the effect of raising them in an abstract form. If the Government have already erred it is out of their desire to go to the extremest length in meeting the views of hon. Gentlemen opposite. But we have done it under safeguards, and the whole supposition in the section is—as the right hon. Gentleman will see if he refers to it—that the case would take a practical form, and that no one would attempt to disturb the Act until there was some practical reason in a case of individual oppression, or of some person being wronged. We do not think the Lord Lieutenant would be disposed to go further in the exercise of this power. He will wait for some practical reason to act, such as where individuals may suffer wrong. I do not deny the possibility that an abstract question might arise; but the clause contemplates very different things. Well, with regard to this Amendment, I would like to know what is the meaning of the phrase, “If any question arises”? What is the arising of a question? A speech from the right hon. Gentleman would be an “arising of the question” if he stated that, on a careful investigation and with the support of his friends on his right and left (Mr. Carson and Mr. Matthews), a matter in the Irish Legislature was ultra vires. It used to be a question in ancient times what constituted a valid doubt. That is a question on which the right hon. Gentleman would enter with zest and delight, and I recommend to the acute investigation of his metaphysical understanding the meaning of the phrase, “If any question arises.”

*VISCOUNT WOLMER said, the words in question were taken verbatim from the right hon. Gentleman's own Bill of 1886.

MR. W. E. GLADSTONE: The noble Lord is well aware that between 1886 and 1893 seven years of human life have elapsed. To use a homely phrase, we should have had no gumption had we not taken advantage of those years to introduce improvement; but the noble Lord, in the true spirit of retrogression, goes back to the most ancient, the most petrified clause in the Bill of 1886, and flourishes it over our heads in a most menacing manner, even in the middle of a speech, and calls upon us to recognise its authority as if it were a law of the Medes and Persians which ought always to prevail. There is an utter vagueness and shadowy or rather foggy character in the clause, when it lays down the conditions by which the labours of the Irish Legislature are to be brought into question, and hung up at some vital period for many months, possibly for years, upon “a question arising.” I put the argument just now upon a speech by the right hon. Gentleman; but I put it a great deal too favourably for his views. It would not require a speech by the right hon. Gentleman. A speech from the smallest midge of a politician would be quite sufficient to enable anybody to go to the Lord Lieutenant and state that a question had arisen on which he would be bound to act. This would be a most convenient, tempting, and an habitual instrument of interminable obstruction in the way of legislation. So far as I can understand the Amendment, it is to put the Lord Lieutenant in conflict with the Irish Legislature. If the Lord Lieutenant interferes upon a Bill before it has become an Act he must interfere upon abstract grounds; he must allege largely his own discretion; he cannot point to practical consequences, and that is putting him into conflict with his legal advisers upon the very worst grounds that you possibly could. But if it is a question of an Act which raises practical questions of great importance to individual rights, and therefore to the public interest, the Lord Lieutenant has a standing ground to take even in the face of his own advisers. If there should be a conflict, which I should much regret, between the Lord Lieutenant and his advisers, under the Bill, as it stands, if the Lord Lieutenant goes to his advisers he will go on something like substantive grounds; but if he has nothing to allege beyond his own abstract opinion he will be placed in a most dangerous position with his own advisers. I hope, therefore, considering that we have gone a great length, the clause will not be further pressed upon the judgment of the House.

*MR. MATTHEWS (Birmingham, E.): It has occurred sometimes to some of us that the interval of seven years which has elapsed since the Bill of 1886 has not been employed by the right hon. Gentleman with sufficient reflection upon the difficulties to which his then scheme gave rise; but we now have a sufficient account of the manner in which the right hon. Gentleman has turned those seven years to his advantage. His mind has been contemplating these doubtful words, "If any question arises," and he has come to see the vagueness and insufficiency of those words. They are foggy, vague, and unsatisfactory, and form no basis for action. Permit me to say that I do not think the right hon. Gentleman has given a sufficient explanation of Clause 20 in his present Bill. It is perfectly true what the right hon. Gentleman says, that the genius of our English law has always been adverse to abstract questions, and, so far as I know, in this country there is no means of deciding the abstract question whether some Act be ultra vires until an actual case has arisen; but when the right hon. Gentleman was setting up a subordinate Legislature, with powers over the whole domain of the Civil and Criminal Law, but with certain restrictions upon it, it becomes of the utmost importance to see that the mischief which has arisen in the United States should not occur in Ireland, and that there should be some speedy way of ascertaining whether a law was ultra vires or not. In America the gravest consequences have followed from legislation which was ultra vires. Rights and duties have grown up under it, money has been expended on the faith of those enactments, and then, after 12 or 14 years of operation, has come the judgment that such act was void, and had conferred no rights whatever. That is the inconvenience the right hon. Gentleman had to meet. Therefore, he did not content himself with the provision in the clause, which enables any private individual who believes that a law that is sought to be put into operation against him is ultra vires to appeal to the Exchequer Judges for a decision in a concrete case; but he put Clause 20 into his Bill. Now, what is the difference between Clause 20 and that suggested by the noble Lord opposite? It is perfectly right, in the view of the Prime Minister, that when a Bill is taken to the Lord Lieutenant on the Monday morning he should say—"I assent to this Bill to-day, but remember I am going to-morrow to appeal to the Privy Council to know whether the Bill is ultra vires or not." Not only may he do that, but he must do it under Clause 20. What an absurd position! The clause of the noble Lord simply proposes that that appeal to the Privy Council shall be made before the Lord Lieutenant gives his assent to the Bill. I think the theory is sound, that the Lord Lieutenant will have no option in giving his assent to the Bill. I think everybody will now admit that the veto of the Lord Lieutenant is a mere farce; it will be the Constitutional duty of the Lord Lieutenant to assent to any Bill which his Executive Council advise him to do. [Mr. SEXTON: Subject to instructions.] Yes, but independent of instructions. It is true that the Lord Lieutenant represents the Sovereign in Ireland, but he also represents the Imperial Government; and under Clause 20 it will be his duty, mechanically, to give his assent on the Monday morning, and on Monday afternoon to write to know whether the Act is valid. Practical men must think that an absurd position to put the Lord Lieutenant in. It would be a much wiser course, and would cause much less conflict with his advisers, to give him the power of first obtaining an authoritative opinion whether the Bill was a proper one to give his assent to? It cannot be held—even by the hon. Member for North Kerry—that, granting a Bill is ultra vires, it will be the Constitutional duty of the Lord Lieutenant to give his assent to a nullity. The clause now proposed will call in the interposition of the Privy Council at a more appropriate period, and will save the Irish Legislature from what may be called a certain rebuff or reproof administered to it by the Privy Council if it passed into law a Bill that should be afterwards declared void. That is really the whole question that we have been debating. The point is a very narrow one—is the Lord Lieutenant to give his assent when he is aware or has reason to believe that he is giving his assent to a nullity, or is he to be able to take authoritative advice and ascertain whether his suspicion is well-founded or not? The further question which the right hon. Gentleman has raised, in criticism of his own language—namely, whether the clause ought to be more precisely defined than by saying “if any question arises”—is a Committee objection and not a Second Reading objection. I would submit to the right hon. Gentleman that the fact that the clause leaves it to the discretion of the Lord Lieutenant to act, whether the question does arise or not, is quite sufficient to safeguard it from the inconvenience pointed out. It will not be the duty of the Lord Lieutenant, under this clause as drawn, to act upon any slight or immaterial matter; it will be only in a grave matter that he will refer to the Privy Council. To prevent a void and ultra vires Act from becoming the law of the land surely must be recognised by everyone as a desirable thing. One might conceive instances of a Statute which upon the moment of its passing would operate to divest rights, and even to transfer property from one man to another; but if a Bill be ultra vires and void, surely it is better to stop its operation in limine, and not wait for the Act to be passed. These reasons appear to me to be conclusive, and if the noble Lord goes to a Division I shall support him.

MR. CLANCY (Dublin Co., N.) said, he did not understand how a Lord Lieutenant could be aware beforehand of a Bill being ultra vires. The right hon. Gentleman had said that it would be very anomalous and a bad thing if the Lord Lieutenant assented on a Monday morning to a Bill, and on the following morning referred it to the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council; but it would be better—ten times better—to do that than to take the opposite course. To pursue the opposite course would be extremely dangerous. When the Lord Lieutenant assented to a Bill on the

Monday he had thereby discharged all his essential functions. He avoided all friction between himself and his Constitutional advisers in Ireland; and if afterwards the Bill was declared by the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council to be void, no irritation need be felt, because it would be seen on all sides that the law had taken its course, and that the law had decided against the Bill. He repeated that it would be ten times more dangerous to pursue the course which the right hon. Gentleman suggested. The Leader of the Opposition had referred to particular clauses and Amendments on the Bill. The first, he said, were those which were avowedly meant to minimise the Bill, and he referred to the second class of Amendments as Amendments that tended to the smooth and easy working of the measure. Well, he really thought, when the right hon. Gentleman said that, that it was rather comical for the right hon. Gentleman to support any Amendments which his noble relative would ask the House of Lords to throw out in three weeks' time. For his part, he took a less charitable view than that which the Prime Minister had taken of the right hon. Gentleman's declaration regarding the Amendments of the second class. The former class of Amendments, which were avowedly meant to diminish the Bill, were not dangerous, for every genuine Home Ruler had his back up against them at once. It was the second class of Amendment—those that tended to the easy and smooth working of the measure—that they feared, and he regarded this one as one of the most dangerous of the whole lot, and was extremely glad that the Prime Minister had taken, as he humbly ventured to think, the correct view of the case. This Amendment was really one for bringing into the working of the Irish Constitution an instrument of delay. Supposing there was a Bill on some important Irish subject urgently required by the Irish people, if this new clause were adopted, that Bill, although it might not be ultra vires at all, would be actually dead for a year or two or three years until the Privy Council had decided whether it was ultra vires or not. If this new clause were enacted he thought it would be an instrument, in the first place, for creating intolerable delay in the passing of useful legislation, and, in the second place, an instrument well adapted for its purpose of wholesale intrigue in England on Irish matters. Suppose a certain Bill were proposed in the Irish Legislature and carried, and a Tory Government were in power in England, if the Amendment were carried, it would be quite possible for this Tory Government to delay it indefinitely on the pretence, forsooth, that it was ultra vires. The very best that could happen would be that after about two years the Bill might become law, and it would consequently be jeopardised thereby. He agreed with the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Bodmin (Mr. Courtney) that the Government had gone very far indeed in the 1st sub-section of this section. He agreed, for his own part, that it would be quite enough to allow any subject of the Queen who might be injured by legislation in Ireland full and ample opportunity to appeal to the Courts of Law, to carry his appeal from the Exchequer Judges to the Privy Council. He thought that would be an ample and sufficient safeguard for any person who might think himself injured by Irish legislation, and that was what took place in Canada and other great Colonies. Only the other day the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council was called upon to decide a question of ultra vires. It was in the case of an Act passed by the Canadian Legislature, and the Privy Council had it before them to decide. That would be ample protection. But the Government Bill went much further. It provided for a case in which no wrong had been suffered. He thought that to go any further than that was to make a mockery of the whole Constitution so far as the veto and other vital parts of this measure were concerned. Either this power would be exercised or it would not. If it was not to be exercised, the thing would be futile. If it was to be exercised—and he had a strong suspicion that those persons who desired to discredit the Irish Legislature would exercise the power vexatiously—then the result would be Constitutional friction between the Lord Lieutenant and his advisers which might result in the breaking up of the whole Constitution. It seemed to him that this Amendment, if it were carried, would change the veto; and he thought, instead of rendering smooth and easy the working of the Constitution, it would introduce into it an instrument first for causing delay, and next for causing wholesale intrigue. It was said that great expense would be attendant upon the trial of these questions at the suit of private individuals; but that was not a novel thing. It happened every day in the case of the Colonies, for people went every day from the furthestmost parts of Australia to the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council, and it was not considered a very anomalous thing that they should be bound to do so. As compared with the political dangers which might be involved in the adoption of this clause, the question of expense did not deserve to be taken into consideration at all. The right hon. Member for Bodmin asked what was to be done in a case of doubt? He replied by asking what was done every day in the case of the Colonies? Finally, he would say this—that it seemed to him to be a strictly unconstitutional proposal. The proposal actually was that, after the two principal parts of the Irish Legislature—the Upper and the Lower Houses—had assented to a Bill, the Lord Lieutenant, the third person, should come in and actually set aside their decision. It seemed to him to be a strictly unconstitutional proposal—a proposal for creating delay in matters of legislation in the first place; and, in the next place, a proposal for disturbing the Constitutional settlement which they hoped might be permanent and final.

MR. RENTOUL (Down, E.) said, the last speaker had stated that, of the two classes of Amendments that were referred to by the Leader of the Opposition, the one to which he more particularly objected was the class of Amendments which were intended to make the Bill work more smoothly and easily. The hon. Member need have no fear with regard to Amendments of that sort, because he did not think there was the slightest chance of the Bill working smoothly or easily from any point of view. The Prime Minister and the hon. Member who had just sat down ignored altogether the fact that the word “may” and not the word “shall” was used in the proposed clause, and all the arguments of the Prime Minister seemed to him to apply more to the employment of the latter than the former word. Any frivolous or absurd objection would, of course, be ignored by the Lord Lieutenant, and no appeal in such cases would be allowed by him. That was the common practice in the Courts of this country every day; the Judge only granted the right of appeal when he himself considered that there was reason for doubt. The Lord Lieutenant, who was supposed to be a carefully-chosen official, and a man of common sense who had his reputation at stake, would only allow appeals when he himself had serious or grave doubts with regard to the matter. The Prime Minister urged that, under this Amendment, people would raise abstract questions before anyone was injured. Did the right hon. Gentleman desire that someone should be injured before a question was raised? The right hon. Gentleman had remarked that if the proposed clause were adopted, Bills which had been passed by the Irish Legislature would be hung up for months. That, however, would only be the case when the Lord Lieutenant, in the exercise of his discretion, directed that they should be submitted to the final decision of the Privy Council. Nothing could be more absurd than making the Lord Lieutenant declare he had no doubt whatever that a Bill to which he had given assent was ultra vires. The Lord Lieutenant would be reduced to the position of a mere machine, and to talk of his veto under the circumstances was ridiculous. This question was raised on the Committee stage; and he thought, from the admissions made on the Government side, that when they came to the Report stage some such clause as this would be accepted. The Prime Minister had not said a single word that applied to this clause as it stood at the present time. He failed to see that the postponement of any measure brought in by the Irish Parliament for a few months, in order to bring it before the Privy Council, would injuriously affect any class of persons; but he did see that the greatest possible damage might arise if Acts were passed by the Irish Legislature and were treated as the law, and were subsequently declared invalid. In 1886 the Government considered this clause a wise and proper provision, and he hoped they would see their way now to accepting so reasonable a proposal.

MR. CARSON (Dublin University) moved, after Clause 12, to insert the following clause:—

(Appointment of Imperial officers.)

“Immediately after the passing of this Act Her Majesty shall appoint in Ireland such person or persons as she may deem necessary to represent Her Majesty to enforce on her behalf and in her name any Imperial right or interest, and the provisions of any Act of Parliament or any common law rights which the Irish Government have refused or omitted to enforce, and so many officers as Her Majesty may deem necessary for the due execution of any decision or order of the Privy Council, or of any judgment decree or order of the Exchequer Judges and the said last-mentioned officers, and also any persons employed by them shall be entitled to the same privileges, immunities, and powers as are by law conferred on a Sheriff and his officers.”

He said, the Home Secretary had conceded in the Debate on the Second Reading that it would be necessary to have in Ireland such Executive Authority as would be required for the execution of the Imperial law, and by the clause he proposed to set up this Executive Authority. He thought it would be conceded by everybody who understood the Bill that, unless they provided themselves with proper machinery for the maintenance of Imperial interests in Ireland, they must have such friction between the Imperial Legislature and the Irish Legislature as would lead to constant unpleasantness, or to the abrogation of those rights which they had taken so much trouble to construct. The general structure of the Bill, as was stated in his speech on the Second Reading by the Home Secretary, was very much the same as existed in the United States. So far as he knew, this question of keeping up Imperial Executive officers could never have arisen in our own Colonies, because the Constitutions of those Colonies gave them full and equal powers, such as this Parliament had itself, subject, of course, to the veto. The only parallel they had for the Constitution they were now setting up in Ireland was the Constitution of America. It had been taken from the American Constitution; but why did not the Government follow the provision of the American Constitution, which set up a Federal Executive in each State? The Home Secretary said—

“In my judgment the Executive in Ireland is intended to be, and must be, dependent upon, and responsible to, the Irish Legislature; but that does not in the least prevent the retention, as is expressly provided in this Bill, by the Crown and the Executive Government of the United Kingdom of such Executive authority as is necessary for the execution of the Imperial law.”

Why did the Government, when they were setting up this system, fall short of the provision of the American Constitution which provided for such matters as he proposed to provide for by this clause? The highest authority upon these questions, the Chancellor of the Duchy, in his great work on the American Constitution, said—

“Collision is avoided by giving the Federal Government, so far as its functions extend, a direct and immediate relation to the citizens, so that it should act, not through the States, but on its own authority, and by its own officers. These are fundamental principles, whose soundness experience has proved, and which will deserve to be considered by those who, in time to come, may have in other countries to frame Federal or quasi-Federal Constitutions.”

That occurred to him to be exactly appropriate to the present clause. That clause dealt with two matters. They admitted that they had set up—though, he (Mr. Carson) thought, in a very imperfect way—the Court of Exchequer Judges, under the 17th section, for the protection of Imperial matters. They admitted that the Court was to have cognisance of all matters that were passed by the Irish Legislature. But they objected that they had no provision, as in the American States, to put the law in motion, or for the purpose of putting in force the judgments or the decrees of the Privy Council or the Court that was set up. It seemed to him that this paralysed the whole action of the system they had put into this Bill for the purpose of preserving the Imperial authority. He wished to take one or two cases which, if this Bill became law, might have to be decided by the Irish Court. Numbers of Acts of Parliament directed the Attorney General to do certain matters. A very large amount of money had been advanced by Ireland to England—

An hon. MEMBER : England?

MR. CARSON said, he meant from England to Ireland. No one would think he was assuming or taking it as from Ireland to England. Well, a very large sum of money had been advanced from England to Ireland in connection with the Land Purchase Acts. A large amount of money was now due under these Acts. The Statute under which that money was lent provided that, in the event of the amounts not being paid, certain proceedings must be taken in the name of the Irish Attorney General. Times might come when Irish farmers might not be able to meet the demands of the Imperial Government. The Bill, however, did not provide for the continuance of the Irish Attorney Generalship. Here was an Imperial debt in which the Irish Government had no interest whatsoever. Would the Irish Government have to screw the money out for the purpose of paying the Imperial Government, the matter being one with which the Irish Government had nothing to do at all? Or were the Irish Government to do nothing? And was there to be no remedy for the recovery of these moneys, or for putting on Imperial pressure? They surely must have someone to enforce these charges. It would be, he took it, absolutely necessary to enforce them. That was one of the considerations that he wished to force upon the Government. He would next take the case of the Customs. In the administration of those certain duties devolved upon the Sheriffs in Ireland. Would the Sheriffs continue, and, if so, would they exercise those powers and perform those duties that now devolved upon them? Would they be Imperial officers, or would they act under regulations by an Irish Act? It would be an extraordinary position for the Sheriffs if they were to be both Imperial and local functionaries, as their performance of the duties under the Imperial Government might bring them into conflict with the Irish Government. He would remind them that they had the Customs specially reserved, and that ought to enable them to see the difficulty that might arise; and he asked was it not likely, under such circumstances, that they would have a collision between the two Governments? Was it likely that the Imperial Government could insist upon carrying out the law, although they had nothing whatever to say as to the administration of the law? Again, it seemed to him that, in a great many cases where the Attorney General had duties thrown upon him, he might enter a nolle prosequi. He might say that a particular case was no business of theirs, and that he was not bound to take the initiative. In his (Mr. Carson's) opinion, where a point of that character might arise, they should make provision for preserving the law as it now stood. If they took a case in which they had laid down that the matter was an Imperial one, who was to set the law in motion—a case in which the Irish Government were not to interfere, and the Imperial Government was to have complete control? They must have some Executive Authority in Ireland to watch these matters on behalf of the Imperial Authority, and to see that these matters were not infringed upon. He did not think the attitude of the Government was a serious way of treating the matter. There ought to be, as in the American States, an Executive officer whose duty it would be to look after these Imperial matters and proceedings, to set the law in motion, and have the question at issue brought before the Exchequer Judges. Coming to the Exchequer Judges, he wanted to know how they proposed to deal with the Privy Council and the Court—how were the decrees to be carried out? The Home Secretary (Mr. Asquith) suggested a plan, the meaning of which was that, if a collision occurred, they were to come over here (to Westminster) and bring in an Act. It seemed that all they had to do was to bring up the Bill and have it passed at once; that, he thought, could not be done, and all the time the collision would be going on and the law would be paralysed. How were they to pass their Bill with 80 Irish Members in attendance here?

MR. J. MORLEY: Not all of them.

MR. CARSON said, he would take a case such as they had at present—say a majority of 20, made up of Irish Members, and that, under the circumstances to which he alluded, would be quite certain. These Members would be here keeping the Government in power upon English questions, and asking, in return, that they should be served in these Irish matters. Even supposing they were not a majority, they could prevent the Bill passing, and thus, as he had said, the law would be paralysed in Ireland. Why should they wait for that? Why should they depart from precedent; why should they not keep to the course which would prevent friction? But the Home Secretary told them that he did not anticipate any such necessity, as it would be the duty of every Sheriff and other officer to give assistance in carrying out the decrees of the Exchequer Judges, and the laws of the Imperial Parliament. It did not follow that this duty would be performed. It did not follow, because a law was passed requiring a citizen to do a certain thing, that, therefore, the citizen would do it. The theory was excellent in point of law, and he thought he (Mr. Carson) and the hon. and learned Gentleman (the Solicitor General) would be agreed upon the point. But they had had experience of the posse comitatus. What provision had they made in the Bill—what machinery had they provided—for dealing with the jurisdiction in criminal cases as exercised in the Bill? He took the case of somebody being tried for a breach of the Coinage Act. This was a very common case in Ireland—it arose at every Assizes. All the prisoner had to do was to say that he required to be tried by the Exchequer Judge, and the trial would then be postponed until the Judge came down, or until the prisoner was brought up. His opinion was that the Judge would have to go down, as the prisoner would have to be tried at once upon a matter which was Imperial. The Irish Legislature would have nothing to say. But, on conviction, they would have to take the prisoner, and put him into an Irish gaol. He would refer the Government to the case of America, when Federal gaols had to be established. They knew what happened in that case. The gaols were established in cases where a disposition had been shown to thwart and conflict with Congress; and he thought they might have in this case the same result. There would be nothing to prevent the Irish Government throwing open the doors and letting the prisoners go free. When he was told that there was no probability of improper action being taken, he could call to mind the case of the Dublin Corporation, whose duty it was on one occasion to hand over the presentment for the purpose of raising taxes for the Richmond Lunatic Asylum. There was a dispute between the Corporation and the Executive Government with regard to the number of Roman Catholics on the Asylum Board, and, because their wish was not granted, the Corporation refused to pass any presentment at all. The Judge took the presentment and signed; but the Corporation had other presentments issued and collected by their collector, tearing up the presentment which had been signed by the Judge and refusing to allow it to be collected. These were extreme measures; but they were adopted by the Corporation in order to get rid of certain restrictions. He did not blame the Corporation for trying to have an increased representation of Roman Catholics, but what had happened showed the lengths to which they were prepared to go. He thought, therefore, they should have an assurance upon the point. So far as the Bill was concerned, they had given it the go-by; but if they were to have afterwards the power to carry out the Imperial Executive system which the right hon. Gentleman the Home Secretary said was essential, they ought to have an explanation. They ought to know whether the supremacy was to be a real one or not—whether the system would be a real one or not. The clause he had attempted to frame was nothing new. It was founded upon the precedent they had, and upon their experience in relation to the United States. Even the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Duchy (Mr. Bryce), who had dealt with the matter in his work on the American Constitution, would admit that this was the only way in which they could proceed in reference to these subjects.

Clause (Appointment of Imperial Officers,)—(Mr. Carson,)—brought up, and read the first time.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Clause be read a second time."

*THE SOLICITOR GENERAL (Sir J. RIGBY, Forfar) said, the hon. and learned Gentleman had on this occasion referred now and then to his clause, but the greater part of his speech was directed to difficulties already existing in Ireland, and his complaint appeared to be that the Government did not eradicate all those difficulties by their Bill. He spoke of the action of the Corporation of Dublin with regard to lunatic asylums; but what remedy had he suggested for a case of that kind? There was nothing in the Amendment which would affect the state of things such as arose under the present law. The hon. and learned Member also spoke of the difficulty that arose because the posse comitatus was not always in harmony with the Executive officers. Would his Amendment alter that state of things, or have the slightest effect upon it? What was the use of referring to the difficulty as to the posse comitatus in reference to a clause that could not have any application at all on the state of things. They had had what were supposed to be defects in the Bill pointed out to them. Well, of what advantage would the Amendment be to them? He was obliged to discuss the Amendment to show its inconsistencies, and how utterly ineffectual it would be. He supposed he should be told presently that this was a technicality, because what was understood by right hon. Gentlemen opposite as a "technicality" was a close argument, whereas the argument of hon. Gentlemen opposite was simply a derision of the Government proposals they might happen to be dealing with, and an indulgence in generalities that never came to an end. The suggestion was that there must be two Executives in Ireland. He did not agree with that. He quite agreed that there might have to be, but not that there must be, two Executives, because they were entitled to believe that the Bill would be suited to the wants of Ireland, and that, instead of being a cause of discord, the Bill would bring about harmony. That, certainly was the principle on which the Bill had been framed. They did not talk about "angelic tempers."

MR. CARSON said, he had not said a word about angelic tempers. He had referred to angelic theories or arguments.

SIR J. RIGBY said, some one else had used the phrase, and he had meant the same thing as the hon. and learned Gentleman, for angelic temper or argument, he supposed, meant angelic disposition. He had never said a word about it, and did not intend to. He would assume that under the new state of things, when it was brought about in Ireland, the Irish people would be guided by the motives which actuated human nature all the world over. He went no further than that. He did not assume that the Irish Executive necessarily set itself against Imperial interests, or would do other than attempt to forward the interests of the Irish people. In most of the cases referred to by the hon. and learned Member the Irish Executive would have a direct motive of pecuniary interest of a most important character. The hon. and learned Gentleman referred to those moneys which were owing from people in Ireland under the Local Loans Acts, and so on, to the Imperial Exchequer, and the hon. and learned Member assumed that the Irish Government would take a view adverse to the Imperial Exchequer, and that, therefore, it was necessary in the Bill to make provision for such a state of things. What were the existing provisions of the Bill? These monies were to be paid by the Irish Exchequer to the British Exchequer.

MR. CARSON said, he had not spoken about local loans at all. He had referred to loans lent direct to individuals by the Board of Works, acting for the Treasury.

MR. SEXTON: It is all the same thing.

*SIR J. RIGBY said, he did not pretend to have an exact knowledge of these financial arrangements. But to deal with other matters the Irish Executive had a direct pecuniary interest in the Sheriff's duties in support of the Customs, a larger interest than the Imperial Authority, inasmuch as they got two-thirds of the money collected, while the Imperial Government received only one-third. He did not talk of theories of any kind, but held that where their pecuniary interest was involved the Irish Executive might be expected to act in accordance with common sense. Therefore, he submitted that no prima facie case had been made out for the necessity of two Executives existing side by side in Ireland, the one confined to the execution of Imperial enactments and to the protection of Imperial interests, and the other standing aloof and holding itself absolved from any assistance for Imperial purposes. He submitted that what they might reasonably expect to see in Ireland was what had in this respect taken place in Canada, where there was no necessity for a duplication of officers on the large scale now suggested. When anything was wanted to be done the Dominion Government applied to the local Executive, and found no difficulty about the matter. He did not know that the local Executive would take on itself any great amount of expense or trouble, but that would be decided by the arrangement that would be made. On the hypothesis of hon. Members opposite they would be the worst enemies of the Imperial Government, and on the hypothesis of the Government they would be content not to interfere, and he should hope that they would be quite willing that the time of their officers should be devoted to a useful purpose—useful to Ireland as well as to Great Britain—that of assisting the officers of the United Kingdom. If they did not, there was the remedy pointed out by the hon. and learned Gentleman. He (Sir J. Rigby) had a word to say about the United States. Surely it was not necessary to point out the great distinction that must necessarily exist between the Constitution of the United States and the proposed Constitution of Ireland. The Federal Government in the United States had to do with a series of Sovereign States; but Ireland, from the beginning, would not be any less a part of the United Kingdom than it was now. Ireland would remain to all intents and purposes a portion of the United Kingdom, though within a very wide, but, at the same time, a clearly defined and limited sphere, it would be able to make laws for local purposes. There was no analogy between that case and the position which was occupied, according to the States Constitution, by the Federal Government in a Sovereign State. After the Act passed there would be in Ireland a full and complete staff of officers, some of them Customs officers, over whom, he took it, that the Irish Legislature would have no jurisdiction whatever. With regard to them the position remained unaltered. They were servants of the Imperial Government, and so they would remain. There were many of them who had duties, partly local and partly Imperial, to perform. Why should that be altered? How would the House get rid of their obligation to fulfil duties towards the Imperial Government in respect of matters that were not within the jurisdiction of the Irish Legislature? It was said that they were to serve two masters. That would not be the case in any sense in which the direction or orders of the two masters might come into conflict; but at the present day, throughout the Civil Service, it was a common thing for an official to obey the instructions of several masters, each one representing a department of Government. He saw no reason to suppose that any difficulty would arise in Ireland where there were two sets of duties to be performed—one exclusively local and the other concerning the Imperial Revenue. Without being at all unduly sanguine, it was obvious that the very hypothesis of the Bill was the assumption that it would not create violent antipathies in Ireland, but would do away with them. It was brought in for that purpose, and those who did not believe in it voted against it as a matter of course. He could not imagine a man voting for it unless he thought that the reasonable hypothesis was that dissensions and difficulties would presently be got rid of in Ireland by the operation of it. And it was upon that assumption that the whole Bill was recommended to the House. It was on that assumption that the Government supported and maintained the Bill. He said, then, that it might be possible, but that it was by no means certain, that particular officers would be required in Ireland for the purpose of protecting and safeguarding Imperial interests. If that were so, what was there to prevent that being done without a clause in an Act of Parliament? Unquestionably, where a duty was cast upon the Executive Government, it had the power to appoint agents for fulfilling that duty. Granted that they must come to Parliament to get money to pay those agents. That was the common case in our Civil Service in this country, as it would be in Ireland. They must come to Parliament. How would it be under the Amendment? The Amendment was altogether useless in regard to the payment of the salaries of these officers. It made no provision for the payment of the officers; and, therefore, it did not alter the existing state of things at all. The Amendment provided that the officers should be appointed, but the salaries would be dealt with in the ordinary way by the Treasury, sanction for payment being given in the ordinary way by the House of Commons. The Amendment pre-supposed a condition of things which the Government could not assume, and proposed a scheme which, so far as it would be effective, the Government could not for a moment accept. The Amendment provided that the appointments should be made immediately after the passing of the Act. That was long before the appointed day, and before there could be any experience to go upon as to the necessities of Ireland. The scheme was an unbusiness-like one, an impracticable one, an expensive one, as it necessarily must be—so that it was one which, in all respects, ought to be rejected by the House. The appointments were to be made immediately—"such persons as Her Majesty may deem necessary." On what data was this conclusion to be arrived at? The clause said—

"To enforce on her behalf, and in her name, any Imperial right or interest and the protection of any right of Parliament, or any Common Law rights which the Irish Government have refused or omitted."

So that the poor Irish Government, before it came into existence, was to be charged with having refused or omitted to perform duties; or else there must be supposed an exact knowledge of the extent to which its failure to perform duties would extend. He did not say that a case might not arise in which it might be necessary or advisable to appoint agents to protect Imperial interests in Ireland; but could that be done beforehand, without knowledge or experience? There might be some who thought this a reasonable and practical scheme, but their views, at any rate, were not shared by the Government. The Amendment went on to say—

"As many officers as Her Majesty may deem necessary for the due execution of any decision or Order of the Privy Council."

It might be said that this was technical, but, at any rate, he thought that the framers of the clause ought to take the trouble to bring their language into reasonable Constitutional form. He did not know what was meant by an Order of the Privy Council. The Judicial Committee of the Privy Council advised Her Majesty to make an Order, but the Committee did not make the

Sir J. Rigby

Order. In an outside way it might be called an Order of the Privy Council by people who did not profess a knowledge of these affairs, but where they were framing that which they wished to become an Act of Parliament they should adopt language which would be understood in Courts of Law. And, furthermore, wherever anything had to be done under an Order, whether an Order of Her Majesty in Council or of the House of Lords, the regular and proper way was for the Order to be sent down to be made an Order of the Court from which the appeal proceeded. In the present case going to the Exchequer Judges the Order would direct them to carry it into effect as if it were an Order of their own. It might be that it would be necessary to make a formal motion when the Order got down to that Court. It was so with them in the Chancery Division. It had evidently not been worth the while of the hon. and learned Member to put his clause into a practical form. It was quite enough for him if he drew a clause dealing vaguely with some small portion of the question about which he had been so eloquent and leaving everything else untouched. The provision of the clause that there should be officers appointed to carry into execution the Orders of the Exchequer Judges was already contained in almost identical language in Clause 17.

MR. CARSON: The Judge appoints under Clause 17. That is what I object to.

*SIR J. RIGBY said, the Judge would be the man who understood all about the matter—the man who was on the spot. The hon. and learned Gentleman's alternative proposal was that Her Majesty in Council should, immediately after the passing of the Act, appoint men when they might not be wanted, and pay them in spite of that fact. So far as the clause of the Government differed from that of the hon. and learned Gentleman it was infinitely preferable. The clause in the Bill was practicable, whilst that of the hon. and learned Gentleman was unreasonable and utterly impracticable. He had carefully followed the cases brought forward by the hon. and learned Gentleman, and had seen that they might be cases which in future might cause some little difficulty, and might even require legislation, but the proposed clause would not touch one of them. It would not be of the slightest use in regard to the Attorney General for Ireland, for instance. He (Sir J. Rigby) had certainly said on a former occasion what had been attributed to him with regard to prosecutions instituted by a Government Department independently of the Attorney General, and he did not at all acquiesce in the soundness of the answer that the Irish Attorney General, supposing he were appointed by the Irish Executive, would, by virtue of that appointment, have power to override such proceedings. The Attorney General was a very powerful man when he acted in the name of the Crown, but neither in theory nor in practice would he have the sort of power or authority which was attributed to him by the hon. and learned Gentleman.

MR. CARSON: Who would then enter the nolle prosequi?

SIR J. RIGBY said, he presumed that if the Government initiated the prosecution no one except they could enter a nolle prosequi. If, however there was a difficulty, the proposed clause did not by one inch advance along the road of getting rid of, or even alleviating, that difficulty. Assuming that the question of prosecuting in a case of counterfeit coin was an Imperial matter, he contended that no officer of the Irish Executive could interfere in the business, even though he bore the title of Attorney General. With regard to those matters—in respect of which this clause, if inserted in the Bill, would make provision—they had already been provided for, and whilst the provisions of the Common Law and of the Bill were reasonable and practicable, the others were unreasonable and impracticable.

*MAJOR DARWIN (Staffordshire, Lichfield) said that, as he had listened to the speech of the Solicitor General—

Notice taken, that 40 Members were not present; House counted, and 40 Members being found present,

*MAJOR DARWIN (resuming) said, that the old argument to which they had been so much accustomed ran through the speech of the Solicitor General—the argument, or rather the assertion, that if the Bill became law they would be bound to trust the Government that would be established in Ireland. The Solicitor General declared that they might be sure that the Irish Executive would forward Imperial interests. But the Bill contained safeguards and precautions which showed that the Government even were not perfectly certain that the Irish officers would always support the Imperial interest. In one part of his speech the hon. and learned Gentleman said he could conceive that certain cases might arise in which the Imperial power would not be properly maintained in Ireland, and also said that the difficulties which now existed in Ireland would not probably be cleared away for some little time. If it were once admitted that there would be cases in which the Imperial Authority would not be properly maintained, that was a sufficient argument in favour of establishing a proper Executive in Ireland for the maintenance of the Imperial Authority of the realm. The Solicitor General had not suggested how, in his view of the case, the Imperial Authority in Ireland was to be maintained. Nothing came out more strongly in the course of these Debates than the different views on the Ministerial and Opposition sides of the House as to the meaning attached to the words "Imperial supremacy." On the Government side of the House the words meant simply an abstract right. Amongst the Unionists they meant not only a complete abstract right, but the power to enforce that right in every way and under all circumstances. Everyone knew that that right could not be enforced without a proper organisation, and the object of the clause before the House was to provide that there should be a complete organisation in Ireland for all Imperial purposes, and available in all possible circumstances to support the Imperial will. He would discuss the matter in the spirit that the Imperial power in Ireland was likely to be maintained. Personally, he did not believe that it would be maintained; but, assuming that it would be, it was necessary that they should have in Ireland an established system to make certain that in all circumstances that power would be felt. The Solicitor General also said that the Civil servants in Ireland were certain to carry out Imperial dictates as well as their local duties, just as in England the Civil servants often had to serve two Departments. But surely there was an absolute difference between the two cases. In England, if Civil servants served two Departments, both Departments were under one Executive responsible to the Parliament of the United Kingdom. The Civil servants in Ireland would really be serving two distinct masters—the Irish Executive and the Imperial Executive; and it was well known that a person could not serve two masters without giving rise to considerable friction. He had lower down on the Paper a clause somewhat similar to the clause which had been moved by the hon. and learned Member for Dublin University (Mr. Carson). Both clauses dealt with the subject of establishing more thoroughly some form of Imperial organisation in Ireland. As he had reason to believe that his clause, being so like the clause of the hon. and learned Member for Dublin University, would be out of Order, and that he would not have the chance of moving it, he would take that opportunity of placing his views on the subject before the House. The first part of his clause declared that the Lieutenants of counties in Ireland should be appointed by the Lord Lieutenant as representing Her Majesty. The Lieutenants of counties were now appointed by the Lord Lieutenant and their commissions were issued through the Home Office. These Lieutenants of counties were, to a certain extent, military officers and they would have this extraordinary anomaly in Ireland: that military officers would be appointed by the Lord Lieutenant through the Home Office, and not subject to any military discipline, and they would, he thought, practically become the servants of the Irish Executive if no alteration was made in the Bill. His desire was that Lieutenants should be the servants not of the Irish Executive, but of the Imperial Executive. This could be done by declaring them to be Imperial officers, or by transferring their military duties to other officers who would be under Imperial authority. The duties which the Lieutenants of counties had to perform showed that they ought to be only the servants of the Imperial Executive. There were only two of these duties which he would allude to. The first duty was that the Lieutenants of counties had the nomination of Lieutenants of the Militia. If the Lieutenants of counties became the servants of the Irish Executive they might be certain that the character of the Irish Militia battalions would be altered by the change. The officers of the Militia would be drawn from the Nationalists, who desired a greater separation between Ireland and England; and the result of that class of officers being in charge of the Irish Militia would be that the Militia would gradually become of a more Nationalist character, and would in time come to have distinctly Nationalist aspirations. The Unionists held that the Nationalist Members accepted the Bill pro tanto, and intended to use it as a lever for a greater separation, and, therefore, he need hardly point out to them the great danger of having a Militia in Ireland whose aspirations were strictly Nationalistic. He should also like to point out another objection to having in Ireland a Militia with Nationalistic aspirations which ought to influence those British Members who supported the Home Rule Bill. If the Militia became Nationalistic in its character they might demand, in times of emergency, that they should only be employed in the defence of Ireland, which would mean an unfair distribution of the Militia forces of the United Kingdom for war purposes. When a military officer set himself to the task of distributing the Forces of the Crown for the defence of the United Kingdom he would not consider for a moment whether there was any political division between Ireland and England; his only consideration would be what parts of the country were likely to be attacked, and what were the strategical points. It so happened that there were many strategical points in England and few in Ireland, and, therefore, the Irish Militia should be transferred to England in the case of mobilisation for war. Hence, if the Irish Militia demanded to be kept in Ireland it would cause a considerable additional expenditure to this country, because the Irish Militia, not being available in England, the Forces of the Crown would have to be supplemented in some other way. The second duty of Lieutenants of counties, which ought to be performed by Imperial and not by local officers, was in regard to the balloting for the Militia. In a great national emergency every man was bound to serve in a general levy, which in England and Scotland was regulated by local Militia Acts and in Ireland by the Militia Acts. The local Militia had not been called out since 1815, and at that time it formed a distinct Force from the Militia Force now embodied. By the Militia Act of 1882 the jurisdiction, power, duties, and privileges in relation to raising a local Militia by ballot was retained to the Lieutenant of counties. To his mind, that provision showed that it was felt to be necessary to have an Imperial officer in each county to represent the Imperial authority in regard to this balloting for the Militia. In times of national crisis there must be unity of command and action, and therefore it was absolutely necessary that the officer charged with the work of organising the ballot for the Militia under the Militia Acts should be directly under Imperial and not local authority. If they put an officer of local authority in charge they might be perfectly certain that in times of crisis the machinery for dealing with the Militia would break down. There were reasons which made it absolutely necessary that the Lieutenants of counties should be Imperial officers. The second part of his clause, which he would have moved had it been in Order, related to certain other civil duties which had to be performed in connection with the Army. Under the Acts organising this balloting for the Militia the greater part of the duties were performed by the local constables. His desire was to leave the performance of those duties to the local constables, but to take power to replace them by Imperial officers in case the local machinery broke down in any way. It had often been pointed out in the course of the Debates that the Army would as a last resort assert the Imperial supremacy in Ireland. For instance, the Home Secretary had said—

“It really is taxing one's credulity to ask one to believe that a power . . . which has complete and absolute control of the whole of the Military and Naval Forces of the Crown . . . will not be able to enforce to the last extent every power it possesses.”

That statement implied the possibility of the Irish Executive not assisting the Imperial power, and that the Army might be employed under certain circumstances to maintain the Imperial supremacy. In the Army Act of 1881 there were provisions for billeting troops, and for the impressment of carriages, and in these matters the local Magistrates and constables played an important part. The House of Commons had never been much in favour of billeting or impressment, and the fact that the provisions remained in the Army Act of 1881 clearly showed that it was thought absolutely necessary that there should be some local authority invested with the power of carrying out the billeting of troops and the impressment of carriages. Not only was there nothing in the Army Act which enabled a military officer to perform the duty of billeting, but the Act declared it illegal for an officer to have anything to do with billeting. If the local Magistrates and constables refused to act, it would not be possible without this clause or some such provision to march the troops legally through Ireland. It was therefore necessary that they should have in Ireland an Imperial officer who would discharge those duties under the Army Act of 1882. He confessed that this whole subject was full of difficulties; but in the clause of the hon. and learned Member for Dublin University, and the clause he had put on the Paper, those difficulties were faced and not shirked. He considered the proposals in his clause justifiable in order to minimise the risk of the illegal use of the military forces. Then there was the less important subject of the apprehension of deserters. In the Army Act of 1881 there were provisions with regard to the duties of Magistrates for the apprehension of deserters. He thought it would be well to have an Imperial officer in Ireland to enable deserters to be arrested, for otherwise there might arise a condition of things under which the Irish Government would seriously interfere with the discipline of the troops quartered in Ireland. If there was not an Imperial officer in Ireland for this purpose, it might become more and more difficult to maintain the Army in Ireland, and everyone who had been in the Army must desire that the troops should continue to be quartered in that country, first, because Ireland was the best recruiting ground for officers and men—and it would be a serious national calamity if Ireland were not open for recruiting purposes—and, secondly, because it was essential that the Army

should be kept in Ireland, not for the purpose of suppressing Ireland, but because of the cost—

MR. J. MORLEY : I rise to Order. I wish to ask, Mr. Speaker, if the hon. Member is in Order in dealing with the question of the Army in Ireland in connection with this Amendment?

*MR. SPEAKER : The hon. Member will not be able to move his own clause; but I think he might state on this clause what he desired to have done—that is, the appointment of military officers for the purpose of dealing in Ireland with billeting, the ballotting for the Militia, the impressment of carriages, and so on. The policy of maintaining the Army in Ireland is quite another matter, and the hon. Member would not be in Order in dealing with it.

*MAJOR DARWIN said, he only desired to call attention to the importance of having an Imperial organisation in Ireland, and to show the difficulties in using the troops in the last resort to maintain the Imperial supremacy without some such organisation. There was an Act of Parliament, passed in the last year of George III., relating to illegal drilling in Ireland. Under that Act Magistrates had power to order any body of men so drilling to disperse. If the Irish Executive should fail to do its duty under that Act, no military officer would have any power to suppress illegal drilling. The Army could not do it. To send out the troops would be an act of civil war, unless they were accompanied by a Magistrate having the proper authority to suppress illegal drilling; and, in his opinion, there must be some Imperial officer to carry out this duty in order, in the last resort, to enforce the Imperial authority. They had been told that in this matter they must trust the Irish Executive. But trusting the Irish Executive simply meant that they did not want to retain the power of suppressing illegal drilling in the hands of the Imperial Government. The reasons he had given were, he thought, sufficient to prove the necessity for having an Imperial Executive in Ireland. They must have this Imperial Executive throughout the length and breadth of Ireland if the Imperial supremacy was to be something more than name. Under the Bill in its present shape the Imperial supremacy was merely a name, and they could only have a real living power in Ireland by creating this Imperial Executive through Ireland.

COLONEL NOLAN (Galway, N.) said, the speech of the hon. and gallant Member who had just sat down was more applicable to his own Amendment than to the Amendment of the hon. Member for Dublin University, which was before the House. But there were in the speech a few points which he should like to answer, for though they only bore indirectly on the Amendment, they were of considerable importance. The hon. and gallant Member seemed to contemplate that the clause would include the appointment of the Lieutenants of counties as Imperial officers. That would be a most unfortunate selection, for the Lieutenants of counties, as they existed in Ireland, were respectable noblemen, who did not interfere in Party questions, but who appointed Magistrates strictly according to their own political feelings, and nominated the Lieutenants of Militia by favour, though, of course, in both those matters they were controlled by county public opinion. As to the Deputy Lieutenants, that position conferred the privilege of wearing a handsome uniform, and was not of much importance. The adoption of the clause would be most unfortunate, for it would set up a separate Government in Ireland, and, whatever chance the Lieutenants of counties would have of happily getting on with the Irish Government would be destroyed, because they would be placed in an antagonistic position to the Government. The hon. and gallant Member saw great difficulties in the billeting of troops in the case of a march through Ireland. The rights of citizens were in this matter of billeting most safely and sedulously guarded—he thought too much so. To limit billeting to public-houses and exempting all other classes of the civil population was perhaps carrying the rights of citizens a little too far, but it would be a much worse state of things if they were to place the billeting of the troops in the hands of the Military Authorities. If the Amendment of the hon. and gallant Member were adopted, it would place billeting under the control of persons appointed by the Secretary for War. He did not think anything could be more dangerous to the liberties, not only of the Irish, but of the English people. The power could be used for crushing the people, as it was often used in English history by the Sovereigns. He did not think the Sovereign would do it now, but it might be done by some strong political Party in the name of the Sovereign. The Army had got on very well by having no special rights or immunities—by being in the same position as civilians, and if they departed from that system they would endanger the liberty of the subject. The hon. and gallant Member feared that the Magistrates and Police in Ireland would not take measures for billeting the troops. Under these circumstances the troops could camp where they liked, and let the people take action against them if they liked. The troops might take lodgings at high rents, and the Civil Authorities would have to pay the cost. Turning to the clause moved by the hon. and learned Member for Dublin University, he admitted that in the United States there were Federal Marshals, and that those Marshals had to act sometimes in the name of the United States Government. He could understand that in times of difficulty—such as civil war, or conflicts with Foreign Powers—the Imperial Government would be justified in appointing some of those Marshals, or some officials of that character. But what the Amendment contemplated was the appointment of a network of these officers throughout Ireland. That would practically mean that there would be two Governments in Ireland. They would have these Marshals checking the Home Rule Government at every step, and the Home Rule Government getting into rows with the Marshals. He believed that as the Bill stood it would be possible to appoint an officer of the kind at the large ports to prevent any abuse of power by the Irish Authorities, which might lead to a war with a Foreign Power; but to spread a network of such officers all through Ireland, as the clause practically proposed, would be fatal to Home Rule. The fact was that, whenever an Irish Bill passed, everyone was desirous of making something out of it. Some people might call them jobs, but he did not call them jobs, because he thought an anxiety on the part of an hon. Member to provide for as many as possible of his constituents was very laudable. The persons who would probably be appointed to these 300 or 400 positions under the new clause would be persons who had passed through Trinity College ; and, no doubt, the Representatives of Trinity College said to themselves,—“ Well, if we are to have Home Rule, we will, at least, try to secure 300 or 400 appointments under it for our friends. If, however, the Government were weak enough to accept the clause, he hoped that it would be made clear that the Imperial Government, and not the Irish Government, would have to pay for those pleasant quarters for the friends of the hon. Member for Dublin University.

Mr. ROSS (Londonderry) said, he desired to say a few words in reply to the Solicitor General. He could not complain of the early part of the learned Gentleman's speech being over-technical. On the contrary, when they had reason to expect the Solicitor General to be technical, he was most profuse and eloquent, and when they expected him to deal with the matter in a general way he revelled in a very plethora of technicalities. The learned Solicitor General criticised the clause in the most effective manner ; he began by objecting to the clause because there was no provision in it for payment of these Imperial officers who were proposed to be appointed, and the hon. and learned Gentleman went on to say the word “ immediately ” was wrong, because how could Her Majesty appoint such persons as she deemed necessary immediately after the passing of the Act, and before the Irish Government could enforce certain Common Law rights ? But surely that was an objection of a trivial and trifling character. It would be easy for anyone to form some calculation of the number and character of the officers necessary to appoint for the purpose of looking to Imperial concerns. The learned Solicitor General then proceeded to criticise the language of the clause, and he objected to the expression “ Order of the Privy Council.” He hoped when Members drafted clauses in future they would be careful to dot their i's and cross their t's, or the learned Solicitor General would be down upon them. But he had no doubt if the hon. and learned Gentleman turned his learned acumen to Acts of Parliament that such was his power he would be able to make equally effective criticism of any clause in any Act of

Colonel Nolan

Parliament. However, he did not think that was the way to deal with such a serious proposition as was now before the House. The clause of his hon. Friend had for its object the appointment of officers whose duty it would be to carry out Imperial decrees. He would like to know whether the learned Solicitor General agreed, or did not, with the language of the Home Secretary which was cited by his hon. and learned Friend at the beginning of his argument ; did the learned Solicitor General agree that such an Executive Authority as might be necessary should be maintained in Ireland ? If so, where was it ? They had admitted that Imperial supremacy must be maintained, and the Parliament in Ireland must be subordinate ; but where, from the beginning to the end of the Bill, was there to be found machinery for enforcing their supremacy ? The learned Solicitor General took occasion to object to two Executives in Ireland. There were two Executives in the United States of America, and why should there not be two Executives in Ireland, one representing the local power and the other the Imperial power ? The Chancellor of the Duchy (Mr. Bryce), in his book on the American Commonwealth, spoke of the machinery there as being like that in a factory where there were two sets of machinery, each doing its own work without touching or impairing the other. Was not that perfectly applicable to a case such as they had in Ireland, where they had Local Authority and a supreme Imperial Authority with separate interests requiring separate machinery ? On the subject of a Federal Executive the Chancellor of the Duchy in his work said the men of 1787, feeling the cardinal importance of anticipating and avoiding occasions of collision, sought to accomplish their object by the concurrent application of the two devices. With one of them he (Mr. Ross) need not trouble the House, but the other was that it gave the Government, so far as those appointments extended, a distinct and immediate relation to its States. When the Chancellor of the Duchy was framing a Constitution for Ireland, why did he not apply his own device which he approved of in regard to America, and which he considered a remedy against the danger of interference ? His hon. and learned Friend in front of him (Mr. Carson) gave a number of instances where important questions would be likely to arise, and it was idle for those who were framing a Constitution to say these difficulties were not likely to arise. Those who framed the Constitution of the United States, like wise men, saw that such difficulties would arise, and provided for them in the ablest manner. Her Majesty's Government had provided no machinery for them whatever, and he was sometimes almost brought to the belief that the Bill was not seriously meant at all, for he could not imagine a Government declaring for Imperial supremacy and having not the smallest atom of machinery for making that Imperial supremacy felt. Take some of the cases put by his hon. and learned Friend. There was the Land Improvement Act, in which the Imperial Government was directly interested, and in that case who was to set the law in motion when the difficulties arose? Was it to be by the Attorney General for Ireland, who was to be an officer of both the Irish and the Imperial Government? That, he thought, was an arrangement that would never work, because the Attorney General for Ireland would be serving two masters who, very often, would have different interests. The same thing arose in the case of the Customs, the coinage, and treason, and it arose in every one of the cases in which they had an Imperial exception or a reservation. But they had not only to look to the present, they had also to look to the distant future. It might be that the gentlemen who now represented the Irish constituencies might be so affected by a sense of gratitude for Home Rule that they might carry out all the requirements of the Imperial Government in the most strict and religious manner; but they had to look to the future. There might be an angelic band in Ireland at present, but there was to be a scraphic succession for all future time, and that, surely, was going too far. The men of 1787 who drew up the American Constitution—though he was sure that at that time they would have had great faith in the main qualities which their own citizens manifested in the previous years, yet they did not trust to those in any such way; they took the precautions that business men would naturally take, and they provided a special set of Federal officers, the end - all and be - all of whose existence was to animate Federal concerns. In the case of Ireland there was no such machinery; that such machinery was certain to be required was as clear as anything could be, and he could not see why the Government refused a clause of this kind, the intention of which was to provide the Imperial Government with the Imperial machinery for the purpose of carrying out its behests, and for the purpose of initiating proceedings—a matter which was very important. Who were to initiate these proceedings? Were the Exchequer Judges to do so? Was the Attorney General for Ireland to be entrusted with them, though it was not his business, and when they should be altogether placed within the sphere of some official who would represent the Imperial Parliament? He submitted that no answer had been given to the argument of his hon. and learned Friend, and that if the Government were desirous of carrying a working scheme this clause, or something like it, must be accepted.

*MR. T. H. BOLTON considered the proposed clause was the logical completion of the policy of the Bill; the Bill proposed there should be two authorities in Ireland—that there should be a Local Government to look after local affairs, and an Imperial Government having control, throughout Ireland, over all matters that were of an Imperial character. The learned Solicitor General spoke with regard to this Amendment as though the whole object was only to carry out the decrees of the Exchequer Judges—as though there was nothing else under this Bill to be done but to carry out the decrees of the Exchequer Courts. There must be a large amount of practical business connected with the Imperial Authority in Ireland that it was necessary some representative of the Imperial power should be appointed to attend to. Take, for instance, Sub-section 7 of Clause 10 with reference to taxation, which ran—

“Where Parliament imposed any taxes expressly for the purpose of war or of any special expenditure which Parliament declares to be war expenditure, or to be extraordinary expenditure for the defence of the realm, the revenue from those taxes which is collected in Ireland shall be paid into the Exchequer of the United Kingdom.”

Who was to collect that special levy made under the authority of the Imperial Parliament after the probationary period of six years? What officials would they have in Ireland under the Bill to carry out the Act made in the Imperial Parliament levying special taxation for war? Suppose the Irish Government differed from this Parliament as to the necessities of the war, as to the propriety of the war and the purposes to which the taxes were to be applied, what power was there in the Bill to assess and levy these taxes, unless they had some Imperial officers throughout Ireland? This was one of the portions of the Bill that seemed to have escaped the astute intelligence of the hon. and learned Solicitor General. The policy of the Bill was that there should be two Governments in Ireland—the Local Government responsible to the Irish Legislature controlling Irish affairs, and the Imperial Government, responsible to Parliament, in which Ireland was also directly represented. The United States people sent not only Representatives to their local Legislatures, but they sent them direct to the Federal Government and Assembly at Washington, and they had Federal Courts and officers throughout the Union. The right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Duchy (Mr. Bryce) in his book dwelt on the enormous advantage of having Federal officers distributed throughout the United States, and said that it brought the Federal Government into direct contact with the people all over the country. That was what they suggested in connection with this Amendment—that there should be Imperial officers directly in contact with the people throughout Ireland whose duty it should be not only to enforce the decrees of the Exchequer Judges, but also to attend to all those many varied Imperial concerns which would remain associated with the Parliament at Westminster. Why there should be any objection to give full effect to the policy of the Bill he could not, for the life of him, understand. The Amendment was not antagonistic to the policy of the Bill, but well within the lines of the Bill; and, therefore, he thought there was no just reason for refusing to accept it.

SIR J. GORST (Cambridge University) hoped the Solicitor General would forgive him for saying that in the speech he addressed to the House before dinner he presented the spectacle of the good man struggling with adversity.

SIR J. RIGBY: Hear, hear!

SIR J. GORST said, the hon. and learned Gentleman recognised the position in which he stood. The hon. Gentleman spoke of a country with which he appeared to be totally unacquainted, and it was quite a relief to those who were in sympathy with him, when occasionally he seemed to touch ground on which he could stand fairly, and in a position in which he could advance a general and sensible argument. The Solicitor General had one point that he stuck to in a manner that neither the supporters nor the opponents of the Bill had done as yet. He had seldom heard any Member who had spoken on this Bill adhere so closely and generally as the Solicitor General had done to the fact that if this Bill was passed there was still to be a United Kingdom, and Ireland was not to be a separate country federated with Great Britain, but that Great Britain and Ireland were still to remain one United Kingdom, which was to have one Government exercising jurisdiction and supremacy equally over both countries. It was quite certain this Government of the United Kingdom was intended to fill a quasi function of autonomous government for Great Britain, but that did not alter its character with regard to Ireland; it was to be a Government of the United Kingdom exercising the same functions in that regard in Great Britain, but it would be in this unfortunate position in Ireland. Whereas in Great Britain this Government of the United Kingdom would possess a staff of officers perfectly effective to carry out its functions, in Ireland it would be shorn of the greater part of its officers, and be in a position of no authority, with no officials and no agents by whom its functions could be surely and adequately carried out. That was the theory of the Bill, and it was to meet that theory that the Amendment of his hon. and learned Friend the Member for the University of Dublin (Mr. Carson) was proposed. His hon. and learned Friend sought by this clause to give this Government in the United Kingdom the same power to appoint its officers and agents in Great Britain. It need not use that power unless it became necessary. If the officers of the Irish domestic Government should turn out to be such admirable agents for the Government of the United Kingdom as the hon. and learned Solicitor General appeared to think, the Imperial Government would not need to make any such appointments. Also, what the Amendment was intended to do was to give the Government of the United Kingdom identically the same power it possessed on the part of the United Kingdom for Great Britain, and do what every civilised Government in the world did, appoint such officers as the circumstances of the case required. The hon. and learned Gentleman the Solicitor General said this arrangement would introduce an element of great confusion, that there would be double government, a double set of officials. That was what they, on that side of the House, had always contended was the principle of the Bill; though it might be a very good principle on which to make speeches on the hustings and to dilate upon in vague general terms to the less instructed electorate of the country, it would do very well for that purpose; but when they examined it as a working Constitution, as an arrangement under which people were to be governed and their common affairs were to be administered, they had always said—and this was their case—it was not a working scheme; it was not a scheme that could be worked to the advantage of Great Britain and Ireland. When the Solicitor General said that if the Government should insist on retaining double government it would introduce confusion in that part of the United Kingdom called Ireland, he was inclined to say Amen to the Solicitor General. The Solicitor General went on to say that the Government of the United Kingdom could be perfectly well served by the officials who were responsible to the domestic Government of Ireland. He could plainly see that that was an argument which the Solicitor General addressed himself to with considerable reluctance. It was a well-known truth that no man could serve two masters, but the whole of the Solicitor General's argument was directed to showing that not only could a man serve two masters, but he could do it well. He (Sir J. Gorst) did not believe this. He had a profound admiration for the Irish officials; he believed them to be as good officials as any in the world, but they would not be able to perform the task of serving well and faithfully the Irish domestic Government, and, at the same time, of serving the Government of the United Kingdom, who would have need of their services. A great many illustrations in detail in this matter were given by the hon. Member for the University of Dublin, not one of which had been answered. The Solicitor General admitted that he knew nothing about advances in Ireland, and he said he would leave that part of the argument to somebody else. That "somebody else" had not yet risen to answer the point. There were advances made in Ireland by the Treasury through the Board of Works, which were not made through the Irish Government at all, but direct from the Treasury to the people of Ireland; and if these advances had to be recovered, the process of law would have to be set in motion by the Attorney General for Ireland, an official of the Irish domestic Government. How could the Imperial Government secure that the Attorney General for Ireland would consent to allow himself to be made the instrument of the Saxon, to wring from these unfortunate people the money which was lent to them by the Saxon Treasury, and which they were shamefully called upon to pay? He hoped before the Debate closed that that hiatus in the Government case would be made up, and that someone from the Treasury Bench would, at any rate, attempt an answer to the unanswerable position taken up by the hon. Member for Dublin University. The point of the case which the Government so far had failed to meet was this: If they were going to set up this theory of a United Kingdom, and if the Imperial Government had to discharge certain duties and functions in Ireland, it must have officers to do it, and this Bill did not make any provision for the Government of the United Kingdom appointing any officers which experience might prove to be necessary in case the officers of the domestic Irish Government found themselves unable to serve two masters. The Solicitor General, in a part of his speech which he really thought unworthy the position the hon. and learned Gentleman occupied, was pleased to fall back upon the language of the clause and say it required amendment. Everyone knew that on the introduction of a new clause on Report the principle alone was in question in the first place. Amendments in detail could be made after the principle had been agreed to. Really, the only question before the House seemed to be the simple question whether the Imperial Government should have the power, which every civilised Government in the world possessed, to appoint its own officers to carry out its own functions.

*MR. BUTCHER (York) said, that whatever charges the supporters of this clause might be liable to, they were certainly not liable to the oft-repeated and stale charge of distrust of the future Irish Government. This was no new restriction, but simply the machinery to give effect to the restrictions the Government had already provided in the Bill, and the question which arose was—Were the Government honest in imposing these restrictions? Did they intend that these restrictions should be effectual, or did they intend they should be illusory? That was the real question involved in this clause. It was the Government that had created this dual Lord Lieutenant, with one side looking to the Imperial Government and the other side looking to the Irish Executive. It was the Government who were responsible for having inserted Clauses 3 and 4 in the Bill, exempting a number of important subjects from the purview of the Irish Parliament. It was the Government who had created a special Court for the purpose of dealing with Imperial questions, and more particularly with the whole of the questions reserved by Clauses 3 and 4 from the competence of the Irish Parliament. Having exempted these subjects from the Irish Parliament and reserved them to the Imperial Parliament, was it not the duty of the Government to give effect to these restrictions they themselves had considered necessary—whether springing or not from distrust of the Irish Parliament he would not inquire—and to see that these restrictions should carry out what he presumed to be their intention—namely, of giving protection to the loyal minority in Ireland? They had had one speech only from the Government that night—to which they all listened with great attention—namely, that of the Solicitor General. One portion of his speech he devoted to the form and the other portion to the substance of the Amendment. They were not concerned much with the form of the Amendment. What they were concerned with was the substance of it. It appeared to him that the speech of the Solicitor General was characterised by a sublime optimism, which could only spring from an exhaustive ignorance of the conditions of Irish life and character. The hon. and learned Gentleman assumed that the officers of the Irish Executive would accept immediately, and without hesitation, the double functions imposed upon them, and would carry out with equal joy the decrees of the Irish and of the Imperial Authorities. He confessed he did not share the sublime optimism of the hon. and learned Gentleman. He then went on and abandoned the only theory which could have justified him in his optimism. He abandoned the angelic theory, and having abandoned the angelic theory he had to fall back upon what he called the ordinary principles of human nature. He should recommend the Solicitor General to study some of the ordinary principles of Irish human nature, as exemplified in the processes of the Land League and National League in not very remote times. Had he done so, the ordinary principles of human nature would not have confirmed him in his argument. Let him give the hon. and learned Gentleman one example. Suppose the Irish Legislature were to travel beyond their province, and, in violation of Clause 4, were to take private property without just compensation. Suppose they decided that a landlord could be bought out for five years' purchase, a theory that had found acceptance on the Irish Nationalist Benches, and on those terms transferred his estate to somebody else, probably a Member of the Irish Government; and then, suppose the Exchequer Judges decided that this was a violation of Clause 4, would the Irish Sheriff carry out their decree and evict the usurping hypothetical Member of the Irish Government? The Solicitor General admitted that cases might arise in which officers acting under the orders of the Irish Executive would not be able or willing to carry out such decrees. The Solicitor General admitted that the Irish Executive would not go to much trouble to carry out the decrees of a Court in Imperial matters. But what was the answer of the Solicitor General? He told them that in such cases an arrangement might be made. It did not seem to him to be very probable that an arrangement would be made for carrying out an unpopular decree of an Imperial Court, against the wishes of what might be popular feeling in the country stimulated by national eloquence. He could not share these views of the Solicitor General, who admitted the possibility of a case arising, and yet would not face it in the only way it could be faced, by allowing the Imperial Government to appoint Executive officers to carry out those decrees. The hon. and learned Gentleman wanted to know how many Imperial officers it would be necessary to appoint? It would be very easy to introduce into the Bill a clause providing that Her Majesty should, when occasion arose, appoint such officers as might be necessary for carrying out the matters referred to in the clause. As to the objection that no provision was made in the clause for the payment of these officers, if the House decided to appoint these Executive officers, were they to suppose the House would not also provide means out of the Imperial Funds for their payment? So far as that objection went, it could be met by a very simple Amendment which there would not be very great difficulty in drafting. What the clause proposed to do was to provide a substitute for the posse comitatus, which was not likely to assist the Sheriff in the performance of his duties. It provided a substitute for the Sheriff, who might be unwilling or unable to carry out a decree, in a case where the posse comitatus, acting under the influence of Members of the Irish Government, would not be likely to assist the Sheriff. The Government having come to the conclusion that the Irish Parliament were not to be trusted with certain subjects, that the Judges appointed by the Irish Parliament were not to be trusted with the decision of certain questions which must be left to Judges appointed by the Imperial Parliament, the question before the House was, were they, or were they not, going to make the decrees of these Judges effective? He had heard nothing which would justify the House in leaving the matter open, and refusing to make provision for carrying out these decrees. He ventured to think the House would be wise to deal with the matter at once, and take steps to see that these decrees were carried out in the only possible way they could be made effectual.

*MR. GIBSON BOWLES (Lynn Regis) did not propose to follow the Solicitor General in his verbal criticism on this clause, all the less so as ever since the Solicitor General assured them that a ship was a house and a merchant ship was navigation, he had not attached that importance to the verbal criticisms of the learned Gentleman as he had hitherto done. But as the poet had said—

“Solicitors General rushed in Where statesmen feared to tread.”

And the Solicitor General rushed in to assure them that the hypothesis and the purpose of this Bill was to do away with all want of confidence in the Irish nation and Irish Legislature and Executive. But the Bill absolutely bristled with the contrary hypothesis. It was full of hypotheses that the Irish Exchequer would not pay its debts, and that the Irish Judges would not do their duty. It bristled with distrust of the Irish Legislature and Executive. In Clause 17 the hypothesis was adopted that the Sheriffs and other officers of the Irish Executive would refuse to do their duty. As to the objection of the Solicitor General that no provision was made by the clause for the payment of the officers the Amendment asked should be appointed, he called attention to the fact that in the Bill itself the two Exchequer Judges, in the event of Irish officers not performing their duty, were empowered to appoint some casual person for the payment of whom no provision was made, so that if the objection was good as against the proposed clause it was equally good as applied to Sub-section 17 of the Bill. They had listened to the Solicitor General, he trusted, with becoming patience. They did not think much of his argument which they understood; but they thought a great deal of his law which they did not understand, and, having shown the patience that House always extended to the learned Gentleman, it seemed to him that the time had arrived when, as upon the last occasion the learned Gentleman addressed the House, his Chief should now get up, throw him over, and accept the Amendment.

MR. BARTLEY expressed the opinion that the Debate ought not to close until they had had some answer from the Chancellor of the Duchy, from whose book it had been distinctly proved that he was himself in favour of the proposal before the House. Considering the right hon. Gentleman had a deal to do with framing the Bill—especially those provisions taken from the American Constitution—the House ought to have some words from him. If the right hon. Gentleman had changed his opinion since the publication of his work, he ought to explain why he had done so, and why he was voting against a clause which was in absolute accord with what the right hon. Gentleman had defended in his book. If he did not explain, he would not be treating the House with proper respect.

The House divided :—Ayes 104; Noes 155.—(Division List, No. 263.)

MR. CARSON rose to move the following new clause :—

(Appointment of Land Commissioners.)

"The Judicial Commissioner and the other Commissioners under 'The Land Law (Ireland) Act, 1881,' and 'The Purchase of Land (Ireland) Act, 1885,' (and Acts amending the same), shall, as vacancies occur, continue to be appointed by Her Majesty by Warrant under the Royal Sign Manual, and the Assistant Commissioners under the said Acts shall be appointed by the Lord Lieutenant acting on behalf of Her Majesty."

He said, although this related merely to the appointment of the Land Commissioners, it would be apparent, he thought, that the question was one affecting the whole relations of landlord and tenant in Ireland. The Government had thought fit, in the framing of the Bill, to reserve from the Irish Legislature any power for a certain time—

MR. SEXTON (Kerry, N.) rose to a point of Order. The hon. and learned Gentleman proposed to move this as a new clause. Clause 24 of the Bill dealt with the tenure of office of the Land Commissioners in Ireland; and his point of Order was that this clause should, therefore, be moved on the 24th clause of the Bill when they reached it.

MR. CARSON said, on the point of Order—[Cries of "Order!"]

MR. SPEAKER: Order!

Mr. Gibson Bowles

MR. CARSON said, on the point of Order, he wished to point out that Clause 24 did not deal with the tenure of office of the Land Commissioners, but merely with the existing Judges and other persons whose salaries were charged on the Consolidated Fund, and with the manner in which those salaries were to be paid in the future. It had nothing to do with the appointment of these Commissioners and Assistant Commissioners, with which alone his clause dealt. That was his sole reason for bringing forward the clause.

*MR. SPEAKER: I am of opinion this new clause brought forward by the hon. and learned Gentleman can be properly moved as a separate clause, and not simply as an Amendment to Clause 24.

MR. CARSON said, the case he had to put to the House was this—that if there was good reason for reserving from the Irish Legislature the power of legislating with respect to the land there was much more reason for reserving from the Irish Executive dependent upon that Legislature any power in relation to the appointment of the Commissioners upon whom the whole of the rights of the landlord practically depended. When this Parliament set up a Court in Ireland to deal with rents it created a novel procedure, which depended for its efficacy entirely upon the men who were appointed to administer the Land Act, 1881. If by this Bill the appointment of these Commissioners and Assistant Commissioners was entrusted to the Irish Parliament the obligation of honour which the Prime Minister had said arose from the dealings of the Imperial Parliament with the Irish landlords would be entirely cast to the winds. The question here arose—Was it not possible that the new Irish Executive might appoint men who would not fairly carry out the Land Acts, but who would rather out the principles of the Land League that had been taught for 13 years by men, some of whom would be their masters, and would form the future Government of Ireland? The landlords of Ireland stood in a peculiar relation to them in regard to this matter. The Prime Minister had over and over again stated in that House that the Irish landlords were the English garrison in Ireland, and that by planting them in that country the Imperial Parliament had incurred these obligations of honour. What would be the policy of the men who were likely to be the future Governors of Ireland in relation to that garrison? Speeches had been made by hon. Members below the Gangway (the Irish Members) since 1886, when the union of hearts took place, down to the present time, in which they told the people in Ireland that when they came into power it would be their privilege and their duty to take care that this garrison should be got rid of for the benefit of the Irish tenantry. The hon. Member for Mayo (Mr. Dillon) made a speech in 1887 in which he stated that it was his belief that when the struggle for the land was carried to a successful termination, at the same hour with the disappearance of the landlords the power of the foreign Government would also disappear. Mr. Davitt, a recent Member of that House, also in 1887, stated that when the day should come that they had the right to manage their own affairs the sun might some day shine down upon England when the Irish would have the opportunity of having vengeance upon their enemy for its crimes to Ireland. Those speeches were not made in the heat of passion, before the Liberal and Radical Party were committed to Home Rule. They were actually made in anticipation of this Home Rule Bill, and they were open and bold warnings to the Members of that House that these gentlemen were determined, if they came into power, to take vengeance upon what the Prime Minister had called the English garrison flanked by this country in Ireland. To pass away from hon. Members below the Gangway, he came to the Chief Secretary for Ireland (Mr. J. Morley). Some time after the Government had adopted Home Rule the Chief Secretary said that—

What did he propose to do now? So far from bringing in legislation to prevent that legalised kind of robbery, the right hon. Gentleman proposed in an indirect way to hand over to an Irish Executive, composed of men who for the last 13 years had been engaged in driving out the landlords, the appointment of the persons who were to decide all questions between landlord and tenant. Did the right hon. Gentleman think that he was dealing satisfactorily with Ireland by giving power to these men who preached, even down to the present day, to the tenants that they had a right to get the land from the landlords—the power to confiscate the landlords’ property? Did he consider how the Irish Members were to be elected? They must take it that the majority of the Irish Representatives in the new Legislature would fairly represent the opinions of the constituencies sending them there. Almost every one of these Representatives would be elected by the tenant farmers; and the Courts in which the Commissioners sat dealt with the interests of landlord and tenant, and it was the tenant farmers who would dictate their policy, and it was to them they would be answerable for their conduct. From the necessity of the case the Executive so elected must appoint men who could not be expected to see that the legislation which had been passed by the Imperial Parliament was fairly carried out between landlord and tenant. He thought there was a conclusive case here. He passed from that to the second branch of his argument, which was this: Parliament had entrusted to those Land Commissioners the administration of £40,000,000 of British money under the Acts of 1885 and 1887, and having done that—

MR. J. MORLEY: And 1891.

MR. CARSON said, quite so; he included all the Acts relating to the matter. Was Parliament going to part with the entire control over the appointment of the men who were to administer those £40,000,000, and who were bound to enforce the payment of this money to the Imperial Government? They had heard a great deal about reserving matters to the Imperial Parliament; this £40,000,000 was really the money of Great Britain, and were they to run the chance of losing it completely? He did think—although the question of these appointments might seem to be a small affair in regard to a Bill of this kind—he did think that they should act fairly as between man and man upon the relations between landlord and tenant in Ireland, and that the course which he suggested would be found the best to prevent the friction which would arise if this Bill passed into law in its present form. If only on the mere selfish motive he would say that they ought to reserve some control. He begged to move the clause.

Clause (Appointment of Land Commissioners,)—(Mr. Carson,)—brought up, and read the first time.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Clause be read a second time."

MR. J. MORLEY: The hon. and learned Member who has just sat down has referred to the language which was used in the past by some hon. Members below the Gangway with regard to the Irish Land Question. But that was at a time when the movement was being commenced of which I hope we are now approaching the end. My own view of that language is that it was the product of exasperation provoked by the circumstances of the time, and that that exasperation was to some extent, at all events, not unjustifiable is shown by the fact that the Land Act of 1881 was the outcome of the agitation that had preceded it, and I am not afraid to say that the language that was used in the course of that agitation represented, although perhaps in an exaggerated form, a true grievance and a real wrong done to the tenants of Ireland. Unless you are prepared to say that the whole operation of the rent-fixing Act of 1881 was unjust and the decisions of the Land Commissioners with regard to the reduction of rents, you cannot deny that there is, at all events, some justification for the strong and violent language of the past. That is one remark I would make on that language. Another observation which I desire to make is, that during all these years, from 1879 onwards, so far as my observation has gone, the Irish tenants follow leaders who use violent language, but not up to the point where it endangers their permanent possession of their holdings. Although they have been willing to take up a strong position against their grievances—grievances which, I submit, were proved to be just by the reductions of rent effected by the Land Commissioners—yet when the time came they did not follow the extreme measures recommended by their leaders. The "No Rent" Manifesto of 1881 was a failure, not because of the coercive powers which had been entrusted to the Executive Government, but because the Irish tenant, although he will go far to secure a reduction of his rent, will not run the risk except under violent provocation and circumstances of momentary agitation—and then only within narrow limits—of being turned out of his holding. I had many conversations with the late Mr. Parnell on this subject. He was mainly responsible for the issue of the "No Rent" Manifesto, and he has told me more than once that the effect or non-effect of that Manifesto, apart from all else that can be said of it, convinced him that everyone, however strong his political position, who resorted to a policy in which the effect would be to endanger on a large scale the right of occupancy which the peasants have, must be sure that it would not be supported by the Irish tenants. Perhaps I have gone a little further afield than I should have done, but I only wished to make these remarks on the observations of the hon. and learned Gentleman, as to language that has been used in past times under circumstances of great excitement. The hon. and learned Member, coming to the point of his new clause, has referred to some language which I myself used, I think, in 1885, when I said that I would be no party to allowing an Irish Nationalist Government to carry out a policy of confiscation. What inconsistency is there between that language and the policy of the present Bill? By the present Bill the Irish Government is prevented from legislating in such a way as to confiscate the property of the landlords. If Clause 4 is going to be waste paper, I admit that my language was inconsistent with the Bill, but we do not believe that the clause is going to be waste paper. The hon. and learned Gentleman has said that it is the policy of the hon. Members below the Gangway and of ourselves by complicity to get rid of the Irish landlords. But what is the policy of hon. Gentlemen opposite? Is not the object of the Land Purchase Act to get rid of the Irish landlords—although I admit upon equitable terms, and with just compensation and by due process of law?

Mr. Carson

MR. CARSON : The terms are fixed by an impartial tribunal.

MR. J. MORLEY : The hon. and learned Gentleman, in the few observations he devoted to this, overlooked the cardinal fact that if random transactions are sanctioned by partial men, and advances are made on bad security in case of default by the tenant, the loss is to be borne by the Irish Exchequer. The new Irish Government, it is suggested, will have to appoint Commissioners who may make ducks and drakes of advances, or make advances upon inadequate security; but if they do the Irish Government will have to bear the cost. To return to the immediate point of the Amendment, I do not understand whether the new clause is to be limited in its operation to three years during which the Land Question is reserved.

MR. SEXTON : It is for all time.

MR. J. MORLEY : I did not quite gather whether he meant that or not. The hon. Member's policy it seems is, first and fundamentally, to take away from the Irish Legislature all power whatever, at any distance of time, of making laws affecting the relations between landlord and tenant. I agree that if you do that you will be consistent in reserving for the same period of time the appointment of officers to carry out laws which, under a system of Home Rule, must ultimately be made by the Irish Legislature. Of course, the Government must be guided by their own policy in this matter as to the limitation of the powers of the Irish Legislature to legislate with reference to the land. If the clause were limited to the three years during which legislation will be reserved, there might be something to be said for it; but to make it permanent would involve an absurdity which the hon. and learned Gentleman himself must admit. While you would be giving power to the Irish Legislature to make the laws you would be reserving to the Imperial Parliament the duty of appointing all the officers who were to administer those laws. I cannot think that that proposal is one which would at all square with the proposition and policy of the Bill. I cannot conceive how, with an Irish Legislature existing, though subordinate, the British Government is to attempt the task of nominating these important officers; without exercising the duty of making the laws which these officers have to administer. I have endeavoured to state the case without using excessive language; and when the case is so stated and is understood by the House, I think the House will join us in rejecting the clause.

MR. ARNOLD-FORSTER (Belfast, W.) said, the right hon. Gentleman had avoided the real gist of the question, as it appealed to many of them, and he thought it should be made quite clear to the House and to the country what was the actual nature of these appointments they were discussing, and what the functions of these officers whose position they were debating really were. The duty which was put on these officers was a duty which did not fall to the lot of any other official in the whole length and breadth of the United Kingdom. It was the duty of fixing an arbitrary price for an article which otherwise would come into the market, where its value would be settled by competition. There was no precedent for this office. The Chief Secretary had said that the matter would come distinctly under the purview of the Irish Legislature, and was a matter in which the Imperial Government had no right and no duty to interfere. That seemed to him an absolutely untenable view of the question. If they abandoned the claim put forward in the Amendment and allowed the Irish Executive to have the appointment of these officers what was the result they must contemplate with absolute certainty? He desired to follow the example set by the Chief Secretary, and as far as possible avoid recrimination. But they could not conceal from themselves that the object of agitation in Ireland had been the reduction of rent by one means or another. Two methods of doing this had been adopted—the method adopted and sanctioned by hon. Gentlemen below the Gangway opposite, and the method adopted and sanctioned by the Imperial Parliament; and the two methods had been going on concurrently. One was a legal method—that adopted by the Government—and the other was an illegal method—that which had found favour with hon. Gentlemen opposite.

There was no reason to believe that the method favoured by hon. Gentlemen opposite was not one which they would enforce if they had the power. The contention of those hon. Gentlemen for the last 10 years had been that agricultural rents were too high and ought to be reduced, and that the legal method of reduction sanctioned by this Parliament was not adequate to meet the case. Reference had been made to the Act passed by the Prime Minister and his colleagues in 1881, the object of which was to effect reductions of rent in accordance with the ideas of equity and justice as they were then understood in the House. How was that Act received by hon. Members opposite? They at once set themselves up in opposition to the Courts, and there was no evidence that this attitude had been abandoned up to the present. The Chief Secretary had spoken about the "No Rent" Manifesto, and said truly that it was a failure, and he had given the reason which Mr. Parnell appeared to have confided to him—namely, because it was seen clearly that those who followed the advice of the Manifesto were liable to be evicted, the law of the United Kingdom being strong enough at that time to see that justice was done. The tenants knew that if they followed the advice of the Manifesto they would be turned out of their holdings and that there would be no redress for them. That was the reason of the failure, and that alone. The Manifesto was a failure for the reasons given by the Chief Secretary, and not because the advice given was dishonest and thievish in its character, or because a Roman Catholic Bishop had described it as opposed to every principle of religion and dictate of morality, and a breach of the law which said—"Thou shalt not steal." There was no proof that the doctrine adopted by hon. Gentlemen opposite in 1881 had altered up to the present time. On the contrary, there was proof that the old spirit still existed with the advisers of the Irish people. The duty of the Land Commissioners was to decide what was, and what was not, a fair rent, and this was the only protection which the landlords had against spoliation. The landlords had been told over and over again, in the House and out of it, that the only true and fair value for Irish land was prairie value, and that they had no right to the holdings which the tenants possessed, nor to the rent which was paid for the holdings. The landlords had between themselves and the spoliation with which they had been threatened only the protection of the Land Courts, which had been guaranteed them by the Imperial Parliament. The hon. Member had said that this was an Imperial question, and he (Mr. Arnold-Forster) could hardly conceive a case where it was more obvious that an Imperial question was involved. The Chief Secretary said that there was some obvious and natural connection between the limit of time suggested in the Bill during which the Irish Parliament should not be allowed to legislate in respect of Irish land and the limit of time that ought to govern the appointment of the Land Commission. Surely that was a palpable fallacy. There were many questions connected with the tenure of land in Ireland which, on the hypothesis that this Bill would become law, might very well fall into the domain within a definite period. But the Commissioners were dealing with a sum of money something like £40,000,000 sterling, which was the product, to a very limited extent, of the Irish taxpayer, but which was a payment made by the British Exchequer for the peace and good government of Ireland, and to suppose that the people of Great Britain had no concern in the distribution of this money was an idle supposition. It was in the power of the Commissioners to distribute the money as they chose. The Chief Secretary said that surely if there was to be some obviously unjust and inequitable distribution of this money the scheme would be put an end to. But that was not the way the thing would be done, as anyone who was familiar with the Courts must be aware. Pressure had from time to time been put upon the Commissioners—pressure which they had not been able to resist—and that pressure would be uniformly applied to get them to reduce all rents submitted to them. There would be no opportunity of putting into effect Clause 4 of the Bill. They would simply be confronted from time to time with legal decisions which would have to be decided by Courts constituted in the same way as the Courts whose decisions were appealed against. The Chief Secretary had said there was a great deal of justification in the attitude assumed by the Nationalist Members with regard to Irish land. He had said that the fact that rents had been largely reduced as the result of the decisions of the Courts showed that there had been a crying grievance to be remedied. But that was a very dangerous contention. There had been grievances in England and Scotland time after time, to which the attention of Parliament had been directed, and year after year had passed without those grievances being redressed. They had been at last remedied when public attention was attracted to them, but it certainly seemed a dangerous lesson to teach that no grievance was a real grievance until it was supported by violence and crime. Many scores of grievances had existed in England and had remained without remedies longer than the Irish grievances without leading to crime and outrage, and he considered it an unfortunate circumstance that the Chief Secretary could find no better argument to enforce his sense of the genuineness of Irish grievances than the fact that they had been attended by a long series of criminal acts. [Cries of "Divide!"] If the Amendment were not adopted the object would be to place on this Commission persons who would use their official position to reduce rents; and if the Irish Legislature were to have power to appoint the Commissioners, the Chief Secretary would find that men would be nominated whom he would now refuse to appoint, and which refusal he would be prepared to defend in the House of Commons. The right hon. Gentleman's present attitude was altogether inadequate. There was no reason why they should abandon for the future the security which they had hitherto possessed. [Cries of "Divide!"] Officers appointed by the Imperial Parliament were the only people who would be in a position to make an impartial inquiry into these matters. Certainly, if any persons outside the House were to be asked whom they considered the most unfit to be entrusted with the appointment of these so-called judicial officers, they would point to hon. Members opposite who for years had been actively engaged in championing a particular view upon this subject. The Opposition were asking that these partisans should not be made judges on these proceedings. He failed to see why this matter should be better judged by partisans and interested persons and persons who had prejudiced themselves over and over again as to the nature of the judgment they would pronounce.

COLONEL SAUNDERSON (Armagh, N.) said that, as the question before the House was so deeply interesting to the unhappy class to which he belonged, even gentlemen below the Gangway would admit that he had a right to say a word. The Chief Secretary appeared to imagine that the reduction of rent which followed the passing of the Land Act of 1881 was satisfactory proof that the Irish tenants were suffering from excessive rent—in fact, that the people were rack-rented; but the right hon. Gentleman should bear in mind that rents in England had been lowered very much more than Irish rents had been reduced by the Courts established by the present Prime Minister in Ireland. The reductions were, in fact, caused not so much by excessive rents as by agricultural depression, which had taken place in Ireland as in England and Wales. The average reduction of rent in Ireland was about 20 per cent., and in England it was more. It would be as fair to say that the fact that reductions in England had been 30 and even 35 per cent. was a proof that the English landlords had rack-rented their tenants, as it was to say that the fact that reductions of 20 per cent. had been made in Ireland was a proof that the Irish tenants were suffering from previous oppression from the Irish landlords. The Bill which was called a Bill for the Better Government of Ireland might be also denominated a Bill for granting to the Irish landlords three years' purchase of their property. Anyone who knew Ireland and the character of the Government that this Bill would call into existence, anyone who had studied the speeches made by gentlemen below the Gangway in the immediate past would see that the only prospect before property-owners in Ireland under the malign influence of a Home Rule Government was mere confiscation of their possessions. About a week ago there was a meeting of the Irish Federation in Mayo, and the hon. Member for Mayo (Mr. Dillon) told the people to stick to the principles of the Land League, and they would then get rid of the landlords altogether. Of course, they would. In three years' time there would be a general revision of rents in Ireland. The Irish Government were to have the power to appoint Land Commissioners and Sub-Commissioners after their own hearts, who would give the landlords what the Nationalists always said they deserved—the prairie value of the land. So keenly was this felt at one time by the Prime Minister himself that he said it was an obligation of honour to take away from the future Government of Ireland the inevitable temptation of dealing with landlords on the principles they had always laid down in the past. The House now learnt from the right hon. Gentleman that the condition of honour was not binding, but was temporary. Most people thought that an honourable obligation was an obligation for all time. If it was an obligation of honour in 1886 to protect a law-abiding and unoffending class in Ireland against open spoliation it ought to be an obligation of honour still. It was well that the country should remember what the principles of the Land League were. The hon. Member for Cork (Mr. W. O'Brien), speaking after the "Union of Hearts," after the Home Rule Bill of 1886, said—

"Together, please God, we will march on, shoulder to shoulder, until we shall have liberated this land from two curses—landlordism and English rule."

A year later the hon. Member spoke to much the same effect. It was the bounden duty of the British people to see that open robbery and spoliation did not take place in Ireland. From the point of view of Nationalist morality, he believed it would not be spoliation. The fact of owning land in Ireland was looked upon by the Nationalist Members as indicating that legalised robbery existed. There was no crime in the eyes of an Irish Nationalist so great as that which they called landlord robbery, or, in other words, the crime of asking a tenant to pay the rent he owed. Whether rents in Ireland were really excessive and extortionate was shown, he thought, by the enormous prices paid in Ireland at the present time for the goodwill of a farm. An Irish tenant in the open market could get for the goodwill of his farm infinitely more than a landlord could get for the fee simple of the land. Therefore, robbery and spoliation on the part of the landlord did not exist at the present moment in Ireland. If there was any honour left in Great Britain, if honour was not the transitory thing that it used not to be, the British people would see that they had no right to hand over a class of men who had always been loyal to them into the hands of their enemies. If the Home Rule Government was ever to acquire the respect of mankind, which he very much doubted it ever would, it was the duty of the British Parliament to take away from it a temptation which it not only could not but dare not resist. Patriotism in Ireland would be a very popular thing as long as it meant that one section of the population was to get possession of the property of another section of the population. Take away that incentive to patriotism, and the Nationalist Benches in the House of Commons would be vacant. All that was asked by this clause was that the British Parliament should reserve to itself the right of seeing that justice was done in Ireland between the two classes of the population, without which any Government that might be created in Ireland would be not only a sham, but a disgrace to mankind.

MR. J. CHAMBERLAIN (Birmingham, W.): I think that in the course of this discussion there have been raised several points of minor importance which may very well be disentangled from the main issue. I was a little disappointed with the speech of my right hon. Friend the Chief Secretary (Mr. J. Morley), because I thought he dwelt rather more on those collateral matters than on the one which is really of primary importance. The question is capable of being stated very simply. Certain Commissioners are to be appointed in Ireland to determine what is to be a fair rent. It is perfectly evident that the interests both of the landlords and of the tenants are absolutely in the hands of these Assistant Commissioners. They have been appointed hitherto by the Imperial Government; but it is proposed under this

Colonel Saunderson

Bill to transfer the appointment to the Irish Parliament. The Irish Parliament will represent the tenants alone. Under these circumstances, the landlords of Ireland believe, rightly or wrongly, that the Assistant Commissioners who are appointed by the representatives of the tenants will not be in a position to deal fairly in regard to the interests of the landlords. Further, it is contended on behalf of the landlords—and I do not think it can be denied by the Government—that practically it is, under the circumstances, an obligation of honour with the Government to secure fair play for the landlords. Among the collateral matters that are raised is a question in regard to proceedings under the Land Purchase Acts. I admit that I am myself unable to follow that argument or to feel that that is a matter which is of very deep concern to us. It is quite true that if the new Assistant Commissioners were at once to reduce rents throughout Ireland the persons who have purchased on the old basis—that is to say, at higher prices—would at once become extremely discontented, and there would be an agitation for the reduction of the instalments they now pay. Those instalments are payable to the British Government; and although we have the security of the Irish Legislature, it may be argued that to some extent our interests would be endangered if there were a general movement among the tenants for the reduction of their instalments. I agree, however, that that is rather a distant point, and I do not propose to dwell upon it. Then there is the argument that hon. Members opposite had threatened the landlords of Ireland, and deliberately declared their intention, when they have the power, to use it to their disadvantage. My right hon. Friend the Chief Secretary met that by saying that the very strong and improper language which has been used, as far as that employed before 1881 was concerned, was, if not justified, at any rate caused by a real grievance. Well, Sir, I am not prepared to deny that; I entirely agree with my right hon. Friend—that is to say, I agree that there was a real grievance before 1881; and although that does not justify the language used, it should, to some extent, be taken into account in considering it. But that does not apply at all to the language used since 1881. In 1881 the Government of which I was a Member, under the guidance of my right hon. Friend the present Prime Minister, brought in a Bill—[Interruption.] Mr. Speaker, I feel it very difficult to proceed in consequence of the loud conversation that is going on on the Benches opposite.

MR. SPEAKER : Order, order !

MR. J. CHAMBERLAIN : The Government in 1881 brought in a Bill which was then declared on behalf of that Government to be a final settlement of the vexed question of what was a fair rent. Undoubtedly, if that be the case—and I think it will not be denied,—the excuse which is found for this violent language by the Chief Secretary cannot possibly apply to language which has been used since 1881. I do not want to refer to that language, because that is not, after all, the basis of the present contention, but there is no doubt that the language has followed precisely the same course since 1881 as it followed before that date. Up to the very last moment, even since the commencement of this present Session of Parliament, language has been used by prominent Irishmen in Ireland which distinctly pointed to a re-opening of the question of fair rent. We cannot, therefore, doubt that it is the opinion of hon. Gentlemen opposite that the Courts which were appointed to settle fair rents have not satisfied the aspirations of the Irish people and have not satisfied the ideas of justice of hon. Members opposite. ["Hear, hear !"] Hon. Members from Ireland say "Hear, hear !" They also take that view. Their view is that no Court is a fair Court which does not give a decision of which they approve. They cannot dispute the fairness and impartiality of the Magistrates. [An hon. MEMBER : I do.] Oh, yes they do. Then they dispute the judgment of my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister, because the vast majority of the Judges were appointed by the Prime Minister. It is, therefore, the judgment of the Prime Minister and the fairness and impartiality of his appointment which his followers are now calling in question. Sir, I do not see how we can ever obtain finality in this matter if

hon. Members and those whom they represent refuse to accept the judicial tribunal appointed by the Government of which they are supporters as a fair tribunal. But I do not appeal to extreme and unreasonable persons like those who have interrupted me. I appeal to the Government and the Prime Minister, and I say that from their point of view they must accept and satisfy the decisions of the tribunal appointed by the Prime Minister in 1881. They must admit that the Assistant Commissioners have impartially performed the duty since then. Under these circumstances what excuse, what ground can my right hon. Friend give for transferring the appointment of these Commissioners to the new Irish Parliament? I could refer my right hon. Friend to a passage in one of his speeches in which, referring to the difficulties which were likely to arise from the continued unsettlement of the Land Question, he said that the old sentiments and opinions of the Irish people resulting from the experience of a long period of years were so much opposed to the existing state of things that they could not be expected not to take advantage of the power in order to—I am afraid of misquoting him, but the effect was this—in order to sustain their case where it differed from the position at present occupied by those whom they regarded as their hereditary foes—

QUESTIONS.

TRAGES ON INDIAN NATIVES.

MR. WEBB (Waterford) : I beg to call the Under Secretary of State for India to whether his attention has been called to a paragraph in India for this month, in which it is stated that a man named John Rugby kicked an Indian coolie to death, and was fined £10. Guard Price was accused of robbing the modesty of an Indian woman, and was acquitted, although the Judge trying the case admitted having charged the jury in one direction, that is, with a strong bias for the accused; and whether he will make inquiries into the circumstances of these cases?

THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR INDIA (Mr. G. RUSSELL, Bedford) : The Secretary of State has seen this paragraph. As regards the first case, he will make inquiry. As regards the second, he is informed that there is no ground on which the decision of the Court can be questioned.

UPPER THAMES CONSERVATORS.

MR. H. L. W. LAWSON (Gloucester, Gloucester) : I beg to ask the President of the Board of Trade whether his attention has been called to a statement that one-third of the number of electors of the Commissioners who elect the four representatives of the Upper Thames on the Board of Conservators are either ignorant or incapable of identification; and whether in the town of Maidenhead out of a population of 10,000 only 43 are voters; whether he is aware the Clerk to the Conservancy Board alleges that he has no power to strike off the names of dead persons from the register; whether, under the Act of 1866, it is his duty to make up the register of those entitled to vote and constituted Commissioners under the Act of 1795; if not, who is responsible; and whether he proposes to make any change in the administration of the Act in this respect?

MR. L. XVI. [FOURTH SERIES.]

THE PRESIDENT OF THE BOARD OF TRADE (Mr. MUNDELLA, Sheffield, Brightside) : I was not aware of the statements referred to in the first two paragraphs of the question. Under the Thames Navigation Act, 1866, the Secretary to the Conservators makes out a list of persons entitled to vote, which is revised by the Board of Trade, who remove names of persons known by them to be dead or disqualified. It is obvious that any removal must be made with caution. The whole question of the constitution of the Thames Conservancy Board will be dealt with next Session, in compliance with the clause of the Bill on the subject now before Parliament.

LIGHTS ON THE PORTUGUESE COAST.

MR. BEITH (Inverness, &c.) : I beg to ask the President of the Board of Trade, with a view to the safety of British shipping on the coast of Portugal, what steps, if any, have been taken to give effect to the recommendation of the Court of Inquiry on the loss of the steamship Roumania in October last, near Peniche, Portugal—

“That the Burling’s Light should be altered to a quick flashing light of equal power to the present light”?

MR. MUNDELLA : The Report of the Court of Inquiry referred to by the hon. Member was communicated by the Board of Trade through the Foreign Office to the Portuguese Government, who have stated their intention of improving the light on Burling’s Island.

TYPHOID FEVER AT AUCHINTIBBER.

SIR C. CAMERON (Glasgow, College) : I beg to ask the Secretary for Scotland whether his attention has been called to the threatened eviction of 18 households at Auchintibber, Lanarkshire, in consequence of an outbreak of typhoid fever in the village, attributed to a contaminated water supply; whether any steps have been taken by the Sanitary Authority to provide a pure supply; whether the eviction proceedings have been taken at the instance of the Sanitary Authority, or at that of the proprietor of the houses; and whether the Board of Supervision have had their attention directed to the epidemic and its cause?

THE SECRETARY FOR SCOTLAND (Sir G. TREVELYAN, Glasgow, Bridgeton) : In reply to the hon. Member, the attention of the Board of Supervision was called to the outbreak of enteric fever which took place at Clyde Rows, Auchintibber, in October last, in consequence of an impure water supply, by the Annual Report of the Medical Officer. The Local Authority, in the due performance of their duty, obtained a decree from the Sheriff ordaining the proprietor to introduce a pure supply. It appears, however, that pure water is not to be had in the locality, and the proprietor has accordingly decided to close the houses, and served the necessary notices on the occupiers to quit. The Local Authority are making every effort to improve the sanitary condition of their district, and have undertaken a very extensive and costly scheme to supply the whole of the Middle Ward of Lanarkshire with an abundance of pure water. These works are in progress under the Lanarkshire Water Act, 1892; and when completed no district in Great Britain will be better provided for.

SIR C. CAMERON: But could not a temporary water supply have been provided for these unfortunate people? Was it necessary to resort to this harsh measure?

SIR G. TREVELYAN: I cannot profess to answer that question. The only Body with authority to interfere is, I conceive, the Local Authority, which might cease to press the proprietor. I will communicate with the Board of Supervision to see if anything can be done.

ANSTRUTHER UNION HARBOUR.

MR. ANSTRUTHER (St. Andrews, &c.): I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury whether his attention has been drawn to the Report of Messrs. Stevenson, Engineers to the Fishery Board for Scotland, contained in Appendix L., No. 1, of the Eleventh Annual Report of the Fishery Board for Scotland, 1892, in which Messrs. Stevenson state, with reference to Anstruther Union Harbour, if these large boats are to prosecute the fishings with advantage they must be able to enter and leave the harbour at nearly all states of the tide, and this object can only be attained by the construction of breakwaters outside the present entrance; and whether the Commissioners of Her Majesty's Treasury will reconsider their refusal, in reply to a

Sir G. Trevelyan

Memorial of the Commissioners of this harbour, to make any grant for the purpose of these necessary improvements?

THE SECRETARY TO THE TREASURY (Sir J. T. HIBBERT, Oldham): I have seen the Report referred to. I am afraid that nothing has occurred to enable me to add to or modify the answer which I gave my hon. Friend on the 23rd February last. In that answer I explained carefully the reasons why, in the absence of any effort on the part of the locality chiefly interested to forward the scheme of improvement, the Treasury did not feel justified in adding to the large amount spent upon the harbour from moneys provided in one form or other by Parliament—namely, £80,000—for none of which has the State received any return.

MR. ANSTRUTHER: Will the Treasury give a favourable answer to the communication of the 27th July, in which the Harbour Board ask leave to apply to the works an unexpended balance in their hands of £300?

SIR J. T. HIBBERT: I will inquire. I have not seen the application.

AUSTRALIAN PAPER POSTAGE.

MR. HOGAN (Tipperary, Mid): I beg to ask the Postmaster General whether he is aware that a serious loss will be entailed upon the proprietors of the principal Australian weekly journals by the imposition of the new 2½d. rate of postage, which came into operation on 1st July; and whether it is possible under the existing law to allow Australian journals having publishing offices in London to be registered for circulation within the United Kingdom, so as to reap the benefit of the ordinary ½d. rate instead of being charged the present fee of 2½d; and, if not, whether he can hold out any hope of such an amendment of the law in that respect as will remedy the grievance referred to?

THE POSTMASTER GENERAL (Mr. A. MORLEY, Nottingham, E.): The charge of 2½d. referred to in the first part of the question is that made for a newspaper weighing from 8 to 10 ounces when sent from Australia to this country. The postage is the same as that payable on a newspaper of like weight sent hence to Australia. I have no knowledge how the decision of the Colonial Governments to adopt this rate will affect Australian newspaper publishers. As regards the second part of the question, I would refer the hon. Gentleman to the reply which I gave him on the 19th June last. I cannot see my way to recommend any such alteration of the law as the question suggests.

THE QUEENSTOWN MAIL SERVICE.

SIR T. ESMONDE (Kerry, W.): I beg to ask the Postmaster General if he has considered the question of the future contract for the carriage of the mails from Queenstown to London, with a view to ascertaining whether a more expeditious service can be obtained?

MR. A. MORLEY: I understand the hon. Member's question to refer particularly to the contract for the Mail Packet Service between Kingstown and Holyhead. That contract has yet two years to run, so that the time for considering the future contract has not arrived. When it does arrive the whole question shall receive very careful consideration.

MR. SEXTON (Kerry, N.): Has the right hon. Gentleman considered the suggestions made to him the other day by a deputation of hon. Members as to the special service from Queenstown to London; and, if so, at what conclusion has he arrived as to such a service when the mail packets arrive too late for the ordinary service?

MR. A. MORLEY: That hardly arises upon the question on the Paper. The matter is, however, having my careful consideration.

THE GOVERNORSHIP OF SOUTH AUSTRALIA.

MR. HOGAN: I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies whether he can now communicate the decision at which Her Majesty's Government have arrived in the matter of the application of the South Australian Government that Chief Justice Wray should, on the departure of the Earl of Kintore, act as Governor for an indefinite period?

THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE COLONIES (Mr. S. BUXTON, Tower Hamlets, Poplar): In reply to the hon. Member's question,

I can only say that we are awaiting a further communication from the Colony on the subject.

THE TAXATION OF HINDU TEMPLES.

MR. SNAPE (Lancashire, S.E., Heywood): In the absence of my hon. Friend the Member for East Bradford, I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for India if the Secretary of State for India is aware that the Notification, No. 927A, of 8th April, 1893, issued by the Government of the North-West Provinces, still leaves the Municipality of Benares the power to tax certain Hindu temples for local rates; is the Secretary of State aware that Clause 1 of Section 63 of Act IV. of 1884, passed by the Madras Government, defines the law with respect to the rating of temples; that since that date the various Administrations have all passed Acts and Resolutions in conformity with the Madras Act; and that, in consequence, the temples of every city in India are exempted from taxation, except the City of Benares; and will the Secretary of State direct the Government of the North-West Provinces to make the practice of the Municipality of Benares agree with the principles of the Madras Act and with the practice of the rest of India?

*MR. G. RUSSELL: The Secretary of State for India has not seen the Order or Notification, issued by the Government of the North-West Provinces, which my hon. Friend quotes. The Report, which was called for in conformity with the answer I gave to his question on the same subject on the 25th April last, has not yet been received from India. A telegram has been sent requesting them to accelerate their Report. The Madras District Municipalities Act of 1884 does, as stated in the question, exempt places set apart for public worship, among other exemptions, from the municipal tax on buildings and lands. So, also, does the Bengal Municipalities Act. But, so far as the Secretary of State is aware, neither the Punjab Municipalities Act, nor the Burma Act, nor the Central Provinces Act contains such an exemption. In all these Acts the Municipal Commissioners, the majority of whom are chosen by the ratepayers, have power "to define the persons or property to be taxed." The Secretary of State does not propose to issue any Orders in the matter until he receives the Report which he has requested the Government of India to submit. The matter is one on which parties interested might suitably cause a question to be asked in the Local Legislative Council.

ALLEGED PLOT TO BLOW UP THE HYDERABAD RESIDENCY.

MR. SEYMOUR KEAY (Elgin and Nairn): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for India whether he is aware that a person named Jawad Hussain has been arrested in Hyderabad, Deccan, on a charge of plotting to murder the British Resident, Mr. Plowden, or to blow up the Residency with dynamite; and that the arrest is stated to have been in consequence of the production to the Nizam by Mr. Plowden of a letter purporting to warn him that such a plot existed; whether there is any ground to believe in the existence of such a plot; and, if so, are any other persons stated to be implicated in it; what was the cause of the banishment from Hyderabad, on 15th ultimo, of the Political and Financial Secretary, the Nawab Mohsin-ul-Mulk, Mehdi Ali; and, having regard to the circumstance that similar designs on Mr. Plowden's life when he was Resident at the Court of the Ruler of Cashmere were attributed to that Ruler, and were without inquiry afterwards put forward as one of the causes officially assigned for his deposition, Her Majesty's Government will direct that a full and careful inquiry be made by some independent authority into the facts connected with the alleged plot, so as to insure that no injustice is done to the Nizam's Government?

MR. G. RUSSELL: The Secretary of State has seen a newspaper statement that Mr. Plowden had received the anonymous letter referred to by my hon. Friend. He has not received any information from the Government of India on the subject, nor as to the banishment of Mehdi Ali. He has, however, telegraphed for information on the subject.

THE DIRECTOR GENERAL OF INDIAN RAILWAYS.

SIR R. TEMPLE (Surrey, Kingston): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for India whether it is a fact that it is proposed to appoint to the post of

Mr. G. Russell

Director General of Railways in India Colonel Bissett, R.E., the agent of, and largely interested in, the Guaranteed Bombay, Baroda, and Central Indian Railway; whether Colonel Bissett's appointment, if confirmed, will interfere with the prospects of officers who have served continuously in the Department of Public Works, Colonel Bissett having been absent from that Department eight years; whether the claims of other officers of approximately the same standing in the Public Works Department have received due consideration; and whether, in the interest of the Indian Government and of its servants receiving just and adequate consideration in regard to such high appointments, the Secretary of State has considered the advisability of appointing a Public Works Department Officer as Public Works Member of the Viceroy's Council?

*MR. G. RUSSELL: The Secretary of State has received no communication from the Government of India as to the appointment of Colonel Bissett to the post of Director General of Railways in India; and, therefore, I am not in a position to answer the hon. Baronet's questions. The appointment of a special Public Works Member of the Viceroy's Council is not considered necessary or desirable at the present time.

THE INDIAN OPIUM COMMISSION.

SIR J. GORST (Cambridge University): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for India whether several persons have already been invited by Her Majesty's Government, and have accepted the invitation, to become Members of the Indian Opium Commission; what is the estimated cost of the Commission; whether the Indian Council have yet consented to the cost being defrayed out of the Revenues of India; and whether the assent of the Indian Council to the proposed expenditure has been taken for granted, or whether, in the event of their refusal, Her Majesty's Government have any alternative source of supply in view?

*MR. G. RUSSELL: No appointments have yet been made to the Royal Commission on Opium; but the Secretary of State has taken steps to ascertain whether certain gentlemen would be willing to serve on it if appointed. The arrangements are not yet sufficiently advanced to allow of any estimate being formed as to the cost; but it will, no doubt, be large. The Council of India have not consented to this charge being defrayed from Indian Revenues, nor has any proposal on the subject been placed before them. In no case can their assent be taken for granted; but as yet Her Majesty's Government have come to no decision as to the source from which this expenditure should be met.

SIR J. GORST: I understood the Government stated the other day, in answer to a question, that they had come to the conclusion that the expense should be defrayed out of the Revenues of India. Now, the hon. Gentleman says this matter is still under consideration. What is the position of affairs?

MR. G. RUSSELL: I have not had an opportunity of speaking to the Secretary of State on the subject; but I believe my right hon. Friend will find that I am correct in saying that no final decision has been arrived at, and that the matter is still the subject of correspondence between the Secretary of State and the Government of India.

DUBLIN UNIVERSITY.

MR. A. O'CONNOR (Donegal, E.): I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury if he can now state whether he will cause investigation to be made as to the estates which are liable under the 219th section of the Act of Settlement for the maintenance of a second College in the University of Dublin?

*SIR J. T. HIBBERT: Some information as to the estates which are liable under the 219th section of the Act of Settlement for the maintenance of a second College in the University of Dublin may be obtained at the Public Record Office, Dublin. Such of the proceedings of the Commissioners under the Act of Settlement as are extant are at the Public Record Office in Dublin, and there are two series of rentals at the same office containing the quit rents which were imposed on the estates dealt with by the Act of Settlement—one of which series of rentals is dated 1692, the other 1706. The Government cannot undertake any investigation on the subject.

LONDON COUNTY COUNCIL (GENERAL POWERS) BILL.

MR. H. L. W. LAWSON: I beg to ask the President of the Local Government Board whether it is proposed, by agreement with the House of Lords on the London County Council (General Powers) Bill, to give the County Councils of Essex, Surrey, Middlesex, and Kent representatives on the Thames Conservancy Board; and whether, if this be so, he will consider the expediency of giving some representation to the other riparian Counties of Bucks, Berks, Gloucester, Oxon, and Wilts by the same method?

*THE PRESIDENT OF THE LOCAL GOVERNMENT BOARD (Mr. H. H. FOWLER, Wolverhampton, E.): My hon. Friend is probably not aware of what passed in the House on Friday last in reference to this question.

RECRUITING IN THE ARMY.

MAJOR RASCH (Essex, S.E.): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for War whether, in view of the serious falling-off in recruiting during the last six months, he will carry out the suggestions of the Wantage Committee in the direction of abolition of stoppages, free kit, and 1s. per day (as advertised), and give additional Government assistance in the employment of reserve and discharged soldiers?

*THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR WAR (Mr. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN, Stirling, &c.): I have already stated, in reply to a question, what is the amount of the partial falling-off in the number of recruits enlisted, and also what is its principal cause; and I intimated in the discussions on Army Estimates how far Her Majesty's Government is prepared to go in carrying out the recommendations of the Committee over which Lord Wantage presided. Of the special points referred to in the question, changes have been sanctioned in regard to the clothing of the soldier, and further assistance has been afforded to the Society for Procuring Employment for Discharged Soldiers.

THE CONGESTED DISTRICTS BOARD (IRELAND).

SIR T. ESMONDE: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland if he can state when the Return relative to the Congested Districts Board (Ireland) will be laid upon the Table of the House?

THE CHIEF SECRETARY FOR IRELAND (Mr. J. MORLEY, Newcastle-upon-Tyne): It is hoped that the Return will be presented to Parliament by the end of this month.

ARSON IN COUNTY FERMANAGH.

MR. DANE (Fermanagh, S.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether he is aware that upon the night of the 1st August a large quantity of turf built in two stacks upon the lands of Cornahitta, near Belleek, in the County Fermanagh, the property of Patrick Keown, was maliciously destroyed by fire; whether he is aware that on the 21st July an article was published in The Donegal Vindicator calling upon the Towra Branch of the National Federation to deal with the person who had built a wall upon a farm from which a man named Henry M'Laughlin had been evicted many years ago, Patrick Keown being the person who had built such wall; has any person been made amenable; whether he is aware that in the same newspaper an article was published instigating attacks upon the Protestant people attending the gospel mission services at Bundoran; and will the Government take steps to punish the past and prohibit the future instigation of outrages by newspapers?

MR. J. MORLEY: It is a fact that on the 1st instant 49 horseloads of turf, the property of Patrick Keown, were maliciously destroyed by fire. No person has yet been made amenable in respect of this outrage. With regard to the particular newspaper publications referred to, I am advised that though they are open to considerable censure, yet the Criminal Law has not been violated, and that it would be impossible to establish in a Court of Law any connection between the publications and the acts complained of.

MR. M. J. KENNY (Tyrone, Mid): Is the right hon. Gentleman aware that the editor and proprietor of this paper is a Protestant?

MR. J. MORLEY: I have no information on that point.

Sir T. Esmonde

THE ROCHESTER MAGISTRACY.

VISCOUNT CRANBORNE (Rochester): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether there were more than two vacancies on the Bench of the City of Rochester; and, if not, was there a difficulty in finding sufficient Magistrates to do the work; would he explain why the Lord Chancellor has recently appointed five new Magistrates, four of whom are supporters of the present Government and only one a Conservative; and what means he took to discover the fitness of these gentlemen for the position of Magistrates?

THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE HOME DEPARTMENT (Mr. ASQUITH, Fife, E.): The Lord Chancellor is not aware what is meant by "vacancies on the Bench." It has never been the practice of the Lord Chancellors to consider that each Bench is only entitled to a fixed number of Magistrates. The opponents of the present Government on the existing Bench were in a large majority; and, notwithstanding the recent appointments, the Lord Chancellor believes that the supporters of the Government are still in a minority. The Lord Chancellor made full and ample inquiry in the same manner as he believes has been usually made by his predecessors, and he satisfied himself as to the fitness of the persons appointed.

VISCOUNT CRANBORNE: But does the Lord Chancellor, in determining these appointments, only consider the relative proportion of Parties on the Bench?

MR. ASQUITH: No, Sir; the Lord Chancellor considers a number of other things.

THE CARDIGANSHIRE INTERMEDIATE EDUCATION SCHEME.

VISCOUNT CRANBORNE: I beg to ask the Vice President of the Committee of Council on Education whether he is aware that under the Cardiganshire Scheme of Intermediate Education boys who may obtain County Scholarships in the Lampeter and Tregarou District are debarred from holding those Scholarships at the school of St. David's College, the only school in the district; also that the School Board of Lampeter passed a resolution condemning the proposal of the joint County Education Committee to exclude St. David's School; on what grounds as Vice President has he struck out of Clause 84 of the Scheme prepared by the Charity Commissioners the words which would have placed the school of St. David's College on the same footing as the county schools; and whether he will reconsider his decision?

THE VICE PRESIDENT OF THE COUNCIL (Mr. ACLAND, York, W.R., Rotherham): As the facts of the case are not quite correctly stated in the question, it may be as well that I should state what the facts are. Two alternative Schemes for the County of Cardigan were submitted—one drawn up by the Charity Commissioners, and the other by the joint Education Committee of the county. The scheme approved was the latter of the two, and no words were struck out of it. The former Scheme, however, did not, any more than the latter, contain words which would have placed St. David's College School on the same footing as the County School. Under either Scheme County Scholarships would not have been tenable at that school, as it is not a school governed by a Scheme under the Endowed Schools Act. The School Board of Lampeter recently passed a resolution to the effect stated in the question; but this was after the Scheme had been approved by the Department.

THE IRISH WOMEN'S PETITION AGAINST HOME RULE.

MR. ROSS (Londonderry): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he has refused to receive a deputation of Irish ladies, who proposed to place in his hands a Memorial to be forwarded to the Queen, addressed to Her Majesty, protesting against the Home Rule Bill, and signed by over 100,000 Irish women; and has he any objection to receive the Memorial and to forward it to Her Majesty?

MR. ASQUITH: I stated a week ago to the promoters of the Petition that if they would send it to the Home Office I should be happy to lay it before Her Majesty. The Petition has now arrived at the Home Office, and as soon as the physical difficulties of transporting the structure in which it is enclosed can be surmounted it will be forwarded to the Queen. It is true that I refused to receive a deputation from the signatories. It would be altogether contrary to practice, and would establish an inconvenient precedent, if the Secretary of State were to receive deputations in connection with the presentation of political addresses to the Queen.

MR. FLYNN (Cork, N.): I should like to ask, with regard to this Petition, how many of the signatures belong to female servants, how many to school girls, and how many to children who cannot write?

MR. ASQUITH: I have seen the Petition, and it would be a work of great time and labour to examine into the signatures.

IRISH PUBLIC WORKS.

MR. MACARTNEY (Antrim, S.): I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury when the Report of the Commissioners of Public Works in Ireland for 1892-3 will be circulated?

SIR J. T. HIBBERT: The Report will probably be circulated on Wednesday afternoon.

"HUGHES v. VERNON."

MR. STANLEY LEIGHTON (Shropshire, Oswestry): I beg to ask the Vice President of the Committee of Council on Education whether he has read the report of a trial at Chester in the case of "Hughes v. Vernon and others," in which the Judge characterised the proceedings of the Senate of the University College of Bangor in an inquiry into the conduct of the Lady Principal of a hostel as a travesty of justice, and from which it appears that the Council of the University College without investigation acted on the finding of the Senate, and withdrew from Miss Hughes her licence to keep a hall, although the Directors of the hall supported Miss Hughes; and whether, under these circumstances, he will cause an impartial inquiry to be made before he applies to Parliament for a grant of £4,000 for the support of the College?

MR. ACLAND: I have seen in The Times the report of this case, which was an action for libel brought by Miss Hughes against the proprietors of The Weekly Despatch. I do not there find the remarks attributed to the learned Judge; but the report is brief, and I have no reason to doubt the accuracy of the hon. Member's statement. The question at issue seems to be a matter of internal discipline ; and, quite independently of this trial, it does not appear to me that the fact that the College receives a Treasury grant of £4,000 provides any justification for a Government inquiry in this case.

SWEATING IN GOVERNMENT FACTORIES.

MR. MACDONALD (Tower Hamlets, Bow) : I beg to ask the Financial Secretary to the War Office whether the representations made to the War Department with reference to sub-contracting and sweating in the London Small Arms Factory at Bow have been examined ; and, if so, with what result ?

THE FINANCIAL SECRETARY TO THE WAR OFFICE (MR. WOODALL, Hanley) : In consequence of the representations made by my hon. Friend, a careful inquiry has been personally instituted by the Director of Contracts, who was met in a most amicable spirit by the Directors and Managers of the company. Partly on their own initiative, and partly in deference to his suggestions, changes have been made which it may be hoped will fairly obviate the causes of complaint. It has been determined that all piece-work rates for components shall be fixed and recorded at the office, and that wages shall be paid to every man and boy employed directly by the company's cashier instead of through intermediary contractors.

MR. J. BURNS (Battersea) : Will the prices to be paid be posted up in the workshops and room where the men and boys work ?

MR. WOODALL : An undertaking has been given that the prices to which the men and boys are entitled shall be placed in such a position as to make them accessible to every person concerned.

TRESPASSING ON AN EVICTED FARM AT STROKESTOWN.

MR. HAYDEN (Roscommon, S.) : I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether he is aware that Mrs. Senahan, of Boorfield, Strokestown, was prosecuted at the Petty Sessions, on 29th June, for retaking possession of the holding from which she was evicted, that the Magistrates dismissed the case, legal possession not having been obtained by the party who took the land, and that a fresh summons was issued and heard on 27th July, when a penalty was inflicted ; and will he state on what grounds a conviction was obtained on the second hearing of the case which had been previously dismissed ?

MR. J. MORLEY : I am informed that the woman referred to was prosecuted by the new tenant for wilful trespass, and that the case was dismissed on the first date mentioned, because formal proof of legal possession by the tenant was not forthcoming. Proof of the kind was afterwards given, and on the second occasion a conviction was obtained.

SHORT HOURS IN GOVERNMENT FACTORIES.

MR. J. BURNS : I beg to ask the Secretary of State for War whether he is now prepared to announce if any further steps have been taken, by reducing the working hours or otherwise, with a view of averting the threatened reduction in the number of workmen employed in the Government arsenals ?

MR. WOODALL : As I have already stated, in reply to the hon. Member for West Islington (Mr. Lough), the small arms factory at Enfield is closed on Saturdays. I have now to add that with the view of endeavouring to avert a discharge of workmen that would otherwise be rendered necessary in the cartridge factory at Woolwich, owing to the falling-off of work, it has been determined that the hands employed there shall be put on shorter hours.

MR. J. BURNS : May I appeal to the Secretary of State to see that the minimum wage of 19s. recently conceded to labourers is not interfered with ?

MR. WOODALL : The Government is extremely anxious to act with the fullest consideration to all the persons employed under the War Department, and particularly so in the case of men whose minimum rate of wages is 19s. per week. We shall try to find employment for such as are unable to get it on their spare day. I hope the hon. Member will be satisfied with that general assurance.

SIR J. GORST : I beg to give notice that on the Dockyard Vote I will ask the Secretary of State for War to give a detailed account of the measures taken by the Government in order to give effect to the Resolution passed earlier in the Session.

GOVERNMENT CONTRACTS FOR WAR-LIKE STORES.

MR. HANBURY (Preston): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for War whether it is the practice of the War Office to make contracts for the supply of shells and other warlike stores with middlemen instead of with the actual manufacturers; whether his attention has been called to the action in the Queen's Bench Division, in which the British Munitions Company alleged that they had contracts with the Government to supply them with shells, and that they sub-contracted with the Simonds Steel and Iron Forging Company to supply them with 40,000 shells, and that the articles supplied would not stand the Government tests; what is the amount of the contract with the British Munitions Company; and when was the contract made?

MR. WOODALL: It is the practice of the War Department to make contracts for shells and other warlike stores with the actual manufacturers whenever possible, and not with middlemen. The contract with the British Munitions Company was made in 1887 for £35,000 worth of made-up cartridges, of which the shell formed only a component part. The Department cannot, in all such composite cases, object to the contractors obtaining from other manufacturers a portion of the material required in the execution of the contract.

MR. HANBURY: But the whole of the shells were practically got from another firm. Why did the Government not go direct to the manufacturers? The hon. Gentleman speaks of the contract as being of the date 1887. I think that was with a totally different firm, or is it the same firm under another name?

*MR. WOODALL: I am unable to answer the last part of the question without notice. I may say that the severe system of inspection was applied to the shells made by the sub-contractor as well as to all other components.

THE POLICE AND PUBLIC MEETINGS IN IRELAND.

DR. TANNER (Cork Co., Mid): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland if he is aware that, on Sunday the 6th of August, a large body of police were drafted from Bandon, Macroom, and Millstreet, to prevent a public meeting of the inhabitants of Kilcorney, County Cork, being held to express their disapproval of the eviction of Mr. David Leader by Mr. Collins, of Prospect, Cork; and whether he is aware of the fact that Mr. Leader has been evicted in consequence of his inability to pay the arrears of rent in full, and that he has repeatedly offered to submit his claims to arbitration?

MR. FLYNN: At the same time, I will ask the right hon. Gentleman whether his attention has been called to the action of District Inspector Bonass (R. I. C.), in calling upon Rev. Mr. O'Keefe, Banteer, on Saturday, 5th instant, to inform him that a meeting intended to be held on the following day would be dispersed by force; is he aware that the meeting was called to protest against an eviction in the neighbourhood; and whether it lies in the power of an Executive officer to proclaim or disperse a legal meeting and conducted in a proper manner?

MR. J. MORLEY: In reference to this question, I am informed that a force of police to the number of 44 assembled in the locality mentioned to prevent a meeting in the immediate neighbourhood of the farm from which Mr. Leader has been evicted. The object of the meeting is correctly stated; but, as it appeared to be the intention to hold it beside the evicted farm, which is in charge of two caretakers, it was thought that the meeting would lead to intimidation if held at this spot, and in consequence it was intimated to the promoters that no meeting would be permitted there. With regard to the last paragraph of the question of the hon. Member for Mid Cork, I understand that Mr. Leader was evicted for non-payment of arrears of rent amounting to £258. It is a fact, I am informed, that he is willing to leave his case to arbitration; but I am not in a position to speak as to his ability or inability to pay the arrears in full.

MR. FLYNN: The right hon. Gentleman has not answered the last part of my question. I will ask him to do so, and also, for the sake of public convenience, will he state what rule governs the conduct of the authorities with regard to those meetings; and what makes a meeting which would otherwise be legal illegal if held in the immediate vicinity of an evicted farm?

MR. J. MORLEY: It is not within the power of an Executive officer to proclaim or disperse a legal meeting conducted in a proper manner; but one of the objects of the meeting in this case, as announced in the church by the officiating clergyman, was to hold up to public odium those who were responsible for the eviction of Mr. Leader, the tenant. That announcement naturally gave colour to the object of the meeting. The hon. Member asks what our rule in these cases is. My rule is that if a meeting is likely to lead to unlawful action directly by reason of its proximity to an evicted farm the police have orders to prevent such a meeting.

MR. W. JOHNSTON (Belfast, S.): Was it in consequence of the altar denunciation by the priest that the right hon. Gentleman has put down this meeting?

MR. J. MORLEY: No; not at all. I do not know that there was any altar denunciation. But what was said, and other circumstances, led the authorities on the spot to suppose that it would have, and was meant to have, an intimidatory effect. The meeting being announced to be held close to or upon the evicted farm—I forget which—the Executive officer very properly said it would not be allowed.

MR. SEXTON (Kerry, N.): May I ask whether in cases of this kind the information of the danger apprehended is on oath or is it an ordinary Police Report? Do the Central Government act in each case, or are the instructions to the police general?

MR. J. MORLEY: The instructions to the police are not general. They are given by the Central Authority almost in each case, and in each case wherever time allows. The information is not on oath, and could not be so, because in all cases it is, after all, a constructive inference, formed by those who have full knowledge and information of all the local circumstances.

MR. FLYNN: The constructive inference is exactly where the danger comes in. For the sake of future convenience, may I ask what regulations the authorities have laid down with regard to a public meeting which the promoters believe to be legal, and at which no language of an unlawful or intimidatory character is intended to be used?

MR. J. MORLEY: The authorities must judge in each case. No general rule can be laid down. The authorities must judge of every case, as it is for this that an Executive Government exists.

MR. DODD (Essex, Maldon): Is the law with respect to such matters in any way different in Ireland to what it is in England?

MR. J. MORLEY: I fancy not, but I cannot say for certain.

INCOME TAX COMMISSIONERS IN THE ISLE OF THANET.

MR. BENN (Tower Hamlets, St. George's): I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury whether he is aware that in the Margate District, Isle of Thanet, out of 24 Commissioners of Property and Income Tax (General Purposes for Inhabited House Duty) and Land Tax, 22 are Conservatives and one Liberal Unionist; and whether he can take any steps to remedy this exclusion of those holding Liberal views?

SIR J. T. HIBBERT: The Income Tax Commissioners are appointed by the Land Tax Commissioners, who are appointed by Act of Parliament. The hon. Member will, therefore, see that I have no power in the matter. I have no information as to the politics of the Commissioners for the Margate District.

MR. BARTLEY: May I ask on what authority it is stated that these gentlemen belong to a particular political Party? Is there any Return or published information upon which these statements can be based?

SIR J. T. HIBBERT: I think it is very easy to ascertain the politics of any person.

REPORTS ON IRISH FISHERIES.

MR. BODKIN (Roscommon, N.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether he has observed that the Annual Report of the Inspectors of Irish Fisheries lately presented to Parliament, so far as one important branch of sea fishing is concerned, deals only with the year 1892, though the spring mackerel fishing of 1893 had passed before it was prepared or presented; whether it would be possible for the Inspectors to make a Report at the end of each mackerel fishing season, showing results of season immediately preceding, so that the owners of the fishing vessels and fishermen generally might be able to gain some information where they would be most likely to obtain profitable results during the ensuing season; whether he is aware that such Reports were made during the last years of Sir Thomas Brady's tenure of office, and proved most serviceable to the fishing interest; and for what reason have they been discontinued by his successor, Mr. Cecil Roche?

MR. J. MORLEY: The late spring mackerel fishing had not quite passed when the Annual Report of the Inspectors was presented to Parliament. Special Reports on the spring mackerel fishing seasons of 1890 and 1891 were prepared by the Inspectors of Fisheries, of whom Sir Thomas Brady was one, and the Inspectors have now in hand a Report on the spring fishing season of 1893, which will be issued with the least possible delay.

MR. BODKIN: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland how the statement, made at page 19 of the Report of Inspectors of Irish Fisheries, lately presented to Parliament, referring to the mackerel fishing at Arran Island, that "after all deductions, the prices realised by the fishermen averaged 24s. per 100," can be reconciled with the Schedule, at page 23, where the prices given as having been obtained from the buyers were 12s. to 24s. per 100; whether the deductions made were 14s. per 100 fish; whether the quantity of fish landed at this place was, as stated in the Schedule at page 23 of Report, 4,993 hundreds, which, at 24s. per 100, would give to each vessel employed at Arran during that season over £600; and whether it is the fact that any vessel received any such sum of money over and above all deductions?

MR. J. MORLEY: I understand that the figures in the Schedule at page 23 of the Report of Inspectors of Irish Fisheries, referring to the mackerel fishing at Arran Island—namely, 12s. to 24s. per 100, should have been simply 24s. per 100. The reduction made for expenses was about 14s. per 100. The quantity of fish landed at Arran was 4,993 boxes, equivalent, in round numbers, to about 300,000 fish—each box containing from 50 to 60 fish. It was not all sold at the same price, but in different quantities at different prices. None of the vessels received a sum of £600 over and above deductions in the spring of 1892. The net amount paid to each boat varied from £27 to £427, according to the length of time employed and the quantities of fish caught. The total earning of the several boats was £2,916, and this sum would yield an average price of about 24s. per box of 100 to 120 fish.

*MR. GIBSON BOWLES (Lynn Regis): Does the right hon. Gentleman mean to say the fish fetched 24s. per 100.

MR. J. MORLEY: 24s. a box of from 100 to 120.

MR. BODKIN: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland if he will grant the Return that stands on the Paper this day relating to Congested Districts Board (Fisheries)?

MR. J. MORLEY: It is suggested that the Return should be in the following form:—Return showing under the following heads the result of the spring mackerel fishery at Arran Island, County Galway, for the seasons 1892 and 1893, respectively:—(1.) Quantity of fish in hundreds taken by each vessel. (2.) Net amount paid to each vessel. (3.) Average price per 100 paid to each vessel. (4.) Gross amount the fish produced. If the hon. and learned Gentleman will move for the Return in this form it will be granted.

MR. BODKIN: I will move it in that form.

THE EVICTED TENANTS COMMISSION.

MR. BARTLEY (Islington, N.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether he can now inform the House whether the Government has decided to take any action on the Evicted Tenants Commission this Session?

MR. J. MORLEY: The Government are not yet able to state their intentions on this matter. They cannot make any announcement until further progress has been made with the Government of Ireland Bill.

THE FACTORY AND WORKSHOPS ACT IN LONDON.

MR. J. ROWLANDS (Finsbury, E.): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether he is aware that, as reported in The Star of 10th August, Mr. De Rutzen, one of the Metropolitan Magistrates, is going to hear again some summonses, under the Factory and Workshops Acts, previously dismissed by him; whether the summonses referred to are those against the decision on which notice of appeal was given by Her Majesty's Superintending Inspector of Workshops, Mr. Lakeman; whether those appeals have been withdrawn; and, if so, on what grounds; and whether the appeals against recent decisions by Mr. Plowden, another Metropolitan Magistrate, on other summonses under the same Acts, are to be proceeded with; and, if not, for what reason?

MR. ASQUITH: There were four cases before Mr. De Rutzen in which the summons was pronounced informal. I understand that fresh summonses are to be granted and the cases heard on their merits. There is no appeal in cases that are dismissed, but application may be made for a case to be stated on a point of law. In these four cases no such application was made. There were two cases before Mr. Plowden both dismissed, and in both a case was asked for. As to one of them, it was not thought a favourable case, and was dropped accordingly. As to the other case, I may refer to the answer I gave in this House on the 21st of last month.

VACANT EDUCATION EXAMINERSHIPS.

MR. KIMBER (Wandsworth): I beg to ask the Vice President of the Committee of Council on Education whether the clerks who applied for the vacant examinerships were barred on account of age; and whether the Department sets any limit of age as regards the promotion of clerks to be examiners?

MR. ACLAND: The clerks in question were not barred on account of age, and I am not aware that the Department sets any limit of age as regards such promotion.

THE MERIONETHSHIRE EDUCATION SCHEME.

MR. BARTLEY: I beg to ask the hon. Member for Merionethshire, as representing the Charity Commission, whether, as Clause 91, Sections B and C, in the Merionethshire Scheme, under the Welsh Intermediate Education Act, prohibits the user of the formularies of any particular denomination in the family worship of a hostel or boarding-house of a school connected with such denomination, and the teaching of the distinctive tenets of any particular denomination to boarders in any such hostel unless the County Governing Body so allow, he will state what arrangement is to be made for securing denominational religious instruction to those children who, as boarders, will spend the greater part of their school life in such hostels or boarding-houses?

*THE PARLIAMENTARY CHARITY COMMISSIONER (Mr. T. E. ELLIS, Merionethshire): The clause to which the hon. Member refers is drawn subject to the provisions of the section in the Endowed Schools Act of 1869, relating to religious instruction. The Scheme does not touch any school connected with any particular religious denomination. Clause 91 of the Scheme relates to a hostel or boarding-house forming part of the foundation of the school. The arrangement regarding special religious instruction for boarders is twofold. By Section C of the clause, the County Governing Body may make regulations enabling the person in charge of a hostel to give either by himself or by deputy religious instruction of a denominational character to boarders whose parents signify in writing a wish for such instruction. It is further expressly provided by Section A of Clause 91 that boarders shall be allowed to attend such places of worship and to have reasonable facilities for religious instruction from such religious teachers as their parents may choose for them.

SIR W. HART-DYKE (Kent, Dartford): Kindly give the clause in the Endowed Schools Act?

MR. T. E. ELLIS: Section 16 of the Endowed Schools Act, 1869.

MR. STANLEY LEIGHTON: May I ask if this power, which is given in Section 91 of the Merionethshire Scheme, was not proposed in the original Intermediate Education Act, and refused by Parliament?

*MR. T. E. ELLIS: We have done our best to read the Act of 1869 and the Welsh Act and to apply them to the circumstances of the county, and the best declaration we can make is the Scheme.

MR. BARTLEY : Supposing the Local Authority does not think proper to allow this religious instruction at these schools, is there any power under the Endowed Schools Act by which that may be remedied, or does it entirely depend upon the wish of the Local Authority whether these children shall be taught religion at all?

MR. T. E. ELLIS : No, Sir. Section 9 most distinctly states—

“That boarders shall be allowed to attend such places of worship and to have reasonable facilities for religious instruction from such religious teachers as their parents may choose for them.”

I think nothing more full and ample could be provided.

VISCOUNT CRANBORNE : Does not this only refer to day scholars, and not to boarders?

*MR. T. E. ELLIS : I cannot pass judgment upon the hon. Member's interpretation, but the section clearly refers to boarders.

THE POLICE AT THE ALBERT MEMORIAL.

MR. STERN (Suffolk, Stowmarket) : I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether the police who have to be on duty at the Albert Memorial during the night have no shelter provided for them, although the stations are fixed ones; and, if so, whether any arrangement can be made to provide shelter for them during the winter months?

MR. ASQUITH : By present arrangements there are no shelters provided for the police on fixed-point duty, but the subject is under the consideration of the Commissioner.

CUSTOMS OFFICERS' SALARIES.

MR. BYLES (York, W.R., Shipley) : I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury if he will explain why it is that, although by an Order of the 19th January last an increased minimum and maximum salary has been granted to the grade of Customs officers known as principal coast officers, and an allowance of £10 per annum to about 30 of those officers who are Registrars of Shipping, the increased salary has been paid from the date of the said Order, but the allowance to Registrars of Shipping has been paid only from the 1st of April, making a difference to those officers of nearly £2 each; and whether instructions will be given that the allowance may also be paid as from the 19th January?

*SIR J. T. HIBBERT : The reason why the increased salary and the allowance for registry work granted to principal coast officers took effect from different dates was that inquiry had to be made as to the amount of registry work performed, and this inquiry was not completed for some time, whereas no such inquiry was necessary in the case of the increased salary, and in the latter case immediate effect was given to the Treasury decision. I see no reason for giving instructions to the effect desired by the hon. Member.

WORK FOR THE UNEMPLOYED.

MR. KEIR HARDIE (West Ham, S.) : I beg to ask the President of the Local Government Board whether he can now state the extent of the powers possessed by Boards of Guardians for setting able-bodied destitute persons to work on land, and in a productive capacity, and paying them reasonable wages therefor; and whether such employment necessarily implies disfranchisement?

MR. H. H. FOWLER : I am not yet in a position to answer that question.

IRISH LOANS.

SIR J. GORST : I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury whether he will inform the House, in the form of a Return, or otherwise, what is the total amount of the loans comprised in Clause 14 of the Government of Ireland Bill; what are the Acts of Parliament under which they have been advanced; what is the average currency of such loans from the present time; and what is the average rate of interest payable thereon?

\*SIR J. T. HIBBERT : The loan statements which are to be found in the annual Finance Accounts give full details of the loans which would be comprised under Clause 14 of the Government of Ireland Bill, and the Acts under which the advances have been made. The currency of the loans in Ireland made by the Commissioners of Public Works and the Public Works Loan Commissioners varies considerably, but the most prevalent currency of such loans is 35 years. The amount of interest received in respect of these loans in 1892-3 was £265,137 on a total amount outstanding of £7,864,358, which would give an average rate of interest of about £3 7s. 6d. The Return moved for by the hon. Member for the South Division of Huntingdonshire (Mr. Smith-Barry), which will be immediately issued, will afford additional information respecting these loans. The loans made by the Irish Land Commissioners under what are called the "Ashbourne Acts" are, as the right hon. Member is aware, repayable in 49 years, with interest at the rate of  $3\frac{1}{2}$  per cent. per annum.

SIR J. GORST: Do the Ashbourne loans come within Clause 14?

*SIR J. T. HIBBERT: Yes.

DEFALCATIONS BY IRISH POOR RATE COLLECTORS

DR. COMMINS (Cork, S.E.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether his attention has been called to the recent defalcations on the part of several poor rate collectors in Ireland, particularly to the latest instance in the Union of Athlone, where the defalcations are alleged to amount to several hundred pounds; whether he is aware that facilities for such frauds are afforded by a system of issuing to the collectors separate blank receipts for each portion of a holding separately rated on the rate books in consequence of which two or more receipts are often issued in the name of the same tenant whose holding may be composed of parts under two or more separate ratings, thus enabling the collector by giving a single receipt for the whole amount paid by the tenant and returning the counterpart filled up for only that to which it applies to conceal his misappropriation of the difference; whether he is also aware that as a check on this kind of fraud the Guardians of some Unions directed the printing of lists of the ratepayers whose rates appeared unpaid according to the collectors' returns, and whether the Local Government Board Auditors disallowed the expense of printing such lists and so removed the check it imposed; and whether, in view of the fact that the defalcations alluded to have occurred chiefly since the withdrawal of that check or when it never existed, the Local Government Board will consider the question of permitting it under such restrictions or with such guarantees as would entitle the Guardians to use it as a privileged communication, or make such rules as to the issue of the blank receipts as would prevent their abuse in the manner indicated, and so as to obviate the facilities for embezzlement which the present system affords?

MR. J. MORLEY: The attention of the Local Government Board has been called to the increased number of poor rate collectors who have recently been guilty of misappropriating the rates, and the Board on the 4th instaut dismissed a collector who had embezzled the Union funds in Athlone and who appears to have adopted the system of fraud referred to in the question. The Board have frequently been obliged to threaten collectors with dismissal for failure to attend at the clerk's offices for the examination of their accounts, and they have also impressed on clerks and Boards of Guardians the necessity for a careful periodical examination of the collectors' books. The Local Government Board are of opinion that in many cases the defalcations result from the practice of allowing collectors to retain money in their hands which they admit having collected, but not lodged; and also, when a collector does become a defaulter, from the failure on the part of the Guardians to take energetic measures to recover the amount from the sureties. The Board of late have frequently had to interfere to press Boards of Guardians to take active steps in such cases. With regard to the latter portion of the question, the Board will consider whether it is possible to adopt additional precautions with the view of preventing fraud on the part of collectors.

DR. COMMINS: Has the additional precaution of prosecuting these defaulters ever been adopted by the Irish Local Government Board?

MR. J. MORLEY: I cannot say.

WORKING MEN'S DWELLINGS BILL.

MR. WRIGHTSON (Stockton-on-Tees): I beg to ask the President of the Local Government Board, with reference to the Working Men's Dwellings Bill, whether the Government, having accepted the principle of the Bill on its Second Reading, and having since then placed numerous Amendments on the Notice Paper for consideration in the Committee stage, and which have all been accepted by the promoters on the understanding that the Government undertook to help the passing of the measure this Session, are prepared to give now or later in the Session an opportunity for sufficient discussion to enable the Bill to pass the Committee stage?

MR. H. H. FOWLER: There is one correction I must make in this question to prevent any misunderstanding. The hon. Member says—

“Numerous Amendments on the Notice Paper for consideration in the Committee stage, and which have all been accepted by the promoters on the understanding that the Government undertook to help the passing of the measure this Session.”

The condition under which these Amendments were accepted was that if they were not accepted it would be the duty of the Government to oppose the measure. There was no promise whatever entered into that the Government would help the passage of the measure this Session. I am sorry to say I am not in a position to offer any facilities for the passage of this measure. The hon. Member must apply to the First Lord of the Treasury if he requires further information.

MR. WRIGHTSON: I beg to give notice that I will repeat the question.

THE FREE COINAGE OF SILVER.

MR. EVERETT (Suffolk, Woodbridge): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether he has observed that a Bill for the free coinage of silver at the ratio of 24 to 1 has just been introduced into the Senate of the United States: whether, as Her Majesty's Government are now aiming to fix that very ratio between gold in the sovereign and silver in the rupee in India, joint action between the two Governments would be possible, with a view to the re-establishing on a durable basis of a par of exchange between the two money metals of the world; and whether Her Majesty's Government will confer with the Government of the United States upon the matter to see whether united action is possible?

THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY (Mr. W. E. GLADSTONE, Edinburgh, Midlothian): The hon. Gentleman assumes that we may usefully enter into negotiations with the United States on account of the presentation of a certain Bill to the Senate of the United States. But the Bill in question in no way represents the policy of the United States Government, and is understood to be opposed to that policy. I rather think that my hon. Friend will see that it could not form, even if it were accepted and passed by the Government, a suitable opportunity for communication with the United States Government, setting apart any question whether there would be justifiable ground for such communication on the passing of such a Bill.

THE WOODYETT'S COLLIERY EXPLOSION.

MR. KEIR HARDIE: I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department, to whom I have given private notice of the question, whether a public inquiry will be granted in the case of the Woodyett's colliery explosion, whereby two men were killed and two injured; and whether, pending the inquiry, John Hamilton, who has been arrested in connection with the explosion, will be released?

MR. ASQUITH: Yes, Sir; I have ordered a public inquiry to be held in the case of the Woodyett's colliery explosion. With regard to the other part of the hon. Member's question, it had better be addressed to the Lord Advocate.

*MR. J. B. BALFOUR: When my right hon. Friend decided that a public inquiry should be held in regard to the explosion, I directed that the Procurator Fiscal should intimate to the law agent of John Hamilton that if he desired an adjournment of the trial, pending the public inquiry, this would be assented to on the part of the Crown, and that in the meantime Hamilton should be released from prison on such bail as he could find.

THE TAFF VALE RAILWAY ACCIDENT.

MR. EGERTON ALLEN (Pembroke, &c.) asked the President of the Board of Trade whether he had taken any steps to institute an inquiry into the Taff Vale Railway accident?

MR. MUNDELLA : Directly I heard of the deplorable disaster I gave orders for a public inquiry to be held. Major Marindin went down this morning to hold an inquiry on the spot.

VITU AND UGANDA.

MR. MACFARLANE (Argyll) : I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether he can give any account of the causes which have led to the second bombardment of Vitu, and why a number of British officers have been sent to Uganda?

*THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR FOREIGN AFFAIRS (Sir E. GREY, Northumberland, Berwick) : I have seen the reports in the newspapers with regard to the bombardment of Vitu, but we have had no information on the matter at the Foreign Office. With regard to sending additional officers to Uganda, it has been stated in the Press that they were sent to take charge of the country. That is not the case. They are sent to take charge of the Soudanese troops, without prejudice to the question of the future occupation of the country. In fact, we have not yet received any Report from Sir Gerald Portal as to the best method of dealing with the country.

GOVERNMENT OF IRELAND BILL.

CONSIDERATION. [SIXTH NIGHT.]

Order read, for resuming Adjourned Debate on Question [11th August], "That the Clause (Appointment of Land Commissioners,)—(Mr. Carson,)—proposed on Consideration, as amended, be read a second time."

Question again proposed.

Debate resumed.

MR. J. CHAMBERLAIN (Birmingham, W.) : When I was interrupted by the clock on Friday night I was endeavouring to point out that the question now before us is one of extreme simplicity. It is whether the Assistant Commissioners should be appointed in the future as in the past by the Imperial Government or whether they should be selected hereafter by the Irish Government. Now, Sir, these Assistant Commissioners stand in a very peculiar position, and I think it will be admitted that their functions are of a very delicate nature. They have to decide on the agrarian questions which arise between landlord and tenant—that is to say, they have to decide on a matter which has been the subject of the most strenuous controversy for a very long while past in Ireland; they have to decide between two parties who take almost antagonistic and opposite views, and it is of the utmost importance that their decision should command general respect and should be in itself just and fair. Up to the present time these Assistant Commissioners have been appointed by the Imperial Government, and I do not think that anyone can deny that they have discharged their very difficult duty of arbitrators between tenant and landlord with, on the whole, conspicuous success. [A NATIONALIST MEMBER : No!] Does anybody deny it? [A NATIONALIST MEMBER : Yes. Everybody in Ireland.] That will assist me materially in my argument. Nobody denies that these gentlemen have been appointed—the great majority of them—by the present Prime Minister.

MR. T. M. HEALY (Louth, N.) : Not one of the Head Commissioners.

MR. J. CHAMBERLAIN : I should have thought that hon. Members opposite would by this time know that they got no good by these rude interruptions. I say that a large number—I believe the majority of them—were appointed by my right hon. Friend. As to those, at any rate, who were appointed by my right hon. Friend, I imagine there will be no difference of opinion that he and his Government endeavoured to find fair and impartial men. No one will charge my right hon. Friend with any prejudice in favour of the landlords, or with being actuated by any prejudice at all in making a judicial appointment. When it comes to selecting persons for judicial appointments, I am glad to think that our Governments are never actuated by private prejudices. These Commissioners have been selected by the British Government as fair and impartial men. We are told, and I accept the statement, that their decisions have universally—not in one case alone; not only in the case of those who were appointed by the late Government—but have universally given dissatisfaction to hon. Members opposite. Although they are fair men, although, at all events, they were appointed as fair men, their decisions are considered by hon. Members opposite to have been unfair. That is rather an important admission. It is by hon. Gentlemen opposite under this Bill that these Commissioners will be appointed in future. I have shown that gentlemen opposite will be of necessity the representatives of the tenants—the representatives of one of the parties to this great suit. They are to have in future the selection of the Judges who will not be impartial in the sense in which we have hitherto used the word, but who must be selected because they share the views of hon. Members opposite. I think the Government will admit that this is entirely an exceptional case. We Unionists have very strong opinions about the appointments of Judges and Magistrates generally. We believe the Government would have done better to have followed more closely the precedent of the Provincial Legislatures of Canada, and have deprived the Irish Legislature of the power of appointment to Judicial offices at all. We are not, however, contesting the wisdom of their decision on that point now. But ordinary Judges have to deal not with one class of cases only, but with all classes of cases, and accordingly the vast majority of the cases are not governed by Party or class considerations, and therefore there is less fear, at any rate, that in regard to them the appointments will be of a questionable character. But we are now dealing with the case of a particular class of Judges, who have to decide a question on which there is a sharp difference of opinion between gentlemen opposite and those whom they represent, on the one hand, and ordinary public opinion in this country as represented by the present Government on the other. I will not put it higher than this. I am perfectly well aware that Irish landlords are not a popular class in this country. I will grant, for the sake of argument, that they are as bad as their worst enemies say. I will grant, if you please, that they are none of them good, but are all men of the stamp again and again described and denounced in this House. But even then, unless the last spark of fair play has died out in English breasts, you would not allow these men to be judged by Judges who had been actually chosen by their opponents. Even the worst criminals in this country have the right of challenging the jury if they think that any member of it is likely to be prejudiced in the matter which has to be adjudicated upon. In some cases they have even I will not say the right, but the privilege, of challenging the Judge. I remember a case a short time ago which happened at Bristol. It was in connection with the Bristol riots, and the Judge who was on the Rota to try the case either withdrew or it was suggested that he should withdraw, and another Judge was specially selected, because the first Judge had expressed some opinion upon the subject to be dealt with. So careful are we in this country that in the trial of any case the persons to be tried shall have an absolutely fair trial? That, I say, is a universal and invariable practice, and yet here in this case—I think by a lapse on the part of the Government; I do not believe they themselves have followed out the whole of the consequences of what they are doing—they propose to hand over the whole of the landlords of Ireland to Courts whose presiding officers will be chosen entirely by their opponents. I think I might absolutely rest the case here. I think even if I left it here every impartial hearer would admit that we had a very strong ground for appealing to the Government to accept this new clause. But we go really much further than that. This is not merely a case in which the Judge is to be appointed by one of the parties to the suit, but it is a case in which the Judge who will be appointed, and the persons who will appoint him have prejudged the case. Everyone of them will, before the trial comes on, have prejudged the case, and he will be prepared to decide it in a certain sense. This makes it perfectly monstrous, and carries the injustice further than has, I believe, been sanctioned by any responsible Government. We know perfectly well, when hon. Members opposite say that the decisions of these Assistant Commissioners have given universal dissatisfaction, what it is they mean. We know that the Nationalist Party and their representatives have held that the proper value of land in Ireland is either five years' purchase or the prairie value. Of course, any decision which is not based on that theory is in their view an unfair and unjust decision, and they are bound to take every means in their power of reverting to and obtaining a decision in the opposite sense. They have again and again attacked these very Judges for the decisions they have given. They have attacked the Government who have appointed them as impartial men because their decisions have not concurred with the opinions they have expressed as to the proper value of Irish land. Well, is it likely that when they have the power to select Judges, they will be satisfied to appoint men who may hold the same opinions as those whom they have already denounced? It is not certain that they will take care to put in these places men whom they can depend upon to give what they would call fair and just decisions? If you throw this duty upon them they are absolutely bound to fulfil it in the way I am suggesting, because the one thing they have promised the tenants on which they have laid the greatest stress and on which they have been advocating Home Rule is that if there were an Irish Government the tenants would obtain better terms than they are obtaining now. They will have to act upon that statement, or the tenants will say they have been deceived. There is only one way in which they can fulfil it, and there is not the slightest doubt that they will take advantage of the opportunity the Government give them to see that the Commissioners shall be selected from the men who hold the extreme view of the value of Irish land—a value which I am perfectly certain is not shared by any Member of the present Government. This is not a case in which the “angelic theory” will serve. I am not making any charge against hon. Members opposite; I am not throwing upon them any imputations of unfair or improper dealing. If they honestly believe that Irish land is only worth the prairie value, they are bound to give effect to their honest conviction, and nobody can blame them. But I appeal to the Government will they have redeemed their pledges if, as a direct consequence of their action, landlords throughout Ireland are forced either to accept the prairie value of their land or to fly for their lives? That is the alternative. If their interests are put in the hands of partisan Judges as we should call them, although they would not be partisans in the view of hon.

Members opposite, it is certain that landlords will have to accept the prairie value or even less, and will not be protected if they refuse it. If the Government, knowing what they are doing, persist in the policy they have laid down, I say, in the words of Lord Spencer, they will be doing “a mean and treacherous thing.” Lord Spencer said, and said truly, that the landlords have been confirmed in their property by legislation, which to a large extent restricted their rights, and he said it would be a mean and treacherous thing to desert them. I do not say that is what the Government are going to do, but I say that would undoubtedly be done if this Bill passed in its present form. What is the answer to the case I have endeavoured to put before the House? The answer is a very remarkable one, and it was given to us by the Chief Secretary (Mr. J. Morley) on Friday night. He said that three years hence the Irish Legislature would have control of Irish land legislation, and that, under these circumstances, it would be anomalous to give them the power of legislation and to refuse to them the nomination of the Judges. I agree with that. I agree that it would be very anomalous; but am I to understand my right hon. Friend the Chief Secretary to declare the settled conviction and intention of the Government to hand over unsettled the Irish Land Question to the Irish Legislature three years hence? If they are not going to do that, the argument falls to the ground and is not of the slightest value. If the Government are going, in the course of the next three years, to legislate so as to bring about a final and definite settlement of the Land Question, and so that when the question devolves upon the Irish Legislature there will be no question to settle, there will be no anomaly. It will only be an anomalous thing if you are going to allow the Irish Parliament to legislate on an unsettled question. When the matter was raised before on a question asked by the noble Lord the Member for Middlesex (Lord G. Hamilton), the Prime Minister, without committing himself, rather led me to understand that the Government consider that an interval of three years is an interval that should be taken advantage of to settle the Irish Land Question in the Imperial Parliament. While refusing to say that he considered it no longer an obligation on the Imperial Government, he did not shut the door to an arrangement of that kind; but if the argument of the Chief Secretary is worth anything the door is to be shut. I do not know why the Land Question is to be reserved for three years; but after that short delay the vexed question of Irish land—the controversy between the Irish tenants and Irish landlords—is to be handed over to the Irish Legislature. I say that is in direct contradiction to everything that has been said by any Member of the Government who has dealt with the Land Question in Ireland. There is no one who has spoken more strongly on this matter than the Chief Secretary. He has used words that were even stronger than those I have quoted from the Prime Minister. He has said not “I will not be a party,” but—“I will never be a party to placing on the Irish Legislature the burden of legislating on this question.”

MR. J. MORLEY: I have never contemplated such a state of things after the expiration of the three years. What steps we may take between now and that time is another matter.

MR. J. CHAMBERLAIN: I do not say that when we have finally settled the Irish Land Question there would not be details that would from time to time come under the cognisance of the Irish Legislature; but the policy my right hon. Friend has declared again and again has been that the question is practically and substantially to be settled before the Irish Legislature is called on to deal with it. There can be no doubt whatever as to the language of my right hon. Friend. Here is one quotation—taken from a speech delivered by him at Newcastle on 11th February, 1886—

“And the second thing about which I have never concealed my opinion and which Irish Liberal and Conservative friends, with uneasy minds, may fix in their minds is, that I, for one, will never be a party to placing the minority—the property of the minority—at the mercy of the majority, in case they might be inclined to deal lawlessly with it.”

Again, at Newcastle, addressing his constituents, my right hon. Friend said—

“I said, and I will always say, that I should be no party to having a new Irish Government when it is constituted with the burden of the present land system in Ireland on their shoulders. We have no right to set up a Government in Ireland; we have no right to continue our Government in Ireland unless we are prepared to provide a great basis, a Conservative basis, in having as many occupiers and tillers of the soil as possible the owners of their own holdings.”

My right hon. Friend does not contend that that is the case now.

MR. J. MORLEY: The Leader of the Opposition brought forward a scheme to convert occupiers into owners.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR (Manchester, E.): Where did I ever state that that would be the effect of the Purchase Bill?

MR. J. MORLEY: The right hon. Gentleman said he was laying the basis of an operation which would transform occupiers into owners, and that that would furnish the only basis for a settlement of the Land Question.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: If the right hon. Gentleman says that I meant by the Purchase Act to transform all occupiers into owners he misconstrues what I said.

MR. J. MORLEY: He said his Bill would only sanction an advance of £30,000,000, which would be a circulating fund; but he also said, I think, that a sum of £95,000,000 would probably suffice to transform all the occupiers into owners.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: When is that going to take place?

MR. J. CHAMBERLAIN: I must press this further, because it goes to the root of the whole matter. The right hon. Gentleman does not deny that; he considers that a definite settlement of the Land Question is a necessary concomitant or precursor to the Home Rule Bill. Now, does the right hon. Gentleman mean that the late Government provided such a definite settlement? Does he contend that they finally settled the Land Question in the sense in which he used the words—

“I still think we are bound to attempt some definite settlement of the Land Question along with or immediately before the passing of Home Rule!”

Because either he does think so, or he does not. If he does think so, I must say he is mysteriously taciturn as to his opinions when the Home Rule Bill is before the House. Here was this settlement which he asserted it was the duty of statesmen to place in the front rank—a settlement which was absolutely necessary to the welfare of Ireland—here was this final settlement before the House, and the right hon. Gentleman never had one word to say for it. He voted against it. He must have thought it an insufficient and thoroughly inadequate settlement. He never could have spoken strongly against it and voted against it unless to his mind it was altogether insufficient. Therefore, the final settlement has still to be made. Now, I ask my right hon. Friend in what way in this Bill the Government are preparing for the definite settlement which they pledged themselves to make before they contemplated conferring self-government on Ireland? Do the Government believe—I do not ask whether they believe that this House believes—that they are settling anything by the Home Rule Bill if they leave the Land Question unsettled? The House will have in its mind a most significant and interesting question asked to-day. My right hon. Friend was asked as to the facts in reference to a meeting he had stopped, and which was to have been held on an evicted farm. What were the facts? A meeting was announced to be held there in close propinquity to, or immediately upon an evicted farm where there were two caretakers. The meeting was announced, and its object was said to be to hold up to public condemnation the persons responsible for the eviction. Thereupon my right hon. Friend behaved as we should always expect him to behave. He at once sent down orders that the meeting should not be held, because if it had been held it might have had an intimidatory effect, and the caretakers might have been in peril, and possibly would have had to fly for their lives, or, at all events, would have been in considerable personal danger. Did hon. Members opposite (the Nationalist Members) approve of the action of the right hon. Gentleman? Did their action show any appreciation of the course he had taken? Not at all. They put hostile questions, criticising questions, objecting questions. Does my right hon. Friend believe that if these hon. Gentlemen had been a Central Government they would have forbidden that intimidatory meeting? Would they have protected the caretakers; would they have protected the property of the landlord? Yet it is to a rule of terror which questions of that kind suggest that the right hon. Gentleman, under this Bill, will hand over the landlords of Ireland. I do not stand here to defend the landlords of Ireland, any more than I would defend any person who, being accused, should demand a fair trial. But I say the Government are in a different position. They have defended the landlords of Ireland. Some of the principal Members of the Government have said—and I suppose truly—that if there are landlords in Ireland who have abused their powers, there are other landlords in Ireland against whom no such charge can be made, and that all of them are entitled to the ordinary protection of the law and of the Imperial Government. As I have said, it would be “a mean and treacherous thing to desert them,” and to hand them over to the tender mercies of hon. Gentlemen opposite. We are, in this Amendment, at the mere fringe of the subject. I hope, at some later period, the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary will tell us how he means to settle this Land Question, which settlement he has declared to be necessary; but, in the meantime, I ask of the common fairness of the Government that at least they will not, in regard to this particular class of cases, hand them over to Courts that will be appointed by the enemies of one of the parties concerned.

MR. T. M. HEALY (Louth, N.): I think, Sir, it is a very graceful act of the right hon. Gentleman who has just sat down to make himself the spokesman and defender of those in Ireland who toil not, neither do they spin, and I must congratulate him on the abnegation and disinterestedness which he has displayed throughout his oration. He has asked the Government—especially the Member of the Government who has spoken and cannot speak again—a number of questions, and he has asked him how he proposes to settle this question. I would ask the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. J. Chamberlain), who, I am sure, will be heard again by the indulgence of the House, how this matter was to have been dealt with by that Central Board which he wrote to Mr. Duignan to offer to the Irish Members, and which was to have had entire control over the Irish Land Question? “I am prepared,” said the right hon. Member for West Birmingham in his "ransom" and, no doubt, unregenerate days—

"I am prepared to hand over to a Central Board, to an Irish Authority, the entire management and settlement of the Irish Land Question."

free, of course, from the control of the Central Executive.

MR. J. CHAMBERLAIN: I never said it.

MR. T. M. HEALY: You wrote it.

MR. J. CHAMBERLAIN: I did not.

MR. T. M. HEALY: If you hand over the entire control, how much control do you keep?

MR. J. CHAMBERLAIN: I proposed to keep in my hands the Courts and the Judges.

MR. T. M. HEALY: The right hon. Gentleman did not, because there was no reference to that in Mr. Duignan's letter. He proposed to hand over the settlement of the Irish Land Question to the Irish Members—the entire control and settlement. How was it to be done? From that hour to the present the right hon. Gentleman has left us in entire darkness and ignorance as to his method of procedure. He says there is one thing that the Irish landlords are entitled to, and that is a fair trial, and he went over the various birthrights of British citizens in relation to trial by jury and in relation to various other trials. I wonder, Mr. Speaker, did he think in 1887 that the Irish Members were entitled to a fair trial when he handed them over for trial to the Resident Magistrates? Did he think they got a fair trial from these Resident Magistrates, appointed by a landlord Government, when 27 of them were put on the plank bed?

MR. BUTCHER (York): They were not appointed by landlords.

MR. T. M. HEALY: Was Lord Londonderry not a landlord? He was Her Majesty's Viceroy in 1887, and was he not a landlord? Why, he was not only a landlord, but a proved rack-renter. His cases were taken into Court and his rents were cut down, and am I to be told that he was the very person to appoint Magistrates who would insure Irish Members a fair trial? Sir, before the right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Birmingham got up in this House to give us his views how the Irish Sub-

Commissioners were appointed, he would have found that in a little volume called Thom's Directory he could get a great deal of information about Ireland. It so happens that of the three gentlemen who hold the post of Chief Land Commissioners in Ireland, not one of them was appointed by a Liberal Government, and every one was appointed by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for East Manchester (Mr. A. J. Balfour). Judge Bewley, Chief Land Commissioner, who is he? He is brother-in-law to Lord Ashbourne. How did he get his appointment? I do not challenge the appointment of Judge Bewley. I believe it was a good, fair appointment, and I believe Judge Bewley really is a gentleman who can be depended upon by both sides to give fair play between landlord and tenant; but, just as I do not deny that you may appoint fair men at times, I repudiate the idea that we have not as much fairness as you have. Take the second gentleman, Mr. Wrench. That was not a fair appointment. It was a most monstrous appointment. He is your supposed Lay Commissioner, a gentleman who was appointed simply for no other reason than because he had been the agent on Sir Thomas Lennard's estate and on the Brooke estate; and if anybody wants to know the kind of agent he was let him take up a reported case, where he harried and hunted out of his district Sub-Commissioner Crean, simply because he decided that free sale should exist upon the estate upon which Mr. Wrench was agent. He took that case to the Chief Commissioners. He took it to the Court of Appeal, and then, when the law was decided against him, he got Mr. Crean hunted out of his district. Then, look at the case against him in reference to the Clones market, for which he was denounced by your own Court of Appeal in connection with the crane and weight business in the town of Clones. These are your appointments. Who is the third gentleman. I do not impugn his action, although he was appointed by the Tory Government. I say Mr. Commissioner Fitzgerald is a most respectable man. He did, when County Court Judge for Longford or Meath, confirm very severe and terrible sentences under the Crimes Act; and, no doubt whatever, he was considered by the Tory Government a very suitable person for the administration of the Coercion Act : but on the whole Mr. Commissioner Fitzgerald, in his action in the Court of the Irish Land Commission, has carried himself fairly and honourably, and I have no desire to attack him. These are three life appointments, not one of which can be considered or touched under the Home Rule Bill. Then I come to the Sub-Commissioners. What was the last act of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for East Manchester before going out of office ? Remember you had the appointment of the whole head Commission, who are appointed for life, in your own hands. Who are the Sub-Commissioners ? The right hon. Member for Birmingham (Mr. J. Chamberlain), from his own information, tells us that most of them were appointed by the Government of the right hon. Gentleman the Prime Minister. Well, here are the names of the 30 Sub-Commissioners, and as far as I can see—I do not say I am right to a man—but as far as my information goes, of these 30 Sub-Commissioners, 23 were appointed by the right hon. Member for East Manchester. And what was the last act of the right hon. Gentleman on going out of Office ? Up to that time these Sub-Commissioners were appointed from day to day. They practically had no more tenure than a day labourer. He made them permanent Civil servants of the Crown, and not one of these gentlemen can now be stirred by the Irish Government. But what is more, fair rent applications can also be dealt with by the County Court Judges in Ireland, and 14 out of the 22 County Court Judges were appointed by the late Tory Government. These all hold life appointments. All the Court valuers were appointed by the Tory Government—every man of them. Every Court valuer in Ireland has been appointed by the right hon. Member for East Manchester, and under the Land Purchase Act of 1891 every man of them is made a permanent Civil servant of the Crown. Sir, in regard to this large body of men—some 60 in all, and if I count valuers I should say it would be nearer 90, all life appointments—very little more than 10 per cent. are Liberal appointments, all the rest being the appointments of a Tory, an Orange, and a landlord Administration. What chance would an Irish Government have supposing you put a Ribbon Lodge as the Executive Government of the country ? That is probably the strongest way of arguing it. Suppose you put a Ribbon Lodge as the Executive Government of the country, what chance, I would like to ask, in the course of the lifetime of any individuals here present, who, I suppose, are of an average age of 40 years, pretty much the same from an actuarial point of view as the County Court Judges and the Sub-Commissioners themselves—what chance would even a Ribbon Lodge have of affecting the great trend and tendency of the action of these Courts in Ireland ? But I come to another matter. Some of these Sub-Commissioners—one at least—was appointed by the hon. Member for South Tyrone (Mr. T. W. Russell). I believe the right hon. Gentleman the Member for East Manchester refused to make the hon. Member himself a Privy Councillor, for which I am extremely thankful to him ; but his brother-in-law, Mr. Patterson, was made a Sub-Commissioner. I believe Mr. Patterson is no longer a Commissioner, for reasons over which he had no control. I believe he is dead, but the hon. Member for South Tyrone has always taken a great interest in the Irish Land Question, and one of the subjects in which he has taken most interest was the case of the long leaseholders. It was said—the hon. Member boasted of it at any rate—that it was largely due to his initiative that the Government of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for East Manchester passed the Redemption of Rent Act. Now, Mr. Speaker, I should like to know what it is that these Sub-Commissioners can do ? They can fix a fair rent in Ireland. How does Lord Salisbury designate the fixing of a fair rent in Ireland under his own Statute passed by his own Government ? He described it as a species of torture. It is all right to have Lord Salisbury Prime Minister of England, who described the attempt on behalf of the poor miserable peasants class in Ireland to get fair play from the landlords, backed up by the bayonets of the British Government, as a species of torture ; it is all right for Lord Salisbury and his Government to have the giving of 60 or 70 of the appointments ; but when it is suggested that the “ Other Parties,” as they are called by the right

Mr. T. M. Healy

hon. Member for West Birmingham, should have some say in the matter, then it becomes as sacrilegious, I was going to say, as the doctrine of "ransom." Lord Salisbury called the fixing of a fair rent a species of torture. I am sorry to say that, so far as the great body of the tenants are concerned, that is what it has proved; and who is my witness? The hon. and gallant Gentleman the Member for North Armagh (Colonel Saunderson), who declared in his place on Friday night that the English landlords had voluntarily given reductions of 15 to 20 per cent. larger than were screwed by process of law out of the Irish landlords. "But," says the right hon. Member for West Birmingham, "the Irish Members have all declared in favour of the prairie value." Sir, that phrase reached us viâ Birmingham. Who was its author? The lamented Mr. John Bright, who declared in our hearing in this House in 1881 that if the improvements of the Irish tenant were swept off the face of the soil, Ireland would become as bare and naked as the condition of the North American prairie. What is the position that we have taken up? The position is the position of the Land Act of 1881—namely, to give the Irish tenant the improvements he made in the soil, and to give the landlord the remainder. And what did your own Attorney General (Mr. Madden)—another of your Judges, because you had the appointment of most of them—what did he say in this House on the Bill of 1891? He said—

"If you take the interest of the Irish tenant in his holding and the interest of the Irish landlord at the present moment in consequence of his improvements, the Irish tenant now had an equal, if not a greater, interest in the soil than the landlord."

I call another witness, one of your own friends too, Lord Cowper. Take the Cowper Commission. When Lord Cowper was challenged—I think it was by another Lord Lieutenant, Lord Londonderry; or was it by the Duke of Argyll, another of your sacred witnesses? He was challenged in the House of Lords on the unfairness of the Cowper Commission Report; and having had 12 months to consider his position, instead of his having been challenged by the Lords—by the Irish rack-renters in that place—Lord Cowper laid down his refusal to recede by one jot or tittle from the position he took up in the Report, and, if my memory serves me, said that improvements to the extent of £100,000,000—I think he said hundreds of millions—had been made in the soil of Ireland by the Irish tenants. I am sorry, Sir, to have to say that under the presidency of Lord Ashbourne in the Irish Court of Appeal—whose appointment was the most monstrous and shocking that even a Tory Government ever made to the position of Lord Chancellor—if the 300,000 Irish tenants who have got fair rents fixed under the Land Act of 1881 had to go into Court in the morning, so tight has the garotte of legal decision become that 50 per cent. of these men would be held disentitled to the fixing of a fair rent, and I believe, indeed, that under the influence of legal decision something like 400,000 Irish tenants have been excluded from the operations of the Land Act of 1881. I will give the House an instance of this class of decision. I think it is a monstrous decision, and it was given under your own Government—the Government of angels—which has been in power in Ireland for 700 years, and what have you made of it? What have you made of the Irish? Whatever we are, we are your handiwork. Instead of giving us Universities and Colleges you gave us the plank bed and the convict cell. What are these decisions? I quote a decision as recent as only a few weeks ago, delivered at Enniscorthy. By whom? By one of your Land Commissioners, Mr. De la Poer Trench, brother to Lord Clancarty. What was his decision? His decision was this. The tenant went into Court to get a fair rent fixed. He was equipped with every attribute that entitled him thereto. When the landlord pulled out a deed of settlement whereby his father had settled the lands for life on himself with remainder to the eldest son, and, says he, I am the eldest son, and the remainder man of the estate cannot be held responsible for a tenancy created by a tenant for life. I challenge question on this point—that in view of recent decisions, if the tenants had to go into Court again, instead of 300,000 Irish tenants getting the benefit of the land legislation, not 30,000 would get it. What have been your decisions as to haying? Why, we all thought, in consequence of one case dealt with at an early stage by the House of Lords, that where a tenant sold the hay off his farm he shall not be held a tenant for the purposes of pasture. One of the Courts of Appeal has decided the reverse. The decision is that if you have a lease of, say, 200 acres of land, and there is a provision in the lease that the landlord may take up one acre of that 200 for a cottage or something of that kind, then the lease is held to make it only a letting for temporary convenience. The decisions, I venture to say, are such—and I challenge anybody to deny it—that if these tenants were to go into Court again the Land Act would be practically closed against them. What, then, is the argument? That you having loaded the dice, you having appointed 60 out of the 70 gentlemen who are to administer these Land Acts, that, so far as our lives are concerned, we are to be stopped from having the appointment of any single man to administer them at all. Who is to appoint them? The right hon. Member for West Birmingham did not tell us, but I presume it would be the Imperial Government. The Imperial Government for half time, at any rate, will be the Tory Party. They will come in for half the spoils—the Tory Party, who are the landlord party of Lord Clanricarde, the party of Lord Londonderry, the party whose chief was not ashamed the other day to repudiate the act of his own nephew and of his own Ministers. Lord Salisbury tells us that the Act which gave the long leaseholders the right to go into Court and get a fair rent fixed unless the landlord consents to be bought out is a most objectionable provision, which never should have been placed on the Statute Book. He did not know how it escaped his notice. I wonder how it escaped his notice too. Sometimes people thank God they have a House of Lords, and yet the House of Lords and the Prime Minister of the country let this most objectionable Act, this species of torture, this terrible piece of robbery—the act of his nephew, too, above all persons—be placed upon the Statute Book of England. But, Mr. Speaker, if we were in an Irish Parliament, and if the Irish Premier of the day was to make some remark of that kind in regard to some little Irish measure that had passed, and to denounce it as an act of robbery, an act of torture, a most objectionable measure, a measure depriving landlords of right or title to the soil, I should like to know what would be the criticism on the Hibernicism, what twitting would go on in this House, what holding of the sides in laughter by gentlemen in the position of the right hon. Member for West Birmingham at those extraordinary Irish Members who denounce their own Bills, and who declare that they are not responsible for the acts of Members of their own Administration? Do not you think that Irishmen, at any rate, ought to have as much common sense in dealing with this question of Land Purchase or with the Redemption of Rent Act as Lord Salisbury? There is this to be said, at all events. The Irish Members are not tenants. We are not Irish tenants. I am not an Irish tenant. I never had as much land, and never will have as much land, as would sod a lark. And am I not in as disinterested a position as Lord Salisbury or Lord Clanricarde? Am I not as disinterested as Lord Londonderry? Am I not as disinterested as the hon. Member for Mid Antrim, who spent his nights and his days trying to block this most objectionable species of torture in 1891? We own no land, and I would venture to say this—that the man who owns no land at all, at any rate, is as likely to give equal and indifferent justice between two contending parties as the landlord who is one party to the transaction. Sir, the Irish Members, the Irish Party, and their constituents, desire in this transaction between landlord and tenant nothing but the bare letter of the statute law; we desire nothing but what the Land Act of 1881 gave us—namely, that no rent shall be allowed or made payable upon the improvements made by the tenant or his predecessors in title. If that is prairie value, we are in favour of prairie value. If that is not prairie value, we are not in favour of prairie value. We want our own and no more. Keep you what is yours. You have got in the soil a certain title, so have we. We do not go into the question how you got that title. There you are for better or worse. We represent the immemorial tenants of the soil, and ask for nothing except that what our people have made by their sweat and their toil and their labour and that of their forefathers for centuries should be theirs; and I would venture to say that at this time of day it is not a demand which the Imperial Parliament, as at present constituted, would refuse to us.

MR. D. PLUNKET (Dublin University): I shall not ask the leave of the House to follow the hon. and learned Gentleman who has just sat down through all the points of his speech, because, in my humble judgment, many of them had nothing whatever to do with the Amendment. I may say generally that the greater portion of the vehement harangue was an illustration of what the hon. and learned Gentleman is an extremely good hand at—namely, what I would call picturesque invective, which we have often had the interesting opportunity of listening to before. It cannot be said, on the whole, that those who have been attacked by the hon. and learned Gentleman have come badly out of his hands in comparison with many whom he has assailed before. The hon. and learned Member commenced by referring to the three Chief Land Commissioners. With the Judicial Commissioner, whose position is the most important of all, the hon. and learned Gentleman has no fault whatever to find, except that he was some relation or other to some gentleman who has taken a prominent part in politics. Judge Bewley was, he said, in some way connected with Lord Ashbourne; but, notwithstanding that relationship, he has admitted, as every man in Ireland must admit, that there could not be found in any part of the United Kingdom a more learned, able, and impartial Judge. As to the third of the Chief Commissioners, Mr. Fitzgerald, with him, I think, the hon. and learned Gentleman had no substantial fault to find. I may mention that Mr. Fitzgerald's worth for the position he now occupies is justified by the fact that he had been previously appointed a County Court Judge by the Government of the right hon. Gentleman opposite. Upon the head of Mr. Wrench, however, the full vials of the wrath of the hon. and learned Member fell. But what was the worst that the hon. and learned Gentleman could say of Mr. Wrench? Nothing at all as to the administration of his present office, but that he had prosecuted a gentleman called Crean, which had resulted in placing that gentleman in a very comfortable position. The hon. and learned Gentleman then passed on to the Sub-Commissioners, and said that the vast majority of them had been appointed by the Tory Government. I do not believe that the hon. and learned Gentleman is correct in that statement; but, by whatever Government they may have been made, why were not those appointments challenged in this House if they were wrong?

MR. T. M. HEALY: Because you took their salaries off the Votes and put them on the Consolidated Fund.

MR. D. PLUNKET: Neither the salaries of the Land Commissioners nor the salaries of the Assistant Commissioners are so placed on the Consolidated Fund. We contend for that very thing—that this Assembly here, where both sides of the question can be fairly heard and impartially tried, should have control of these appointments, so that justice should be done. You call them Tory appointments. I deny that you have any right to say that Tory appointments are necessarily unjust and unfair appointments. But they have never been challenged, and what we ask in this clause is that the power of challenging them, if they are unjust, should be reserved to this House. The substance of this part of the hon. Gentleman's speech is that every one of the Sub-Commissioners is saddled upon the country for a length of time. As a matter of fact, every one of these Assistant Commissioners and Land Valuers can be called upon, if this Bill is passed, to retire from their positions. But, passing from the speech of the hon. and learned Gentleman, I venture to submit to the House, in no heat or passion, a very serious matter which concerns a large class in Ireland who have few Representatives in this House, and who, worse luck for them, can command but few votes for Representatives in this House—a class to whom, under this Bill, it is proposed to give the most heartless and shabbiest treatment of any class affected by the measure. What is the position of the landowners in Ireland? I speak not only for the unfortunate landowners, but for their families, for the family charges upon their estates, for the mortgagees, numbers of whom, living in England and Scotland, have the greater part of their fortunes vested in Irish land. If it be the fact that the Irish landlords are in danger of being unjustly dealt with by the process of rent-fixing which will be set up under this Bill, all these other people have some claim also to the fair, and frank, and impartial consideration of this House. How does the case stand at the present moment? The amount the Irish landlords now receive in the way of rents is £10,000,000 a year, which is a very small sum as compared with the rental of England or of Scotland. At present, after the Land Act of 1881 has been in operation for some 12 years, and when every tenant in Ireland has had an opportunity of going into the Courts established by that Act to have a fair rent fixed, the sum at which the rental of the Irish landlords is settled is £10,000,000. Of course, if the positions of the Sub-Commissioners were held by men who agree with the principles adopted by the Nationalist Party as regards the land, very probably that £10,000,000 would have been further reduced by 30, 50, or 80 per cent. It must not be supposed that I am stating an exaggerated figure simply on my own account, because if the Members of the Nationalist Party are actuated now by the same views as they held in the time of Mr. Parnell and the Land League, and had the power in their hands, I have high authority for saying that the reduction would have been much greater than it was. I remember the Prime Minister in 1881—when the right hon. Gentleman was in close and sharp conflict with Mr. Parnell—describing the doctrine of the Land League as a doctrine of public plunder, and saying that the proposal was to reduce a rental of £17,000,000 to between £2,000,000 and £3,000,000. Will hon. Gentlemen below the Gangway denounce the principles then laid down by the late Mr. Parnell, and rightly denounced by the Prime Minister as the doctrine of public plunder? By the constitution of the Land Commission the Commissioners have to deal with the most delicate and intricate questions of both law and equity; and it is of the highest importance that men of judicial experience, as well as of ability and impartiality, should be selected for the positions. The Sub-Commissioners have practically in their hands the decisions in regard to the rent which the landowner shall get, and the price he shall receive for the sale of his land. It may be said there is the power

of appeal; but, in reality, that appeal affords no protection, because, after all, the Head Commissioners can only see these farms through the eyes of the Assistant Commissioners and Land Valuers; and though it may be true that the Head Commissioners can hold on to their offices, there is no doubt that the Sub-Commissioners may be dismissed the day after the Bill has passed into law. In point of fact, these Sub-Commissioners will be "removables" in a truer sense than the Resident Magistrates. The Irish Executive will have the power at any time of dismissing them. I maintain that the basis of the Act of 1881 was the perfect impartiality of the tribunal which was to decide the questions of rent and sale. It was made a cardinal condition at the time that the men who were to apply the Act should be men of unquestioned impartiality. I remember very well that, as the Bill was passing through this House, appeals were made for compensation for those landlords who might suffer under the operation of the Act; and even many of the supporters of the Prime Minister at the time urged on him to consider the propriety of affording compensation to such landlords. Sir Walter Barttelot proposed an Amendment to give to landlords who considered they might be very injuriously affected by the operation of the Act the power of selling their estates to a Commission appointed for the purpose. The Prime Minister resisted the Motion, and said—

"The judicial rents can only be fixed on the statutory terms, and can only be established according to the judgment of a dispassionate and impartial body, who shall have to decide between man and man according to the facts proved before them."

But can any man, knowing the principles which hon. Members below the Gangway had over and over again declared in regard to the land, honestly believe that if the Bill passes, and the appointment of the Land Commissioners is in the hands of the Irish Legislature, the Land Commission will stand as an impartial, just, and fair-minded tribunal between the landlords and tenants of Ireland? I will not call up the sayings of hon. Gentlemen below the Gangway. The Chief Secretary said that this language was used when the movement was commenced, which is now drawing to a close. I entirely agree that when the movement was commenced the minds of men were greatly excited. But what first gave abiding force to the Home Rule movement were the promises held out to the tenant farmers, who could not otherwise be induced to take a substantial interest in the matter of prairie value for the land, and the abolition of landlordism altogether. These promises have been the force which has carried on the movement to the present day, and are, indeed, the meaning of the solid support given in Ireland to a Bill which, in many other respects, is unsatisfactory to the Nationalist Party. There can be no doubt about it. What is the use of arguing whether or not we ought to give £500,000 to the Irish Government to enable them to carry on their business, when by no Act of Parliament at all, but by the appointment of Sub-Commissioners, they will have the power of dealing at one sweep with £10,000,000 a year. Ever since the Act of 1881 has been passed, there have been complaints on the part of the landlords and on the part of tenants; but both parties always relied on recovering in this House justice, and a fair hearing of their complaints. But can the same trust be reposed in the Irish Legislature? In accordance with the propositions they again and again laid down, the Nationalist Members, if they are in power, will be bound to make efforts to reduce rents in a way that would never be tolerated in this House, and the landlords of Ireland will have no protection against injustice and wrong any more in the Legislative Council than in the Legislative Assembly, for, so far as the Legislative Council is concerned, 70 to 80 per cent. of the electors will be tenant farmers waiting for the redemption of the promises made to them. That is the main ground on which I claim that the appointment of the Land Commissioners and Sub-Commissioners should be retained by the Imperial Parliament as a guarantee of justice and impartiality to all classes. The Chief Secretary said a proposal to restrict the appointment of Sub-Commissioners to this House for three years, while the House retains control of the Land Question, might be the subject of argument; but he thought it absurd to continue the appointment of Sub-Commissioners to this House after the power of dealing with the land had passed to the Irish Legislature. The right hon. Gentleman, when challenged upon the point, said that these rights—so I understood him—would be protected under the provisions of Clause 4 of this Bill. Well, Sir, I cannot help thinking that that is wholly illusory. But that does not affect the question before us now, because, without the Irish Legislature having the question before them at all, appointments could be made by the Executive, and the trick would be done. Well, now, turning to the Land Purchase Act of 1891, the operation of that Act, wherever—in every part of Ireland—the Nationalists have power, has been paralysed since its introduction by the hopes held out to the people of the better things that would be obtained under an Irish Legislature. I will just quote one sentence from a gentleman who has great influence over the farmers of Ireland. Mr. Davitt said, in August, 1887, that he wanted to warn the tenantry of Ireland against any plan of settlement introduced by the Imperial Parliament as certain to be in favour of the landlords; that the 20 per cent. reduction then granted would be no permanent relief to Irish industry, but would, 10 years hence, be a burden; and that the farmers would be false to themselves if they trusted to anybody but the Irish nation, represented in a National Parliament in Dublin. If that is the advice to which the Irish farmers attach importance, surely we will only be giving it ten-fold force by entrusting not only to an Irish Legislature the power to treat of the relations between landlord and tenant, and also to the Irish Executive the appointment of these Commissioners. I must not pursue this subject further. It is outside the limits of the argument which I venture to submit to the House as to how the landlords would be affected by the Irish Executive of the future. We were told in 1886 that these men were entitled to the greatest consideration; we were told in 1886 that the history of Ireland had imposed upon the English people a duty—that they were in honour bound to the English garrison, as they were called, in Ireland. They relied upon England, and England relied upon them; and I ask any impartial man is it fair—is it justice—to the class thus described to hand them over to the Legislature and Executive it is now proposed to set up? If you do, then I say history will think in regard to the English people that they were persuaded by the eloquence and personal character of one great Minister to depart from and repudiate those claims of honour and justice which he himself so eloquently defended.

*MR. LOUGH (Islington, W.) said, there was one characteristic of the arguments from the Unionist side which struck him very forcibly, and that was that the speakers devoted themselves to dealing with the Irish Parliament, and what it would do when it was formed. All this, however, must be based upon surmise and prophecy. For his part, he preferred to deal with the object set forth in the clause before the House, and to see how this Parliament had administered the Land Act. It was comparatively easy to examine the Land Act of 1881 and its administration. If they got before their eyes a picture of the Chief Lay Commissioner they had an idea of the spirit that animated the whole administration. The appointment of one showed them the character of all the appointments. The Legal Commissioner only dealt with points of law. It was not necessary to introduce Party, for the appointments of the Liberals had been as bad as those of the Tories, nor to enter into any personal question or to name any of the Judges. It was only necessary to consider the class of man who was appointed as Chief Commissioner. But before doing this let us inquire what was the duty cast upon the Courts? It was to arbitrate in disputes between landlords and tenants: 288,000 rents had been fixed, affecting 1,500,000 of the agricultural population of Ireland, and relating to some £5,000,000 of rent; and it was to be remembered that the other half of the population were indirectly affected by the decisions arrived at. And who were the men appointed to this duty? They were simply land agents. The occupation of such agents was to get as much rent as they could out of land. If he were inclined to press the point, he should describe them as sweaters of the Irish people. And they were not only employed in this way on their own behalf, but often had made loans of money which practically gave them a proprietorship of other lands. These were the class of men appointed as Chief Commissioners. What were the results of these appointments? The results had been referred to by the hon. and gallant Member for North Armagh (Colonel Saunderson). He did not wish to say anything regarding the hon. and gallant Member, since he was not in his place; but he would tell the House that the first Chief Commissioner appointed was the hon. and gallant Member's own agent for many years, and when he became Commissioner his son became agent in succession to him. The gentleman so appointed would have been more than human if he did not remember his old connection with the estates, and that in dealing with the cases brought before him, in making reductions for every £1 he took off he would be taking 1s. or 2s. per annum out of his own son's pocket.

MR. MACARTNEY (Antrim, S.) wished to ask the hon. Member when had the late Mr. Vernon, to whom he alluded, dealt with cases from that estate?

MR. LOUGH said, he was born on the estate, and knew all about the facts. The gentleman referred to was appointed agent in 1854; he was made a Commissioner in 1881; and his son succeeded him in the agency—

MR. MACARTNEY said, his question was when Mr. Vernon ever revised the rents on this estate?

MR. LOUGH said, he could only say that as Chief Commissioner he had the power of dealing with them on appeal. He was not a lawyer, and he might be wrong. [Cries of "Quite right!" and "Order!"] That, at least, was his impression. The hon. and gallant Member for North Armagh had stated that the reductions in Ireland were 15 per cent. less than were given willingly by English landlords. That was a very remarkable admission coming from the hon. Member, and how far this result might have been achieved by the character of these appointments he left the House to judge. He wished, however, to take a wider view of the question. There could be no doubt that the Land Act of 1881 had been administered in the landlord interest. The total reduction was practically as stated—20 per cent.; and if the rents in England were reduced 35 per cent., 50 per cent. would have been a fairer reduction in Ireland, and that was the reason that so much dissatisfaction had been expressed in this House and in the country. The reductions were so unsatisfactory that an amending Act was brought in in 1887 by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for East Manchester (Mr. A. J. Balfour) giving a further reduction of from 5 to 10 per cent. on the judicial rents.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: That is not a correct account of the Act of 1887.

MR. LOUGH said, he thought it was.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR said, it was not, for, as a matter of fact, in some cases there was an increase of rent.

MR. LOUGH said, such cases were very few. He thought the right hon. Gentleman would find that the effect of the Act was to reduce the rents all round from 5 to 10 per cent. As such a large proportion of the people had been affected directly by the Act, he thought that it would not be unfair to trace any great movements which had affected the Irish populations during the period to the operation of these Acts. The first movement he observed was that the rate of decrease in the population had been doubled. This decrease was only 4 per cent. from 1871 to 1881; from 1881 to 1891 it increased to 9 per cent. Then with regard to pauperism; in 1876, with a population of 5,250,000, there were 250,000 people relieved; whereas, in 1888, during the administration of the Act of 1881 and the Act of 1887, with a population of 5,000,000, pauperism stood at 525,000—a proportion of 11 per cent. of the inhabitants. Then the administration of these Acts had been extremely costly. It cost more than £100,000 per annum, and it had brought a crowd of lawyers into the country towns which they could very well have done without. All this was to reduce the rents to Griffith's valuation; and that result might have been effected by a stroke of the pen, instead of the institution of this elaborate Commission with all its machinery. The greatest blot upon the Act was the sense of wrong produced in the minds of the people. The poor Irish farmer was brought into the Land Court to get his case fairly considered, and looking at the Bench he saw there sitting as his judge the very man against whose oppression he had come to appeal. [Cries of "Name!"]

MR. ROSS: Name one.

MR. LOUGH said, he could name gentlemen if he liked. He would give the names to the hon. Gentleman privately if he wished for them.

MR. ROSS: Name one.

MR. LOUGH said, the next question to which he asked their attention was—Did this pay the landlord? Only a reduction of 20 per cent. had been made. He considered it would have paid the landlord better if it had been 50 per cent. The landlord did not collect the judicial rents any easier than he did the old rents. There was still the six months' gale, and the Rent Office expenses were the same as before. It was now a recognised principle in many estates to make a regular reduction of these rents. Indeed, the net result was simply to re-establish the old rack-rents under another name. That was very unfortunate for the landlord; and if the Judges had acted in a different spirit, granting an adequate abatement, it would have been better for him now. They had got a standard in Ireland that enabled them to estimate the fairness or unfairness of rents since 1870. Since that year sales of land on a large scale had been taking place in Ireland, and it was possible to estimate the fairness or unfairness of the annual rent by the number of years' purchase that was given for the land. If the annual rent was high, the purchase would be low; while if the annual rent was low, the number of years of purchase given would be high. In 1870 to 1876 land sold at 22½ years' purchase; in 1876 to 1880 at 22½ years—that was under the old rents. Under the judicial rents land purchase recommenced in 1886, and in that year they had 18 years' purchase, the average price all over Ireland; in 1887, 17½ years'; in 1888, 17 years'; and in 1889, 16½ years'. And during the last 15 months still lower prices ruled. In Munster, to March, 1893, the rate was 15½ years'; Leinster, 16 years'; Connaught, 13 years'. That covered the whole country except part of Ulster. In these three Provinces the average that could now be obtained for these judicial rents was only 15 years' purchase. He thought that if large sales were pressed they could not be effected at more than 14 years' purchase; perhaps the rate would even be only 12 years. So that they found that the landlords had created for themselves a very bad market—a worse one than they would have had to face had the Judges acted differently. He took a single case as an illustration. Suppose a farm, of which the judicial rent would be £25; the reduction of 20 per cent. would make it £20; this, at 14 years' purchase, would be £280. Now if, instead of the reduction to £20 this rent had been reduced to £12 10s., and that £12 10s. had been sold at 24 years' purchase, the farm would realise £300. He thought he had stated the case fairly, and shown that, by the course they had taken, the landlords had depressed the buyers and spoilt the market. They had made land almost unsaleable the very moment when they themselves wanted to sell. He was anxious, before sitting down, to refer to a point made by the hon. and learned Member for Dublin University (Mr. Carson) the other night, as to the position of the English taxpayer. The hon. and learned Member's view seemed to him an extremely curious one. The learned Member wished to show that it was in the interest of the English taxpayer for the tenant to pay, and the landlord to receive, a high price for the land. But surely if the English taxpayer had only the security of the land for his money, the more cheaply the land was bought the better. Again, there were only a few landlords, and they would disappear; but the Irish tenant must remain; and if his condition was improved, he would be a larger consumer of English goods, so that the British taxpayer would make a larger profit from him. The interests, therefore, of the British taxpayer did not coincide with those of the Irish landlord, but of the tenant. He thought, in these circumstances, they would be justified in rejecting the clause. The matter might be left to the Irish Legislature. It could not, even if it administered these Acts in favour of the tenants, do worse than had been done by this Legislature. It would then only bring the question to a just balance, for this Legislature's administration had been in favour of the landlord. His opinion was that the Irish Legislature would be warned by the unfortunate experience of this House and avoid prejudice in favour of one side or the other, and that it would be their effort to insure for the law a fair and impartial administration.

Mr. ROSS (Londonderry) said, the hon. Gentleman who had just sat down appeared to be fond of statistics; but he could not regard otherwise than as extraordinary the results he had adduced from the statistics he had quoted. He could not help expressing his astonishment that the hon. Gentleman should have proceeded to make an attack upon a gentleman of the standing of the late Mr. John E. Vernon—a man of such high character that his appointment to a Chief Commissionership was universally accepted. The hon. Gentleman spoke of Mr. Vernon as a land agent, and said he tried to get as much rent as possible out of the people—he went further, and called him a sweater.

Mr. LOUGH said, he did not use the word "sweater" in regard to Mr. Vernon, and he said nothing whatever about his character.

Mr. ROSS said, the hon. Member would surely not deny that he was dealing with Mr. Vernon as a land agent, and that he described a land agent as a person whose duty it was to get as much rent as possible, and as a person who was a sweater.

Mr. LOUGH said, he did not use the word in that connection. He used it with some restraint before he referred to the case of the hon. and gallant Member for Armagh (Colonel Saunderson) or to Mr. Vernon. He said Mr. Vernon was the first Chief Commissioner.

Mr. ROSS said, he did not know what the hon. Member meant by talking of a sweater with some restraint; but he did say that the word was used by the hon. Member in describing the late Mr. Vernon, when he was speaking of him as the late agent of his hon. and gallant Friend. The hon. Member went on to make the further charge that Mr. Vernon's son succeeded him in the agency; and that, in dealing with rents, Mr. Vernon acted upon the principle that he might be taking so much out of the pocket of his son. The fact was, however, admitted that Mr. Vernon never fixed any rents on this estate. The hon. Member said he was born on the estate; but what right had he to make that insinuation against a man who was dead, and who had enjoyed the confidence of the Prime Minister—[Mr. W. E. GLADSTONE signified assent]—a man who was appointed to his office in the middle of a burning agitation, and who, in such circumstances, was chosen to be at the head of this inquiry into that great question in Ireland? The hon. Member might accuse Mr. Vernon; but he could not bring forward any evidence to sustain his accusation. He noticed that when the hon. Member was going to make some astounding and preposterous statement he always prefaced it by saying, "It would be generally admitted." In accordance with this practice, he said it would be generally admitted that the Land Acts were administered solely in the interests of the landlords. He (Mr. Ross) thought he remembered such a body—meeting continuously—as the Waterford Commission, which attacked the Sub-Commissioners, and said the landlords were being robbed by the method of fixing the fair rents under the Land Act of 1881. The hon. Member, to prove that rents were unfairly fixed in 1881, said—"You yourselves had to pass an Act of Parliament in 1887, under which you reduced all rents." Of all the absurd statements of the hon. Member this was about the most absurd. What happened in 1887? There had been a certain fall in the price of some commodities and a rise in others; and, inasmuch as the rents had been fixed at a time when these commodities were at a different price, an Act of Parliament was passed which worked upon a sliding scale in respect of the rents fixed in the several years, the effect of which was to raise the rents in some cases and lower them in others. He quite admitted that the general result all round was to lower the rents. But what became of the hon. Gentleman's argument? Was the procedure under the Act of 1887 any admission that the rents were fixed in 1881 too high? Not at all, because the whole ground of the Act of 1887 was that a serious and unprecedented depreciation in the value of some commodities had occurred. The hon. Member said that the poor tenant, on being brought into Court, found himself face to face with his greatest enemy—meaning his landlord. He called upon the hon. Member for names, and he said that these charges should not be made unless they could be substantiated. The hon. Gentleman, by dealing in his own peculiar and unique manner with statistics, proceeded to show that rents were fixed a great deal too high, and he said that if landlords had only accepted less rents they would have got more of them.

MR. LOUGH: More years' purchase.

MR. ROSS: Very well. How did the hon. Member show this? He said that some years ago the landlords' interest in land sold for 25 years' purchase, but lately it had only sold for 16½ and 13½ years' purchase. He could tell the hon. Member that land had sold for very much less even than that. But how was that a test? These latter sales took place when the whole of the landlords' interest was in peril; it was at that stage of the agitation when landlords in the South of Ireland were glad to get rid of their land almost at any price, in face of the threats which had been held out by the Irish Nationalist Members as to what they would do when they got Home Rule. The hon. Member for North Louth (Mr. T. M. Healy) was, unfortunately, not in his place. He always noticed when that hon. Member had a particularly bad case he proceeded to his favourite weapon of personal abuse. Personal abuse was a weapon within the meanest capacity, and was not worthy the hon. Member for North Louth. But what had that got to do with the question? No matter what subject might be before the House, the hon. Member must have his customary fling at Lord Ashbourne and his familiar kick at Lord Londonderry. What on earth had that got to do with the admittedly serious question before the House? They (the Opposition) said that this clause was a very real test as to whether all sense of fair play and justice had left that House or not, because if it had been stated a few years ago that the Land League were to be the people to appoint the Sub-Commissioners the whole of the civilised world would have laughed. But that was the very thing that was seriously proposed now by the Bill as it stood. If in 1879 or 1880 anybody had suggested that the Land League should appoint the Sub-Commissioners, the Prime Minister would have said that such a proposal was insane, yet that was the very thing the right hon. Gentleman was now doing. He failed altogether to understand the position taken up by the Government on this question. They had admitted, by their retaining the Irish Land Question for the next three years, that the Irish Legislature were not to be trusted with the Land Question, otherwise what was the meaning of the reservation? Did it not mean that the Members who would compose this Irish Legislature had been mixed up in this matter too much to be trusted to deal with the question at all? If the Government admitted they were not to be allowed to deal with the question directly, why did they give them permission to deal with it indirectly? They admitted there was a duty and responsibility upon them. What was the measure of that duty and responsibility? He took the words of the Prime Minister. On the subject of the Irish landlords who had been so much abused that day, it was well to recollect some words from one whom they would all respect. The right hon. Gentleman, in 1886, described this as an obligation of honour and of policy, and then said—

"I have the honour of knowing myself many Irish landlords who are an honour to the class to which they belong. I hope that what I have said will show that in quoting the mournful testimony of history I do not seek to make them personally responsible for difficulties and for evils of which they are the victims rather than the cause."

Then he went on to say—

"It would be like giving over to Ireland the worst part of her feuds, and confronting her with the necessity for efforts which would possibly be hopeless, but which, at any rate, would be attended with the most fearful risks. . . . I have shown you how terrible the subject of the land is in itself. . . . Why is Great Britain to be cumbered with this subject? Are we bound to cumber ourselves with it? Is it an obligation of policy, and a dictate of honour? I am satisfied that the House, however reluctant—it cannot be more reluctant than we are—if it be an obligation of policy, if it be a dictate of honour, and still more if it be partly the one and partly the other, will not shrink from any duty which these considerations may entail. . . . But I must point out that the obligation on our part has been admitted already. . . . I may name another consideration, which is not one of honour but of prudence."

That was the measure of the obligation and duty admitted in those eloquent words by the Prime Minister. Had that obligation passed away? Had that duty become lessened? Then, into whose hands was the right hon. Gentleman putting this all-important power of fixing fair rents? He would not go back to speeches made by hon. Members below the Gangway very long ago, though he was far from admitting that the Chief Secretary's answer was a good one when he said that these speeches were made under a real grievance, and that they were speeches of men made in time of excitement. The excitement and fever had lasted an extraordinary time. It was a chronic fever, which would last to the very end of time. The language he would quote showed the purpose and views of hon. Members below the Gangway. He would take the language of one who always expressed himself with great ability and clearness. The hon. Member for North Kerry (Mr. Sexton), speaking on March 8, 1893, said—

"I submit to you also that if the Irish landlords know that at the end of three years the Irish Legislature will have power to make a law upon the land, the effect upon their conduct will be important if not conclusive, for there is no way for a landlord to get out of his position except by the sale of his lands to his tenants, and to no other persons, for no other persons will buy it. In that condition of things I think the prospect of legislation at the end of three years will induce the Irish landlords to be probably reasonable, possibly even liberal. Moreover, within that period of three years it is extremely likely that the prospect immediately before them will induce many Irish landlords to sell to their tenants upon reasonable terms."

What did the hon. Member mean by "the prospect immediately before them"? Surely to any man of reason that must mean the prospect of confiscation, the proposal of losing all their interest in their land.

MR. SEXTON (Kerry, N.): The hon. Gentleman must not hold me responsible for his imagination. I had before me when I made that speech the fact that the tenant-farmers of Ulster generally desired compulsory purchase, and I notice that no Ulster rural Member has as yet spoken in this Debate. The tenant-farmers, as I have said, desired compulsory purchase, and I had in view the fact that any prospect of passing an Act for the compulsory purchase of land might induce the landlords within these three years to make voluntary transactions.

MR. ROSS thought that the persons who attended that meeting would naturally arrive at the conclusion that the landlord's interest was disappearing. What was making it disappear? The setting up of Home Rule in Ireland; and although he, of course, accepted what the hon. Member said was his meaning, still he thought most of the persons who heard the hon. Member's speech would think the prospect immediately before them was the annihilation of the landlord's interest. [Mr. SEXTON: No, no!] However, he had not to depend merely upon the words of the hon. Member for North Kerry, who always spoke in a very guarded and accurate manner. But there were many more who had spoken. He would quote from a speech of the late Mr. Harris, Member for East Galway, delivered in the year 1877. He said—

"I am not going to indulge in a No-Rent Manifesto. That was put to the people before, and if they had adhered to that great programme, there would be no landlords in Ireland to-day; but they had not the courage to do that. But we put a programme before you that will lead to that result, that will first take one slice, and then a second, and we will keep slicing at it until nothing remains."

Then there was the hon. Member for East Mayo (Mr. Dillon), who in the year 1880 said—

"With 300,000 Irishmen enrolled as members of the Land League, all the armies of England would not levy rent in this country."

That was the hon. Member's description of the policy of the Land League. He was afraid the hon. Member for East Mayo had not withdrawn from the position he had there taken up, because in a speech reported in The Freeman's Journal of 8th August, 1893, the hon. Member said—

"Landlordism still in Mayo is a force for evil, and believe me I speak of what I know when I say that if the idea spreads for a single moment that the people were going to turn their backs on the principles of the old Land League that, bad as landlordism is to-day, it would be twenty times worse if you were to weaken the power of national organisation."

["Hear, hear!"] The sentiment was cheered by hon. Members below the Gangway. That showed that not only did the hon. Member for East Mayo continue strong in the faith, but all his followers below the Gangway heartily agreed with him. They were told by the hon. Member for North Louth that he was quite as impartial as any of them, and that he might be relied upon to appoint Sub-Commissioners who would hold the scales fairly between the landlord and tenant. The hon. Member for North Louth, in the year 1882, said—

"We believe that landlordism is the prop of English rule, and we are working to take that prop away."

Later on he said—

"... We wish to get rid of British rule in Ireland. Landlordism is the prop of that rule, and must be abolished."

Again, on October 9, 1887, the same hon. Member said—

"When I go about the country, and when I see the big houses empty and untenanted and rotting, I say to myself, 'Glory be to God that I have lived to see this day!'"

This was the hon. Gentleman who was free from anything like malignity, and who would have a judicial frame of mind in appointing Sub-Commissioners. The hon. Member for Louth fell with great fury upon Mr. Le Poer Trench, who would be admitted, by every person who practised in the law in Ireland, to be one of the fairest and most upright lawyers they ever had. He had never before heard the slightest suggestion that Mr. Trench would be partial, and the statement that he was Lord Clancarty's brother was altogether unfounded. Here was what was said by the Member for North Leitrim at a meeting in County Sligo on October 16, 1892—

"Before I say a word on the question of the reduction of rent, allow me to say that I hold the opinion that there should be no rent paid to the landlords at all. I hold that the land of this country was created for the use and benefit of those who till it, and until that question is settled—as it must be settled soon—there can be no peace, as between landlord and tenant, in the country."

These were the statements of the gentlemen who were to appoint the Sub-Commissioners. He could not really imagine how the Government, having spoken as they had in the past, could fail to see what an outrageous injustice and hardship would be created if they did not accept this clause, either wholly or in part. He quite admitted there was great force in what the Chief Secretary said as to preventing the Irish Legislature touching the land for all time; but here was a subject brought to their attention, and it was clear the Irish Members thought landlordism was itself something in the nature of a crime or felony. How otherwise could they account for their supporting the Plan of Campaign, which every lawyer in Christendom would say was illegal, and which the highest authorities of all the Churches denounced as immoral? Yet they justified the Plan of Campaign. How could the appointment of Sub-Commissioners be handed over to these men, who would be absolutely the masters of the situation? Of all the judicial persons in the world a Sub-Commissioner was the most irresponsible. He could put what value he liked on the land without giving rhyme or reason for his decision, and it was a difficult thing to raise any rent or lower any rent when once it had been fixed by the Sub-Commissioners. [Mr. BODKIN said it was a very common thing.] It was extremely difficult to effect any change in the question of value, because the Chief Commissioners said the Sub-Commissioners had been to the place and had investigated the whole situation, and they would not reverse the decision of the Sub-Commissioners unless they had gone wrong on some point of law, or unless the Chief Valuer—and he did not suppose such an official would exist under the new régime—reported that the rent had been fixed at a ridiculously low figure. Even if hon. Members were relying on the Court of Appeal, how could the Court of Appeal ever do the work? They would require 200 Sub-Commissioners, and how could three Chief Commissioners ever hope in any way to overtake the amount of work that would be thrown upon them? and, of course, the expense to the landlords would be simply ruinous. To appoint members of Trade Unions in England to compulsorily fix the wages they were to receive from employers was not so absurd as what the Government were doing, because they were actually giving over the appointment of Sub-Commissioners to the Party whose declared aim and object was to destroy and ruin the landlords. He said that the proposal of the Government was unfair, not merely to the landlords, but to the Legislature it was proposed to set up, because a temptation would be put before them which they could not resist. Fancy what would happen to a Member of Parliament who secured the appointment of a Sub-Commissioner favourable to the landlords! He would be at once ejected from his seat, whilst what would happen to the Sub-Commissioner who did not comply with the wishes of the tenants was exemplified by the way in which the Lord Mayor of Dublin was dislodged the other day for some mistake in his social functions. He appealed to the Government, if they wished to retain any reputation for fair play or justice, to deal with the important question placed before them in this clause.

MR. W. E. GLADSTONE (Edinburgh, Midlothian) (who was imperfectly heard) said: I think the House will admit that since the speech of the right hon. Member for West Birmingham (Mr. J. Chamberlain) this Debate has travelled over a field very greatly wider than that defined by the terms of the Amendment. The right hon. Member for the University of Dublin (Mr. Plunket), who found great fault with the Member for North Louth (Mr. T. M. Healy) for certain parts of his speech, not only discussed the Land Question at large, but he also went into the question of the relation of the land to Home Rule, and he said there would have been no Home Rule Question if it had not been for the land. Before addressing myself to the Amendment there is one word the House will consider I am not only justified, but bound to say upon the subject of the character and appointment of Mr. Vernon. It has been said with truth that Mr. Vernon enjoyed the confidence of the Government that appointed him, and of which I had the honour to be the head. Appointments of a secondary character are not matters in which the British Cabinet intervenes, but unquestionably the appointment of Mr. Vernon was an appointment of such importance that it would be most dishonourable on my part to evade any part of the responsibility of that appointment. I am not able to speak with accuracy of all that took place in connection with the Commissioners after the appointment of Mr. Vernon; but as to Mr. Vernon, he was a man not so much to be considered as a person of standing in connection with a particular estate as he was a man who enjoyed largely and widely the confidence undoubtedly of the landlord class in particular, but also of the community at large. He was a person who was held in the highest and even exceptional respect, and it was in that view that the office of Commissioner was conferred upon him without his seeking, and my recollection is that, on the contrary, he was very reluctant to accept the office. Contented with the position he held, and extremely unwilling to put himself into a more forward position; and if he was induced to accept the office it was in consequence of the pressure of the Government upon him, for we believed, whether rightly or wrongly, that his appointment was one that would have the effect on the one hand of preventing violent hostility from the entire landlord class in Ireland, while on the other hand, so far as we knew, he was a person who was not suspected of anything like intentional unfairness against the Nationalist Party. His conduct was very strongly attacked in 1882, but that was the only concerted and violent attack made upon those who worked the Act. The attack was made in the House of Lords under the name of appointing a Committee of Inquiry. We also had a strong attack made in this House, upon Mr. Forster and his appointment of Assistant Commissioners, which Mr. Forster gallantly and successfully defended. Now I come to the question which is immediately before us, and I hope I can confine myself pretty closely to the question. As I understand the matter, my right hon. Friend has fairly stated his case. His contention is that if the Irish Legislature and an Executive enjoying the confidence of the Irish Legislature is invested with the appointment of the Commissioners and Sub-Commissioners that these will be gentlemen who will pay no regard whatever to the specifications of the law, but will proceed entirely on their own absolutely uncontrolled opinion as to an original injustice of Irish landlordism, and administer the law in that spirit with utter and total disregard to every legal obligation. Now, what are the proofs that have been produced of that heavy charge? My hon. Friend the Member for Louth (Mr. T. M. Healy) met the challenge of the right hon. Member for West Birmingham (Mr. J. Chamberlain). Did he accept the doctrine that five years' purchase on a prairie value were the limit of the landlords' fair rights? My hon. and learned Friend stated, in the most explicit language, that what he wanted was a fair construction and fair application of the Act of 1881. He stated that if that Act were so applied, and if it presented the prairie value, then he was for prairie value; but if prairie value meant anything less than the value which was the fair construction of the Act, he was not for it. A speech has been produced of a Mr. Harris, now dead. Undoubtedly a very violent speech, in which Mr. Harris said he would come for a slice this year, next year, and the year after, until there was nothing left. But who was Mr. Harris? Undoubtedly he was an Irish Member, but he was not a leading Irish Member. I am bound to admit that the hon. Member succeeded in quoting another Irish Member, who now sits in this House, and who had propounded doctrines as to the payment of small rent and no rent at all, and who said he was inclined to the doctrine of no rent at all; but these are doctrines from which I dissent in the strongest manner. These doctrines, whether of the dead man or of the living man, I conceive to be subversive and dangerous. I believe that Mr. Harris never occupied a position as a leading Member of the Irish Nationalist Party, and my impression is that the hon. Member, the living Member, the single living Member, who has been quoted with any sort of approach to effect, is also a gentleman who has been without experience in Parliament, who probably represents that excited feeling which had undoubtedly called for, if not justified by, the past history of the Land Question in Ireland. As a charge against the sentiments and judgments of those who possess the confidence of the Nationalist Party, they have, so far as the present Debate is concerned, in my opinion entirely broken down. As to the question of the interpretation of the Act, I know that the most monstrous charges are made, and it is right and necessary for us to meet them with the exposition of what are their true character. I have very little hope of making any impression upon the minds of those who sit opposite, but at least I am able to point out that they have succeeded in showing, with regard to one gentleman, now dead, and another now living and occupying a seat in this House, that he holds opinions about rent in Ireland that we are not able to justify, which have not received from us any countenance, and never would receive from us any countenance whatever. Is it really to be a condition of the action of any political Party that no such thing is ever tolerated in it as the utterance of violent opinions? Are you ready to have that test applied to yourselves? What are the doctrines of armed resistance? They are quite as strong as those of prairie value and no rent. Are you in a position to take the mote out of the Nationalist eye and not regard the beam in your own—in the eye not of a dead Member of Parliament, not in the eye of a new-born Member of Parliament, not of men unknown in your ranks, but of your very Leader? The isolated offences of individuals for which you seek to hold the Nationalist Party strictly responsible furnishes a strong contrast to the language used by your Leaders about resistance to the law—language which I believe you will ere long sincerely and cordially regret. [A laugh.] I merely give my opinion. To some gentlemen opposite it appears ridiculous; but it is my belief that there will not be adhesion to these most revolutionary, most disorderly, and most unpatriotic doctrines. My answer is that we have no right to impute this general untrustworthiness to those who now represent the Irish Nationalist Party, nor have we a right to impute it to the Irish people. I do not deny that there is excitement, or that there has been excitement about the Land Question in Ireland; but this I will say: that I believe if we look back over the history of this country the Irish people have been, upon the whole, the best rent-paying people in the world. They have paid rents in silence and without complaint for long periods of years, which no other people have done. Therefore, I hold there is no reason why we should accept the proposition that the Irish nation is to be held generally untrustworthy in regard to the eventual form of and administration of the Land Laws. In reply to my right hon. Friend the Member for West Birmingham (Mr. J. Chamberlain), I have no hesitation in saying that we ought to deal with the Irish Land Question within the three years. The Irish Land Question has been from its origin—by which I mean the period anterior to the first legislation in 1870—a question which presented to us a huge mass of entangled difficulties; but we have made a number of successive steps, and by these steps we have achieved a great deal towards the solution of the question. In my opinion, we have made advances since 1881. I do not deny that the Land Act of the late Government is an advance; in fact, the two Land Bills have been most important advances towards the solution of the Irish Land Question, and the question of the purchase and sale of land, which came at a later period, was a still further advance. If the right hon. Gentleman asks me for my judgment, the best opinion I can form is that it would be impossible for Parliament to pass over those three years without some further legislation with regard to Irish land. But after my 61 years of Parliamentary life I cannot speculate on what I might be doing three years hence. Any opinion I might give on the case must be more or less, from the necessity of the case, of an abstract character; nevertheless, it is my deliberate opinion it would be monstrous to bind the House of Commons. I hold that the Irish Legislature would be under the strongest moral and prudential obligations to deal with the subject in the spirit in which my hon. Friend the Member for Louth (Mr. T. M. Healy) dealt with it to-night. I cannot conceive a stronger moral obligation, for, whatever may be said as to the injustice in which heretofore Irish landlordism was rooted, you cannot, after centuries have elapsed, visit on the children the sins of the fathers; and if you did, the injustice would be as gross as that which had been originally inflicted. But are there in the future to be no landlords in this House or in the other House? The case alleged is that these Assistant Commissioners will not look to the provisions of the Act of Parliament they are to administer; they are all to be men who think the landlord has no title to any rent, and would act in their sentence without any regard to the Act. That, in my opinion, is a monstrous supposition. If the Irish Legislature were to appoint Commissioners who would hold such ideas, or who would give effect to such revolutionary ideas, would that escape notice on this side of the water and in this House? Was approval given to such an idea by the Member for Limerick, or by Mr. Davitt in his remarkable speech which adorned and dignified his too short career in this House? So palpable an injustice would not be tolerated or endured for a moment by the people. Therefore, I think there would be ample security for meeting a case which, if, indeed, it did occur,

would be a grievous case; but the occurrence of which I, for one, have no anticipation. But there is one little circumstance to which I must venture to remind hon. Gentlemen, and it is that often in this House and out of it we hear a studied attempt to identify the landlord class with the loyal minority. We know what is meant by the loyal minority, but I venture to prophesy that when this matter is so far settled as to give into the hands of the Irish Legislature the management of the Land Question, or which is called the Land Question in this House, the landlord class will do well to reckon with, finding among the most difficult and awkward of those tenants with whom they will have to deal a considerable portion of the loyal minority. I should be very glad to hear hon. Gentlemen opposite give us their opinions on this subject. Do they think the Ulster tenants are satisfied with the present landlords? If they are not satisfied on that point, they would do well to take that circumstance into their view in determining their future course. With regard to the Amendment, I would point out that if you pass such an Amendment as this you would, in the first place, introduce an anomaly that is without justification; and, in the second place, you would introduce a machinery which could never be made permanently workable. Are we to allow the Irish Legislature to make all the laws with regard to the land, and then are we to exclude the Legislature from all influence over the administration of those laws? I am not prepared to take a course that shall abrogate and stultify the very first principle of the Bill by introducing into it a mechanism which proceeds entirely upon the old principle that Ireland is to be governed not by its own free action in its own domestic affairs, but is to be governed by influences brought to bear upon it from beyond the Channel; and that the English Cabinet, without any responsibility to Irish authority, is to determine from year to year and generation to generation who are to be the persons appointed. In my opinion, that would indeed be a very great mistake—a great mistake in the interest of the landlords themselves; and were I in their position I should represent to them that it would be safer to leave the responsibility of these appointments to the domestic Legislature, but using all the means they could to maintain a lively observation from British quarters on what the Irish Legislature did in quittance of that responsibility. That would be a far safer position for the Irish landlord than to introduce into the heart of the Bill an important administrative provision contrary to its spirit; provoking, irritating, and exasperating to Ireland in every point of administration of this vital question, and binding a final farewell to all the hopes we, at any rate, cherish, and failing to give to this Act something in the nature of a solid and permanent settlement. On these grounds I follow my right hon. Friend in offering a decided opposition to the adoption of this Amendment.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: The right hon. Gentleman who has just sat down began his observations by attacking my right hon. Friend near me, the Member for the University of Dublin, for traveling beyond the scope of this Amendment. I would remind the right hon. Gentleman that this is the first opportunity on this Bill on which the peculiar methods of Parliamentary management adopted by the Government have allowed us to say a word on what, after all, is the vital centre of the Irish controversy—namely, the Land Question. It certainly is not a strange thing that some hon. Members should have been tempted to move slightly beyond the rigid points of the Amendment actually before us. But, while such procedure is excusable, I do not admit that the Opposition have been the offenders. The Prime Minister, who is so anxious for the relevancy of our Debates, and who when he is attacking us is most anxious that ample debate should be allowed, himself dragged in an attack I did not discover on whom, but on those he described as the Leaders of the Unionist Party, for having made certain speeches which he interpreted as an incitement to violence in Ulster. Those speeches may or may not have been made, and the subject is one which may or may not be open to the criticism of the Prime Minister; but what has the criticism to do with the Amendment before the House, and who is guilty of dragging in irrelevant subjects likely to embitter and prolong debate? I freely grant, however, that the right hon. Gentleman was not the chief offender. The chief offender, no doubt, was the hon. Member for North Louth (Mr. T. M. Healy), who made a speech most characteristic of him ; and if the hon. Member will allow me to give him a piece of advice it will be not to attempt by such speeches to further Government business. It was the kind of speech I have often listened to from the hon. Gentleman, and the kind of speech which, when I sat on the Bench opposite and was anxious for the rapid progress of business, I was frequently obliged to listen to in silence. But on the present occasion I would say that the speech of the hon. and learned Member seemed to me to be almost absolutely irrelevant and characterised by that gross want of taste to which the House is accustomed from that particular quarter, and to be adorned by those attacks on the absent and the dead which the hon. Member is peculiar for. With regard to the greater number of persons the hon. and learned Member dragged into the controversy I do not intend to delay the House. Lord Ashbourne, for example, is capable of taking care of himself ; but when the hon. Member attacked a man like Mr. Wrench, who, from his position, is incapable of replying, and when I know those accusations to be absolutely unfounded and totally devoid of a shadow of accuracy, it is necessary that I, who know Mr. Wrench well, and how much he deserves the confidence of every man interested in the impartial administration of the Land Law in Ireland, should defend him from the unwarranted attack of the hon. Member—an attack which I do not care further to qualify. I pass to the speech of the Chief Secretary, on which one word of comment is necessary. The right hon. Gentleman repeated, I am sure in perfect good faith, the criticisms which have been passed so often on the Irish landlords in regard to their conduct since the passing of the Land Act of 1881—criticisms which I believe to be utterly unfounded. The right hon. Gentleman asked whether it is possible to defend the Irish landlords when we see that they are only compelled by the action of a judicial tribunal to grant those reductions of rent in Ireland which English and Scottish landlords have voluntarily granted. I do not think that is a fair observation. If the Act of 1881 had not been passed, and the Irish landlords had then refused to reduce the rents, they might have been open to criticism ; but after this House has produced public machinery for the purpose of revising and reducing rents, how can we blame the Irish landlords for saying—"You have provided machinery ; let it work ; we are not going voluntarily through the trouble and expense of estimating the precise amount of rents that may be reduced when you have told us that you mean to do so, in so far as justice requires, by machinery of your own creation. Whatever is done, the rents are to be secured to the tenants for 15 years." I think that that answer is conclusive. I confess, if I had been an Irish landlord in 1882, and my tenants had come to me with a request to reduce their rents, I should have said—"I think reduction very desirable, even necessary, looking at the fall in prices and the state of the crops ; but the State has provided you with a means of arriving at that result, and I advise you to avail yourselves of it." If I had pursued that course with my Irish tenants I do not think it would have lain in the mouth of anyone—certainly not anyone responsible for the passing of the Act of 1881—to criticise my action.

MR. J. MORLEY : Why did you pass the Act of 1887 ?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR : The right hon. Gentleman throws in an interruption which, if I were to deal with it adequately, would double the length of my speech. He asks me why, under the circumstances, we passed the Act of 1887. If he wants my views on the land legislation of Ireland, I would say that my opinion is that the Act of 1881 was taken in the wrong direction. It unsettled the whole Irish Question and settled nothing. The proper mode of dealing with the Irish Land Question, according to my view, is now, and always has been, by the extension of the scheme of Land Purchase. As the Government, against my protest, insisted on passing the Act of 1881, and against an Amendment which I moved, it became necessary that we should patch up the sinking ship and try and make the machinery work ; and though I do not look forward to the particular clauses of the Act of 1887 with any special admiration or affection, I believe they were absolutely necessary as a consequence of the disastrous legislation for which the right hon. Gentleman and his friends were responsible. That is a parenthesis extracted from me by the interruption of the right hon. Gentleman. I now come to what is the very heart of this matter—"What is the action which we are justified in expecting from hon. Gentlemen below the Gangway in the appointment of the Sub-Commissioners when they have the power?" How did the Prime Minister deal with that question? The right hon. Gentleman took the speech of the hon. Member for Londonderry (Mr. Ross) and said that two speeches had been dragged to light made by Irish Members—one by a Mr. Harris, now dead, and the other by the hon. Member for Leitrim. The speeches were described by the Prime Minister as deplorable, and speeches of which the Home Rule Party could not in any way approve. He said they were speeches which did not represent the general policy of hon. Gentlemen from Ireland. On the contrary, I maintain that they represent absolutely the policy of those hon. Gentlemen; and if my hon. Friend quoted no other speeches it was not because there were no other speeches to quote. Such speeches abound, and may be found in scores in the evidence given before the Special Commission. I will read one sentence from the finding of the Commissioners. They said—

"In our judgment the leaders of the Land League . . . combined together to carry out a system of boycotting, and by a system of coercion and intimidation to promote agrarian agitation against the payment of agricultural rents for the purpose of impoverishing and expelling from the country the Irish landlords, who were styled 'the English garrison.'"

MR. W. E. GLADSTONE: Where did I use it?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: He certainly did so—there is no question about it. But it is a small matter. Who were the persons against whom that verdict was found? I will not read all the names, but in the first column we find these: Mr. Dillon, Mr. Sexton, Mr. J. O'Connor, Mr. W. O'Brien, Mr. T. D. Sullivan, Mr. A. O'Connor, Mr. Harrington, Mr. Justin M'Carthy, Mr. Condon. Let the right hon. Gentleman, therefore, notice that our case does not depend upon the chance utterances either of Mr. Harris or of the hon. Member for Leitrim. It depends upon a long series of statements of the most influential gentlemen below the Gangway, which have been quoted and investigated ad nauseam, with regard to which no possible doubt can be entertained, and which produced such an impression on the minds of right hon. Gentlemen opposite in happier times, that they came forward and said under such circumstances that it was an obligation of honour to settle the Irish Land Question before Home Rule was granted. That being the evidence on one side, what is the evidence the right hon. Gentleman has brought forward on the other? The only trace of evidence which he alluded to in the whole of his speech was what has fallen from the hon. and learned Member for Louth. And what did he say? That hon. Member said—

"We only desire to administer and interpret the Act of 1881. The intention of that Act is to give all the improvements to the tenants, and we propose so to interpret the Act that they shall get the value of those improvements and nothing else."

What can be fairer, said the Prime Minister, and, indeed, properly interpreted, what could be fairer? But that statement, which appears to be so clear and precise, is, as everybody who has investigated the subject knows perfectly well, full of fallacy and capable of an interpretation which means nothing less than highway robbery. If you are going to argue, as I have heard many respectable people argue, that the landlord has done nothing, and that the tenant has made all the improvements, such as they are, so that the whole value of the land is produced by the tenant, and, therefore, the tenant ought to pay no rent, I would ask, has it ever occurred to gentlemen who argue in this way that if the land without the improvements is worthless the improvements without the land are worthless? The whole question is how they were to divide, as between landlord and tenant, the fair share which belongs to each. It is not only not just to say that the landlord had no value in his property because the land without improvements is worthless; but it is a grossly absurd doctrine and little short of public plunder, and if the hon. Member for Louth and his friends are going to interpret their policy as accepted by the Prime Minister in that sense, then I say they will not only have a policy which has for its object the impoverishing and driving out of the "English garrison," but they will entirely succeed in that object, and not a single landlord in Ireland will be able to obtain a single atom of that property which on every equitable principle really belongs to him. I want the right hon. Gentleman to realise exactly what are the dangers which we wish to guard against by this Amendment. It being granted, as it must be granted, that the policy of the future Home Rule Government will be an anti-landlord policy, how will that Government be able to carry out its objects? There are three methods or instruments by which that policy may be carried out. It may be done by legislation; it may be done through Executive action; and, unfortunately, under the existing system in Ireland, it may be done by judicial action. With regard to legislation I will say nothing. That is a subject which will, I hope, come up for discussion hereafter. With regard to Executive action, we have already endeavoured, in one of the Amendments moved from this Bench, to make it impossible for the Irish Government by simply refusing protection to prevent landlords from getting their just rights. On that, again, I will say nothing. But the third and the most insidious and dangerous of all these methods is the judicial method, by which, without passing any Act of the Irish Legislature, and without committing any gross breach of Executive duty, it will be possible for the Irish Government slowly to eat up any property of the Irish landlords until everything that the hon. Member for Leitrim in the moment of his most ardent eloquence can desire will be absolutely accomplished. What are the safeguards? The veto is held out as a method of stopping all flagitious legislation; but here the veto cannot step in. With regard to the Executive action, we are told that it is the duty of every officer of the Crown in Ireland to carry out the law, and that there will be a remedy if he fails to do so. But what remedy is there against bad appointments to the Land Commission? The Prime Minister says "keep a lively observation" upon the appointments made by the Irish Executive in the matter of these Sub-Commissioners. Well, I have two observations to make on that argument. The first is, that if we are to keep a lively observation, with the accompaniment of perennial Debates, upon the exercise of patronage by the Irish Government, then we do not get rid of the Irish Question by passing Home Rule. My second observation is, that the liveliest observation carried on by the most critical majority or minority in this House or in the other House could not really guard against this particular danger. How will the qualifications or the fairness of these Sub-Commissioners be adequately dealt with in a Debate across the Table of this House or in the other House? Such things rest, and must always rest, upon the competence and honour of the appointing Government. It would be perfectly vain for us, or any aggrieved Irish landlord in the other House, to get up and say Mr. So-and-So is a bad appointment, for he has expressed certain views as to prairie value which indicate that he is going to rob the landlords. It is impossible to make these observations and produce any effect by them. The mischief will be done by these bad appointments without its being possible for either House by a Resolution, or by any other machinery, to intervene in the least. The fundamental danger of the situation is that we have got a land system in Ireland which is essentially unworkable in the best of times; but if it be workable at all, it is only workable if it is administered by men appointed by an absolutely impartial tribunal. Everything depends upon the nature of the tribunal. If we pass Home Rule, in whose hands will these appointments be left? They will be left in the hands of an Assembly 99-100ths of which depend absolutely upon the tenants' vote. The right hon. Gentleman surprised me a little while ago by his statement that the tenants of Ulster might be disposed to take as extreme a view of the Land Question as the tenants anywhere else, but if that statement is true it is only an additional reason for the Amendment. I do not wish to argue this question as if it were a question between Loyalists and Nationalists. I desire to argue it upon broader grounds; and I say that if you are really going to leave the whole decision as to the value of one great source of property in Ireland to a tribunal which is a monstrous overgrowth of that system, and to say that that tribunal is to be appointed solely by one party to the suit, it will be a monstrous thing to do. If we could conceive ourselves as going back to Grattan's Parliament, in which both Assemblies were composed of landed proprietors, I should say it would be as monstrous a thing to hand over the Land Question to the landlords as it would be now under Home Rule to hand it over to the tenants. Therefore, it appears to me that we have undertaken a most difficult and delicate responsibility with regard to landlords in Ireland. The Act of 1881 was accompanied by promises to these men which cannot be fulfilled unless the Imperial Parliament retains in its hands the administration of that Act. Whether the impartiality of this great Assembly is sufficient to work so difficult a system as the Act of 1881 I very much doubt. The Debate of to-day is sufficient evidence that both landlords and tenants think themselves aggrieved by its working. But of this I am certain—that that which is a task almost too hard to be performed by this House is one far beyond the power of any Assembly in Ireland which depends for its constitution, its existence, and its character on the votes of one, and only one, of the two great parties to this suit about the land.

MR. RENTOUL (Down, E.) wished to make one or two observations, as the hon. Member for North Kerry (Mr. Sexton) had remarked upon the fact that no one representing an Irish Unionist rural constituency had taken part in the Debate. [Cries of "Divide!"] He represented such a constituency; and in reply to the Prime Minister, who said that the Ulster agriculturists would probably be as difficult to deal with as any other farmers, he wished to say that he agreed with the right hon. Gentleman. It would be very unfortunate in Ireland to leave the interests of the landlords to any rural Representatives, whether Unionist or Home Rule. They knew that in all the counties of Ireland under the peculiar land system which there prevailed the tenant farmers would be the worst judges of matters in any way affecting the interests of the landlords. He himself should be extremely sorry to have the Land Question left to his own arbitrament, representing his present constituency. He had been returned by the tenant farmers of an agricultural constituency, and he, for one, should be extremely sorry to have to hold the balance between the rights of the landlords and the demands of the tenants. All Ulster Members representing agricultural constituencies had come in at the last election pledged to compulsory sale. It was clear that Members pledged to that were pledged to try and get the Land Question settled and put out of the way, and in their opinion this Parliament was the Parliament to settle the question. [Cries of "Divide!"]

SIR T. LEA (Londonderry, S.) said, he intended to reserve the remarks he had proposed to make on this subject until a later occasion, but he wished now to correct a mis-statement made by the hon. Member for Louth (Mr. T. M. Healy). It was not accurate to say that the late Government had filled the Land Commission with their own nominees. As a matter of fact, the majority of the Sub-Commissioners were appointed by the present Prime Minister.

Question put.

The House divided:—Ayes 138; Noes 173.—(Division List, No. 264.)

*MR. SPEAKER: The next Amendment is in the name of the hon. Member for South Londonderry (Sir T. Lea) as follows:—

(Elections not to be held on Sunday.)

"In no case shall any election to the Legislative Council, the Legislative Assembly, or the Imperial Parliament be held on Sunday."

That is not in Order. Sunday elections have been excluded in the Ballot Act. But, however that may be, there will be opportunities for raising the matter in the Bill—possibly on the Sixth Schedule.

MR. HENEAGE (Great Grimsby) said, he had given notice to move the following Clause:—

(Rights in sea fisheries.)

"No inhabitant of the United Kingdom shall be deprived of the rights and privileges of equal treatment as regards public sea fisheries, and no person carrying on any special fishing trade or industry shall obtain any undue preference in Ireland or Irish waters so as prejudicially to affect other persons engaged in the fishing trade, part of whose business may be carried on in some other part of the Queen's dominions." He thought, however, that the Amendment to Section 5 of Clause 4 to be moved by the Chief Secretary would cover the point he had in view, taken in conjunction with Clause 3. Under the circumstances, he would not move his new clause.

*MR. GIBSON BOWLES (Lynn Regis) moved the insertion after Clause 5 of the following Clause:—

(Resolutions of Privy Council to be signed.)

"All resolutions taken upon any matter or thing transacted in the Privy Council of Ireland, or in the Executive Committee of such Privy Council, shall be signed by such of the Privy Council as shall advise and consent to the same."

He said, his proposal raised a point of high Constitutional Law which he wished had fallen into better hands than his. Its object was to make Ministerial responsibility a reality instead of, as it was at present, a sham. It was now considered that the responsibility of the Cabinet was collective, and that there was no individual responsibility at all. He submitted that if it were wished to enforce responsibility in any department of life the practical and only possible method was to enforce it on an individual and not on a Corporation. When a burglary was committed the authorities did not complain of the abstract criminal classes; they sought out a concrete Bill Sykes with a concrete crow-bar, put him into a concrete prison, and fed him on concrete skilly. If there was one excuse better than another for the new clause he proposed it was that it was no invention of his own. The clause was extracted from the Act of Settlement. When the English people came to make a new contract with a new dynasty they found it necessary to lay down certain Constitutional rules. The provision from which his clause was taken was passed as the result of a solemn decision by a Committee of the House of Commons, that decision being that before any new limitation of the succession should be agreed to it was necessary to make further security for the rights and liberties of the people. Of course, he knew that the students of the Constitution would at once say that the clause was repealed five years after it was passed. It was repealed, no doubt, because of the inconvenience the Ministry felt might be inflicted on them by the clause, and because they were agreed that they would face anything rather than individual responsibility for their political acts. But the rule laid down in the Act of Settlement was no new thing. It was simply a declaration of what had always been the law of England, and of the rule that had been universally followed till the evil time of the Restoration. Charles II., wishing to be absolute on the French plan, as it was said, and the Ministers being only too ready to second him in his attempt, the idea was first conceived of that Ministerial Body unknown to our law—the Cabinet Council, which was invented for the ease and comfort of the King and the Ministers, and as a cover for all their acts, however illegal. The establishment of the Cabinet Council was not, however, allowed to pass without protest in the House of Commons. One Member said that the method of resolving upon things in the Cabinet and then bringing them before the Privy Council for the assent of that Body had not been the method of England, and he added—"If this method be, you will never know who gives advice." Another Member said he had heard that the distinction between the Cabinet Council and the Privy Council was that the Privy Council were such as were thought to know everything and knew nothing, whilst those of the Cabinet thought that nobody knew anything but themselves. Macaulay said of the Cabinet that during many years old-fashioned politicians continued to regard the Cabinet as an un-Constitutional and dangerous Board, and he added that it had continued to be unknown to the law. Hallam said that the Cabinet had no legal existence, and that such responsibility as was attached to it had no tangible character. The last quotation with which he would trouble the House was to the effect that should the policy of these men arouse a popular cry against them and a penalty be demanded, they would invariably enshroud their persons in the dark recesses of the Cabinet, and thus seek to escape the burden of individual responsibility. The old method he had sufficiently indicated by the extracts he had read. The new method was one under which the gravest affairs of State were decided by a Body unknown to the law and incapable of being tracked in any one of its deeds. They constantly had had to discuss allegations as to what had passed on important affairs in the Cabinet. In 1878

there was a dispute between Lord Derby and Lord Salisbury on the question of Cyprus, the one contradicting the other, and, as no records were kept, it remained to this day a question as to which of the two statesmen was right. And it would have still so remained even had impeachment depended upon it. They were told that Ministers might be impeached, but how were they going to get evidence for it? The method of impeachment had not been resorted to since the time of Warren Hastings, and in his case it was only successful because it rested, as Burke told them, on records signed by Warren Hastings himself. He could show by quotations—

MR. J. MORLEY: I rise to Order. I wish to know whether the hon. Member is in Order in going into these quotations?

*MR. SPEAKER: It appears to me not quite relevant to the clause to go into these matters of by-gone history. I am of opinion that the argument upon the proposed clause could have been put into a very few words.

*MR. GIBSON BOWLES said, that he would follow that intimation, and abbreviate his remarks. All he had desired to say on the point was that as in the past, so in the future, signatures would be necessary in case of impeachment. He admitted that he never expected to receive any support for this clause from any Minister or ex-Minister, nor even from anyone with the least hope of becoming a Minister. They would all wish to enshroud themselves in the secrecy of the Cabinet, and to get rid of all responsibility. Hence his proposal would not receive the support it ought to. The subject, however, deserved attention, and this proposal was an attempt to restore the responsibility of the Minister, which alone was the condition for securing the liberties and rights of the people.

Clause (Resolutions of Privy Council to be signed,)—(Mr. Gibson Bowles,)—brought up, and read the first time.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Clause be read a second time."

MR. J. MORLEY: I do not think I need detain the House in opposing a proposition for which the hon. Member admits that he does not expect the support of any responsible Member in the House. It can scarcely be professed that it needs serious treatment. The hon. Member says that a proposal that a Minister who takes part in the Cabinet deliberations shall sign any Resolution that may be carried is ancient law, and part of our ancient Constitution. I affirm, without fear of contradiction, and in spite of the authorities he has cited, that it has not been the law of England for a single day, except during the period it was contained in a clause in the Act of Settlement which never operated, and which, in fact, was promptly repealed. It is interesting, on the threshold of the 20th century, to find a gentleman coming to the House and attempting to revive a proposal which was found almost too strong for the Tories at the beginning of the 18th century. Why did not the hon. Member propose that no Minister holding office under the Crown should have a seat either in that House or in another place?

MR. GIBSON BOWLES: I am going to propose that later on.

MR. J. MORLEY: I will not detain the House any longer in explaining that we cannot accept a proposal which the hon. Gentleman himself admits his own Leaders are as unwilling to support as I am.

Question put, and negatived.

MR. ARNOLD-FORSTER (Belfast, W.) rose to move, as a new clause, the following:—

(Confidential documents to be removed to London.)

"On or before a day to be appointed by Her Majesty in Council, and not later than one month before the appointed day, all papers, letters, and other documents of a confidential nature relating to the detection or punishment of crime, the administration of justice, and the treatment of prisoners which at that date shall be in the custody of any department or official in Ireland, shall be removed from Ireland, and shall be handed over to the custody of Her Majesty's Principal Secretary of State in London; and such papers, letters, and documents shall not at any time be open to the inspection of any official save with the written permission of Her Majesty's Principal Secretary of State."

Notice taken, that 40 Members were not present; House counted, and 40 Members being found present,

MR. ARNOLD-FORSTER said, he would not detain the House long in moving this Amendment, as it was possible it would prove acceptable to the Government, because the major part of the proposition, as it stood, was put by him in the form of a question to the Prime Minister, in the early part of the Session, and the right hon. Gentleman gave an answer which seemed to be favourable to the end he had in view. He had put the proposition in the form he now submitted it to the House for two reasons—first, because he did not think the Government had as yet taken any steps to give effect to the object he had at heart; and, in the second place, because there were certain conditions which were essential with a view to carrying out this purpose which could not, of course, be mentioned in the question as he had put it, or in the answer which he had got, and which he was anxious should be brought under the consideration of the Government. The necessity of taking some such steps as he proposed must be obvious to every person who considered the matter dispassionately. He believed he was correct in saying that there was no one so strongly in favour of withdrawing the documents from Dublin than the present Secretary for Scotland, who was Chief Secretary for Ireland at one time. There could be no doubt that if Home Rule were carried there would be an absolute necessity that the continuity of the Post Office in Ireland should be broken to the extent of removing all papers which would compromise persons from the purview of the Irish Government. He attached some importance to the measure by which the course he suggested would be carried out. He thought something more was wanted than that the papers should be merely taken out of the cognisance and control of the Home Department which would be set up in Ireland under this Bill. It was absolutely necessary that a definite pledge should be given to the House that the papers would be removed entirely out of the purview of every person who either directly or indirectly might give some publicity to those papers, or use them to lead to compromising the safety or welfare of any individual. He wished to make it quite clear that he was not speaking alone of those documents relating to information given to the police in the discharge of their onerous duties; because though he felt strongly that they owed a clear and obvious duty to those whom the police might have employed, in whatever form, to assist them in carrying out the Executive work of the Government of Ireland, and though he was clear that while they were not making many friends, they were in great danger of making enemies of those who had been their friends, it was not alone on behalf of those people that he desired to move this clause. It was the duty of all citizens to assist the law—a fact which was sometimes forgotten—by giving information to the police for the purpose of detecting criminals, as well as attending subpoenas and serving on juries. But he had in his recollection many incidents during the past 10 years in Ireland in which persons who, by obeying the positive demands of the Constitution in respect to carrying out the Criminal Law, had earned the hostility of parties in Ireland, and who would undoubtedly, if those records were placed at the disposal of the new Government, be open to grave and serious risk. He was not exaggerating in this matter, because anyone who was familiar with United Ireland must know that no pains were spared—no trouble was thought too great—in dogging men and women in order to bring up against them anything that might be considered as showing complicity in the carrying out of the law. Then there was another important reason why he proposed this clause. For many years past the Executive had been compelled to take steps not only for the protection of life and property in Ireland, but for the protection of life and property in England, and, for all he knew, a great deal of the information accumulated by the Government in regard to outrages in Great Britain still remained in the archives of Dublin Castle; and it required no argument to show the undesirability of these documents falling into the hands of gentlemen who were more or less indirectly connected with the organisation with which the persons responsible for some of those acts were more or less remotely connected. There was also the danger that if the documents were destroyed there would be an unfortunate lapse in the continuity of their justice, and they might find themselves some future day without some of the essential links that the police ought to have in their hands. He did not suppose that anybody acquainted with the difficulties of Executive Government in Ireland would deny that under Home Rule there would be the possibility of some of these documents receiving publicity. Everyone must be familiar with the cases of telegrams disclosed and confidential circulars published, showing a regular conspiracy conducted against the officers who were responsible for carrying out under difficult circumstances the duties which justice imposed upon them. He, therefore, was compelled to believe that if the least opportunity were given for the disclosure or purloining of these documents, the documents might become the property of those whose property they ought not to be. There was only one remedy—that was, to remove all such papers out of the power of those persons who would be responsible for the government of Ireland under this Bill, and transferring them to the custody of some English authority, such as the Secretary of State. He begged to move his Amendment.

Clause (Confidential documents to be removed to London,) — (Mr. Arnold-Forster,)—brought up, and read the first time.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Clause be read a second time."

THE CHIEF SECRETARY FOR IRELAND (Mr. J. MORLEY, Newcastle-upon-Tyne): I cannot but remember that the hon. Gentleman who proposes this new clause in the year 1886 wrote a letter to a newspaper in which he raised this topic, and in which he said it was bad enough that at that moment all these confidential papers, which he now refers to, were under my supervision and in my power. The hon. Gentleman, who has since, I hope, obtained a better knowledge of things in Ireland, will not think for one moment, under present circumstances, that confidential documents which would compromise those who assisted the Executive Government in their difficult work in Ireland are now in danger of betrayal. But that is only a personal remark in passing. I think the hon. Member will see that his proposed clause is very wide; it would cover all papers and documents relating to the administration of justice and the treatment of prisoners. Surely the hon. Member will agree—and I gathered from his speech he would agree—that it would be an excessive demand to insist upon the transfer to England of all documents. In answer to a question put by the hon. Member on 6th June, the Prime Minister divided the documents into two classes—routine documents and those of a personal, confidential, and secret nature; and he insisted that a distinction should be made between those two classes. Therefore, the hon. Member is really forcing an already open door. There is no difference of opinion as to the undesirability of allowing certain documents to remain in Dublin. I must point out to the hon. Member what he has overlooked, that provision is already made in the 33rd clause of the Bill for the "transfer of such property, rights, and liabilities as to Her Majesty may seem necessary or proper to carry into effect," and that would, of course, cover documents which are the property of Her Majesty. Now, all these papers to which the Motion refers are the property of the Government, and, therefore, it will be for the Government of the day to determine what documents they will and will not transfer. If it were a Tory Government, at all events they would not be likely to transfer compromising documents. A Liberal Government would be bound by the pledge of the Prime Minister, which I myself am quite willing to renew. There is no difference between the hon. Member and ourselves. We already provide for it in the Bill, and under no possible condition of Executive Government in this country can we conceive imperilling and compromising documents would be transferred; and, therefore, I hope the hon. Gentleman will see that the object he has in view will be fully met without this clause.

MR. W. KENNY (Dublin, St. Stephen's Green) asked to whose custody the documents would be transmitted, supposing the transfer were made?

MR. J. MORLEY: That is a matter which I confess I have not considered, but there will be no difficulty, when the time comes, in deciding into whose custody they will be given. It will only be done by the consent of the Secretary of State.

MR. SEXTON (Kerry, N.): I admit that the hon. Gentleman the Member for West Belfast (Mr. Arnold-Forster) is probably more competent to deal with an Amendment of this kind and with certain other matters that he has brought before the House—as, for instance, crime in County Clare—than any other Member in the House. The hon. Gentleman had the distinction, if I may so call it, of being personally connected with the Government of Ireland during a memorable period. He had some relations, if not official at least personal, with Dublin Castle at that time, and he is probably well aware—and it is no doubt the inspiring motive of the Amendment—that there are many documents there which will not bear the light. The reasons given by him are curious. First, that the Government had so far not carried out the promise made to him at an earlier date in the Session. But if he could assure us that the House of Lords will pass this Bill we could then, perhaps, see the urgency of this Amendment. So far no such announcement has been made by any person in authority, and therefore, I should suppose, there is plenty of time for dealing with this matter. The hon. Gentleman spoke of documents compromising persons. I must say I felt it rather difficult to reconcile that matter with the Amendment before the House, because in the Amendment he speaks of—

“Documents of a confidential nature relating to the detection or punishment of crime, the administration of justice, and the treatment of prisoners.”

I can hardly imagine how a document relating to those matters would compromise anybody. Certainly not the Judges who tried the cases, nor the prisoners who were condemned. The hon. Gentleman contradicted himself in one part of his speech. He claimed that documents relating to crime committed in Great Britain should remain in the custody of the Imperial Government, and that unless such documents remained in such custody the continuity of criminal justice would be destroyed. That is a two-headed argument; for if the documents relating to Great Britain are necessary to secure the continuity of criminal justice in Great Britain, does it not follow that documents relating to crime in Ireland should be retained by the Irish Government for the purpose of securing the continuity of criminal justice in that country? It is quite clear that the documents relating to the detection or punishment of crime, the administration of justice, and the treatment of prisoners will be absolutely required for the purposes of the Government of Ireland. I do not know what documents would be left behind if this Amendment were carried. It even excludes documents which are the necessary tools of any Government, and without which no body of men could enter upon the government of any country. I regard it as an affront on the Irish people, or any Government they might elect, to suggest that the official documents which they would have access to would be used for the purpose of undue disclosure, or anything of the kind. I have no objection whatever to the reply that has been given by the Chief Secretary. I have no doubt that if the Liberal Party are in Office the question will be properly dealt with. Even if the Tory Party were in Office, I do not consider it very likely that they would remove from the custody of the Irish Government any documents necessary for the carrying on of the government of the country. I am at a loss to understand the aim of the hon. Gentleman when he speaks of documents of a confidential nature. In the transaction of the business of every Government there are documents which are absolutely necessary for the conducting of the work of government. If there are any documents in Dublin Castle which were handed in by private informers which, whether they contained true or false information, might expose the persons who sent them in to danger and injury, I would not object to the removal of those documents. My satisfaction would be complete if the authors of these documents left the country with the documents.

MR. ARNOLD-FORSTER said, he had in view special communications from persons who had claimed and received protection.

MR. SEXTON: I say if there are any persons in Ireland who, during the recent troubled period, sent in letters to Dublin Castle, either giving information or seeking protection, I think, especially seeing that such a state of things has passed away, no reasonable end could be gained by desiring to keep those documents in Dublin Castle, or even in existence. With the exception of documents which would expose the persons who wrote them, and wrote them in the faith and confidence that they would not be disclosed, and who, if they were disclosed, would be exposed to injury and danger—I say that with that exception the punishment of crime, the administration of justice, and the treatment of prisoners are part of the necessary tools of government, and should not be taken out of the hands of the Irish Government. I will make another exception. I should think that this Amendment applies to papers relating to the present generation; and if there be papers in Dublin Castle, no matter what their character may be, which date before the present generation, and do not concern the present generation, I think they ought not to be destroyed, as they would probably be most useful and interesting from an historical point of view.

MR. MAC NEILL (Donegal, S.) said, he had no doubt that the Chief Secretary had probably examined some of the documents in Dublin Castle, which were open to the perusal of everyone. Some of these documents were of great historic value. They used to be in the custody of Sir Bernard Burke, and he told him (Mr. Mac Neill) that the rule respecting them was this—that he would let anyone look at documents 50 years old, and that anything of a shorter age was, for public purposes, excluded. He thought the Chief Secretary would agree with him that nothing would be more unjustifiable than the destruction of those documents. The right hon. Gentleman knew very well that many of the greatest problems of Irish history were not thoroughly solved on account of the destruction of public documents by the authorities. The preservation of these documents was of paramount importance, and historians like Mr. Lecky had placed the greatest stress upon that very point. It was no exaggeration to say that on the documents to be seen in Dublin Castle Mr. Lecky and others had obtained the foundation for the histories they had written. Some of the documents were of the very nature that the hon. Member would wish not to be shown to the present generation. There were documents concerning the Rebellion of 1798. It was quite possible that between 1880 and 1891 documents might have been sent up to the Castle by Irish landlords describing the state of the country, and these would be of interest. As regards the documents sent in by the informers, they should not be destroyed, because they would show the secret springs of the transactions of the period. He could fancy the kind of documents the hon. Member wished to keep from the public gaze. A Castle document came to light in March, 1887, which was a telegram sent by Captain Plunkett telling the Constabulary “not to hesitate to shoot.” He had no doubt there were other documents of the kind which they wanted to have preserved for the purpose of illustrating in after years the character of the Government of the time. He hoped these documents would not be destroyed, as documents were destroyed at the time of the Union, to cover the infamy of the transaction.

SIR H. JAMES (Bury, Lancashire): The hon. Member for Donegal (Mr. Mac Neill) has dealt with the Amendment from an interesting historical point of view; but I do not think his remarks affect the question as to what should be done with these documents. The question raised in the Amendment is one of vital interest to the immediate present and the immediate future. I understand that my right hon. Friend the Chief Secretary has given pledges, and intends to do what the Mover of the Amendment desires; but the right hon. Gentleman must feel that the disclosure of all the communications of the Government during the last few years might have the most painful effect. It is useless to argue whether men fear undue disclosure or not. There are persons who have made communications to the Government, and they are entitled to protection; and I understand that my right hon. Friend accepts that view. The question is whether we are agreed as to the means. The Chief Secretary says that there is sufficient protection in the Bill. I do not know in whom the property in these documents is vested, or to whom it could be transferred. The section to which my right hon. Friend referred has nothing to do with the question. I would ask the Solicitor General in whom now is the property in these documents vested? If the property in the documents is in the State, it cannot be transferred to the State; and the view my right hon. Friend has expressed cannot be carried out under the section to which he has referred. My right hon. Friend has given a pledge; but I am sure he will see that when we are dealing with the formation of a new Government a pledge given in the House of Commons to-day can bind no one. Whom can it bind? Can it bind the Government of Ireland? What is asked for is that there should be something in the way of legislation. At present there is nothing to rely on except a statement made in Debate by my right hon. Friend. I would suggest to the Government that they should endeavour to do something more to carry out that which they desire beyond the mere personal statement of my right hon. Friend.

MR. J. MORLEY said, he never put it on the ground of a personal pledge, but on the ground of the circumstances of the situation.

MR. MACFARLANE (Argyll) said, he would like to know what there was at the present time to prevent the Government of England from transferring as many of these documents as they liked? For his own part, he was very desirous that they should be transferred, because if they became public he would be ashamed for his own country. He hoped the documents might be brought to London and kept in secret until all in that House were dead and gone.

MR. TOMLINSON (Preston) said, it appeared to him that there was no valid objection to the clause, which, if inserted in the Bill, would give effect to the wishes of everyone.

MR. PARKER SMITH (Lanark, Partick) said, the hon. Member for Argyll (Mr. Macfarlane) had put in plain words what seemed to be in the mind of the right hon. Gentleman—that was to say, that transfer of property meant shifting documents from Dublin to London. They were extremely well satisfied with the personal pledge which the Chief Secretary gave; but they were extremely dissatisfied with the clause in the Bill to which the right hon. Gentleman had referred them. He should like to hear what the Solicitor General had got to say on the subject as to the meaning of transfer of property. [The SOLICITOR GENERAL here left the House.] What they felt was that this was a most important point, which ought not to be left to the personal pledges or honour of any gentleman, but ought to be made part of the law; and they did not think that the words to which the right hon. Gentleman had referred them had anything in the world to do with the matter. Those words dealt with the transfer of certain property to the Irish Government for the purpose of carrying on their business; they were the mere carrying out of details for the Executive that was constituted in the Act, and were not germane to the matter at all. If this transfer from Dublin to London was to be carried through, it must be carried through by certain words in the Bill. If the right hon. Gentleman did not like this clause, and was willing to put in certain other words, after his statement that would suit them very well; but they would not leave this on the mere assertion of the honour of the right hon. Gentleman. The hon. Member for North Kerry had asked what were the House of Lords going to do? [Mr. SEXTON: I did not.] Well, the hon. Member said that for them to move any Amendment, or press any point of detail, in face of the fact that the House of Lords were going to throw out the Bill, was unreasonable.

MR. SEXTON said, he had pointed out that if the House of Lords intended to pass this Bill the matter would be urgent, but that otherwise it was not urgent.

MR. PARKER SMITH said, the Government made their pledge, and then their friends made the excuse for them that they had not carried it out, because they could not tell what the House of Lords were going to do. That had nothing to do with the matter at all. Their duty, as the House of Commons, was to discuss and carry through these matters, and to get what was right and reasonable put into Bills, without any consideration at all for what was going to happen in another place, otherwise their proceedings would be reduced to a mere farce. The Solicitor General had retired—doubtless for good reasons; but he did not think that, on a legal point of this kind, the Government should be left without Legal Advisers, and the House referred to technical words which had nothing to do with the matter in question. As to the substantially satisfactory assurance of the right hon. Gentleman, they could rely upon that; but as to the technical method of carrying it into effect that was completely worthless.

Sir H. James

SIR T. LEA said, the Chief Secretary had referred them to a clause which he had told them carried out the spirit of the Amendment. He wished to ask the right hon. Gentleman was this one of the cases in which the word "may" should be read as "shall"? That was rather an important point. The Chief Secretary had given them a pledge, but they did not know who would occupy the position of Chief Secretary in the days to come. Perhaps it might be the hon. Member for South Donegal (Mr. Mac Neill), who had told them he did not approve of documents being taken from Ireland, and in such a case the word "may" would not be read as "shall."

Question put, and negatived.

MR. THEOBALD (Essex, Romford) rose to move the following new Clause:—

(Flags.)

"That it shall be lawful for the occupier of any premises (without any exception) to hoist and fly over them the Union Jack, and to hoist and fly the Royal Standard over any building (no matter what) where any member of the Royal Family may be at the time."

He remarked that as the Chief Secretary had admitted, in an answer to a question he had put to him, that there was some difficulty in connection with this matter, and as the clause afforded an easy means of meeting it, he hoped that his proposal would be accepted by the Government. He said that questions he had put on this subject had caused some hilarity; but that hilarity was proof that some hon. Members did not understand the importance of the matter—some people looked upon the Union Jack or any other flag simply as a pretty piece of bunting. It was true that it was such, but it was also much more, being the public manifestation of the Imperial power, and ought to be so regarded and valued by all who lived under its protection, and, as such, ought to fly over every portion of the Empire. We, living in our quiet homes, did not attach to the National Flag that importance that was paid to it in the Colonies and other parts of the Empire; and as there were certain places in Ireland where it was illegal to hoist either the Union Jack or the Royal Standard, it was to remedy that anomaly that he had moved the new clause. Nationalist Members from Ireland professed to be firmly attached to the Union. If so, they ought to be firmly attached to the Union Jack, as it manifested the unity of the seat of Empire, in that it bore the crosses of St. George, St. Patrick, and St. Andrew, and therefore they ought to vote for the clause. But if they voted against it they would know that their professions were worthless. The hon. Member for North Louth had brought in a Bill entitled "Display of Flags," but what those flags were the House knew not. [Mr. T. M. HEALY: The Bill was blocked by your Party.] At any rate, the House did not know what was in the Bill, as it had not been printed. A few minutes ago it had been suggested to him that the flag might bear a representation of a rising sun as emblematic of the aspirations of the Irish Party. But that would hardly suit the requirements of the case, as in a short time, if those aspirations were realised—as no doubt hon. Members from Ireland believed they would be—it would be necessary to portray on the flag the full risen sun in all its splendour enlightening the earth. If he might make a suggestion, he would suggest that they should on their flag have a representation of the Blarney Stone with a broad grin on its face, as this would mark their satisfaction, and they might term it a happy block, or, still better, a Gladstone, in commemoration of Home Rule. At any rate, a great deal of importance attached to a flag, for so long as it floated over a territory it indicated to whom that territory belonged; and this was manifested in the case of the buildings occupied by Ambassadors or Consuls in this or any other country, as those buildings were regarded as ex-territorial, and as belonging to that Power whose flag floated over them. He must say that he failed to see why it should not be legal to hoist the British Flag over any public-house in Ireland, or to hoist the Royal Standard over any building in which a Member of the Royal Family might be staying. At present it was illegal, and consequently the duty of the Executive was to prevent either flag being hoisted. He did not, for a moment, suppose that any British or even Irish Executive would give orders that it should be hauled down. But in Ireland some new official, or one jealous of performing his duty, might, seeing an illegal act about to be committed, endeavour to prevent that illegal action being performed. Nor would he be wrong in so doing; in fact, his action would be justifiable, and, moreover, if he saw that he alone was unable to prevent the committal of this illegal action, he would be justified in calling on any passers by to assist him. Supposing he called upon an active man passing, who might be the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant, and also a man of large proportions, who, one would naturally infer, would be able to force a way in a crowd, and who might be the Chancellor of the Exchequer—would they assist him? He inferred not. Then the consequences would be that those two right hon. Gentlemen might have to appear in the police court on the following morning, charged with not having assisted a policeman in the legal execution of his duty after having been called on to assist him. He would be sorry to see the Chancellor of the Exchequer and the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant occupying such a prominent position, and therefore asked them by their votes to prevent such a possibility.

Clause (Union Flag and Royal Standard,)—(Mr. Theobald,)—brought up, and read the first time.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Clause be read a second time."

MR. T. M. HEALY said, in the Statute Law Revision Bill, when it reached the Committee stage, he intended to move the omission of the section to which the hon. Member objected, and he thought he might also move in it the repeal of that Habeas Corpus Clause to which the right hon. Member for Bury (Sir H. James) objected. In that way the Statute Law Revision Bill might serve as an outlet to get rid of Amendments on the Home Rule Bill, and would thus be used for a most admirable purpose.

Question put, and negatived.

**MAJOR DARWIN* (Staffordshire, Lichfield) moved in page 4, after Clause 5, to insert the following Clause:—

(Actions against persons subject to military discipline.)

"No civil action or proceeding whatsoever shall be commenced or prosecuted against anyone subject to military discipline for having refused to give assistance in Ireland when required either by any Civil Authority or in consequence of any civil disturbance, if such refusal is in accordance with military orders issued by the advice of the Secretary of State for War."

He said, the object of the clause was to prevent soldiers being prosecuted in a Civil Court for refusing to give assistance to the Civil power, provided that such refusal was in accordance with military orders. As the law now stood, the Sheriffs, Resident Magistrates, and other officers in Ireland could call upon constables to assist them to execute the law, and no Imperial Executive officer could prevent them being so employed. He believed this Common Law principle existed on the broad ground that every man was bound to assist in maintaining the law of the land. That was the principle on which constables could be called upon to assist in maintaining the law of the land, whatever might be the opinion of the Executive as to the advisability of that law. The employment of soldiers, he believed, rested on the same principles as the employment of constables; and, therefore, it would come about that if the Bill was passed as it was at present framed, the Irish Executive would be able to call upon the soldiery stationed in Ireland to help in maintaining the law, whatever might be the opinion of the Lord Lieutenant as to the advisability of that help, and whatever might be the opinion of the Executive Government of this country. He did not mean to say this would often happen. It might be said that the Irish Executive would not call upon the military to aid if the Imperial power was against that aid being given; but it seemed to him that that was a very feeble assurance to rest upon, and if there was the least chance of the military being called upon to aid in maintaining Irish law, he said that the Imperial Parliament and Executive ought to retain an absolute veto in their hands in order to prevent this power being used if contrary to the will of the Imperial Parliament or Executive. The effect of the clause would simply be that the War Office Orders would over-ride the Common Law rights in this particular. If the prophecies of hon. Members on that (the Government) side of the House came true, if all things went well in Ireland, if she continued in a state of peace and prosperity, then no alteration in the mode of employment of soldiers would take place, because no special Orders would be issued by the War Office, and everything would go on exactly as heretofore; therefore it seemed to him that no one sitting on that side of the House need view with any great objection this proposed clause. But if the views of the Unionist Members came true, if the Irish Legislature passed Acts which the Imperial Parliament strongly objected to, or if the Irish Executive carried out Acts in an objectionable way, then, as the Bill stood at present, it would be in the power of the Irish Executive, whatever might be the opinion of the Lord Lieutenant or of the Imperial Government, to call on the soldiery to help them in carrying out these laws. It appeared to him monstrous that the Parliament should provide soldiers liable to carry out laws over which this Parliament would have absolutely no control. If, however, this clause were accepted, and the Irish Legislature did proceed to legislate in an objectionable way, then the War Minister would issue Orders which would prevent the soldiers acting. An important result which would follow from the acceptance of the clause would be that there would always be in this House a Minister responsible for the use of the troops in Ireland. It was most necessary, if they were to maintain complete Imperial supremacy over the troops in Ireland, that they must have a Minister here responsible for their use. He should like to look at this question from the point of view of the soldier. It did not, he thought, require much imagination to see that the position of the soldier in Ireland after the passing of this Bill might, under certain circumstances, become intolerable; therefore it was not unreasonable to demand that he should receive some consideration. The soldier, like any other servant, was bound either to obey his master or leave the Service. The question was, who would be his master if this Bill were passed? He believed the Prime Minister had used words to the effect that he would put as much power over the soldiery into the hands of the Lord Lieutenant as he conveniently could. He could not but believe that the Lord Lieutenant, in his dealings with the Army, must be greatly influenced by the Irish Executive; and therefore it would come about under the Bill that the soldiers serving in Ireland would practically be serving two masters—namely, partly the Imperial and partly the Irish Executive. If both these masters were in accord, and the soldier felt aggrieved as to the duty he had to perform, his only Constitutional course was to retire or buy out, or obey. But, at all events, he thought the soldier could demand this—that if the Imperial and Irish Executive differed as to what was right to be done, he should not then be called upon to act. He had been enlisted to serve the Imperial Executive, and he said there was no moral right—whatever legal right there might be—to transfer his allegiance to the Irish Executive in any sort of way. This appeared to him the consideration the soldier ought to receive under this Home Rule Bill. He was prepared to admit that this was a secondary point, and that the soldier was made for the State and not the State for the soldier. But his main argument was that the Imperial Parliament paid and organised the Army; it paid the Army stationed in Ireland; it put this great weapon into the hands of the Irish Executive; and it seemed to him, under these circumstances, that whatever might be the law, this Parliament would remain morally responsible for the employment of these soldiers in Ireland; and, that being so, they ought certainly to see that they remained masters of the situation. He admitted that, under certain circumstances, it was necessary that the Magistrates and others in Ireland should have the power of calling on the troops in case of sudden emergency. He did not wish to take away that power, which would be specially necessary in future, when the Constabulary were abolished; and he could not help thinking that one of the reasons why the Government had decided on the abolition of the Constabulary was that they thought such an Imperial force ought not to be placed at the disposal of the Irish Executive without check. He considered the same argument applied to the clause he was now proposing. If a Bill of this sort was properly framed, it ought to fulfil three conditions. In the first place, he thought that the Civil power, under ordinary circumstances, ought to have authority to call on the soldiery for help; in the second place, if the soldiery did help, the Irish Executive ought to share the responsibility with the Imperial Executive; and, in the third place, the help ought only to be given if the Imperial Executive considered the help was justified. The Bill as it at present stood did not fulfil the third condition, and the clause he was now proposing was in order to insure that the help given by the soldiery in Ireland was only given when the Imperial Executive considered it right. It might be urged against that clause that when a soldier went on duty of this sort he went as a civilian. Take the case of half a company ordered to the assistance of the Civil power, and the officer refusing to go. His trial in the Civil Court would depend upon the principle of Civil Law that he, as a civilian, was bound to assist. But what about the other 49 men marching under his orders? A soldier, when he was aiding the Civil power, was on active service—that was to say, he was under an exceptionally severe Code of military discipline. Could anybody contend that in such circumstances they went as civilians? The idea was too absurd to be seriously put forward as an argument. Again, it might be said there was no similar veto in England; but he, for one, would be perfectly willing to have a similar veto here. In England the law was that a soldier, who was under the control of Parliament, could be called upon to carry out the laws laid down by Parliament; but it appeared to him that in Ireland they were to pay soldiers to carry out laws over which they would have no control whatever. Possibly he would be reminded of the self-governing Colonies. There were only two places—Nova Scotia and the Cape of Good Hope—at which soldiers existed under an independent government. But even here the analogy with Ireland failed; those places were distant from England; there were sufficient local forces for carrying out the mandates of the local executive; and, above all, in those colonies, it had not been the habit to call on the troops to give assistance to the Civil power. It might be that the phrase “military discipline” in the clause should be “military law”; his meaning was clear, he thought, as he meant those who were subject to military law. He should press this clause upon the Government as a safeguard for the soldier, and still more because it insured the presence in that House of a Minister who would be actually responsible for the employment of the troops in Ireland. The clause would, in fact, make Parliament responsible. He could not think that Government wished to maintain an Army in Ireland for the enforcement of laws passed by the Irish Parliament without having a thoroughly effective veto upon their employment. These considerations weighed with him in bringing forward the clause which he now begged to move.

Clause (Actions against persons subject to military discipline,)—(Major Darwin,)—brought up, and read the first time.

Motion made, and Question proposed, “That the Clause be read a second time.

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL (Sir J. RIGBY, Forfar) said, they sometimes heard a great deal about their interference with the Constitution of the United Kingdom. [Cheers.] Hon. Gentlemen who cheered that statement did not appear to know that the proposal contained in the clause which the hon. and gallant Member had moved would be one of the greatest interferences with the Constitution of the country that could be proposed. For a military man to demand protection was the most natural thing in the world. It would be a very convenient thing if every man under military orders could be told exactly what to do in all circumstances of life; as it would be very convenient for anyone not under military orders. But in cases of civil disturbance, such as were supposed here, there were much greater difficulties imposed upon all of them. They were bound to exercise a right judgment, and to act in accordance with what their duty as subjects of the Queen might demand of them. Whether they were under military law for certain purposes or whether they were not, every man, in case of civil disturbance, was in a very difficult position. It might be his duty to cut off a head or two; and if he did so he might be tried for murder, while if he did not do it he might also be tried for a very serious offence—that of the criminal neglect of his duty. The difficulty was inherent in the nature of the case. Why should a soldier be in a better position than anyone else? There was considerable practical difficulty. To say that a Secretary of State should by his own fiat declare that a certain number of Her Majesty's subjects should be relieved of all responsibility in the case of civil disturbance would be to inflict a grievous blow on the Constitution. Different lawyers—lawyers of the highest eminence—had come to the conclusion that it was a difficult position for a member of the Military Service; but the law had always held that the difficulties must be faced, because a man who served the Queen in a military capacity could not be absolved from the duties of the citizen. Until this Amendment came before him, he had never heard it suggested that a Secretary of State should take upon himself the task of absolving a military servant of the Crown from a difficult responsibility.

*MR. MATTHEWS (Birmingham, E.) said, the hon. and learned Gentleman had hardly thrown upon a difficult subject the amount of light that they had expected. He might have made the picture darker in the case of a military man, because, as they knew, if he went out and took part in the quelling of a disturbance, he might be tried for murder; whereas, if he refused, he might be shot for disobedience to his superior officer. He wished the Solicitor General had told them whether it was the duty of the citizen—an ordinary citizen of the Queen—to go out with gun, bayonet, and sword to quell a disturbance. He believed it was not; he believed the whole extent of the duty of a citizen was to go out as he was—all naked—unarmed. The State did not call upon him to use deadly weapons, nor did it call upon the soldier to do this. He should like to have had a little light upon what seemed to be a difficult question—whether there was really any obligation on a military force to go out as an organised force, under the command of officers, obeying the word of command, and moving as a disciplined and organised body. It had happened to him once or twice, while in Office, to have to call out the military power in aid of the Civil power in the Metropolis; but he confessed he always regarded it as a matter of extremely questionable legality to call upon a body of military men to go out armed with deadly weapons as a disciplined force, and not to go out simply as individual citizens to discharge the duty which attached to each one individually. The duty of the citizen lay upon the soldier, and no more; and he doubted whether they were not acting on their own responsibility in going out as a joint and organised force. Those doubts he could not help having, and he thought neither could others, so long as they had an Imperial force which was there for Imperial purposes. It did not meet the case to say that these men were in the position of a military force, acting under the orders of a superior officer. He was sure he hoped that the future of Ireland would be a peaceable future, and that there would be no necessity for the use of such measures as military force. At the same time, he knew that blood there was warmer than it was here, and that there was a tendency to appeal to military. Indeed, the first thing that struck a visitor to that country was the manner in which the military were called upon in cases of disturbance in Ireland. Conflicts might arise where the military would be used where they were not used here; but, for his part, he was of opinion that the calling out of the military to put down disturbance was a thing not to be encouraged, but to be discouraged. It was a very serious matter to permit any infraction of Constitutional right by the use of an organised body of armed men. He thought that the Amendment, which proposed that the Secretary of State should have a controlling voice, was not unreasonable. There was no necessity to throw on individual soldiers the responsibility of deciding how or when they should assist the Civil power; and the Solicitor General might have given them some information, or tried to show how far the duty rested upon a military force to act as an organised force in such cases as had been mentioned.

COLONEL NOLAN (Galway, N.) said, he had imagined the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Matthews) rose to give them some assistance; but it seemed, from what he had said, that his only object was to get another speech from the Solicitor General. They found, however, that the right hon. Gentleman and the Solicitor General, both eminent lawyers, differed over the Amendment as to the position of the soldier. It occurred to him that, unless Lord Wolseley issued a special Irish edition of his Soldier's Companion, the soldier would be placed in a difficult position if the Amendment were adopted. The Amendment affected the Constitution of the country, and, if it were agreed to, the orders to soldiers would be revolutionised. The Amendment aimed at superseding the custom which had been always recognised, and to throw the whole responsibility upon the Minister. He thought the hon. and gallant Gentleman did not know what the effect of his Amendment would be. The Secretary of State could not give any military orders, and he should not be entrusted with any such power. It was a curious fact, if the contention of the late Home Secretary (Mr. Matthews), who once allowed himself to be returned by an Irish constituency, was correct, that the military were more frequently used in England than in Ireland. The last case in this country was at Hull, and then the Secretary of State had no responsibility—the responsibility belonged to the Magistrates. Southampton was another case in which Magistrates acted, and not the Secretary of State. Here they would propose to let everyone construe for themselves; and the result would be to injure discipline and put the Irish Government at the mercy of the Secretary for War. The hon. and gallant Member would not only revolutionise everything in Ireland, but in England also, for he said he would be willing to see this provision extended to England. He (Colonel Nolan) thought the Constitution in England was a tolerably good one; it had taken a long time to manufacture, but in Ireland it was an extremely bad one. He could not support the Amendment.

MAJOR RASCH (Essex, S.E.) said, he could not accept the view of the Solicitor General on this matter, and he would support the Amendment. The system by which the soldier was tried in the past was disagreeable, but it would be worse in the future if he had to come to the assistance of the Civil power in Ireland. His life, indeed, would not be a happy one. He could only say that, having had some experience of Ireland, he should like to see the Amendment pressed to a Division.

SIR H. JAMES (Bury, Lancashire) said, he thought the intention of the clause was very clear. They were about to establish an Irish Legislature, and under it the Civil power in Ireland was to become paramount to carry out the law of the Irish Legislature, and to have the power of ordering Imperial troops to carry out such law as the Irish Executive might think fit. British officers would be placed in the position either of disobeying the orders of the Secretary of State for War or of the Irish Executive. If British officers disobeyed the Irish Executive they would be liable to a personal action, and if they disobeyed the Secretary for War they would be liable to Court Martial.

COLONEL NOLAN: The Secretary of State cannot give a military order.

SIR H. JAMES said, the hon. and gallant Gentleman was not correct. If he would listen for a moment he would hear. The Secretary of State could give advice to issue an Order, and if he advised it, it would be issued. It would be a Military Order issued on his advice, as contemplated by the terms of the clause. That was the position they had to deal with.

An hon. MEMBER: Does that exist in England?

SIR H. JAMES said, it did. The Secretary of State was controlled by Parliament. Now they proposed to establish a different state of things. It seemed to him impossible that they could avoid adopting some such Amendment as this. The Solicitor General had not touched upon the question at all. The point raised by the Amendment was a most important one, and should be dealt with in the most adequate manner.

MR. CARSON (Dublin University) said, he thought the subject had not been dealt with by the Government with that amount of consideration which it deserved. Any question as to the relations between the Civil power and the military forces of the Crown must be one of the greatest delicacy, and he would like to know what relation was to exist when they had established a separate Legislature in Ireland. They had heard it stated that they had ample security on the point in Ireland. But where was there an example in any portion of the Kingdom or of the Empire according to which a Magistrate appointed by one Government had the right to call out the military forces of another Government? That was the question raised by the Amendment, and, unless some such proposal as this was adopted, he did not hesitate to say that, in his opinion, the management of the troops in Ireland would be absolutely impossible. They must remember that the Irish Magistrates were to be appointed by the Irish Executive; and the Amendment was to provide that when a British officer acted under the Irish Executive and was compelled to obey the Irish Magistrate there ought to be no civil remedy as against such officer. It was clear that the handling of the troops in Ireland would be an impossible task if, when an order was given in Ireland, an officer was to proceed to inquire whether such an order was Constitutional. It was no answer for the Solicitor General to picture the existing difficulties. Those difficulties would be increased tenfold if they were to act as proposed by the Government—under the system that would prevail in Ireland. He hoped some other answer more worthy of the importance of the question would be given.

MR. W. E. GLADSTONE: It appears to me that the argument of the hon. and learned Gentleman is defective in the most elementary considerations. The hon. and learned Gentleman has contended that officers or Magistrates appointed by one Government are to have the power of calling out the military forces of another Government. Can he show how anything of the kind can occur under this Bill when it becomes law? We have heard the question raised as to the right and duty of every citizen to support the law and maintain public order even, if necessary, by the use of force. The question is, What are we going to do under the present Bill? We have placed the military forces under the command of the Viceroy, and the Commission given to him makes him, and nobody else, the judge of what should be done by the military forces in support of civil order. The difficulties which arise under the Common Law, if they exist, will not exist under this Bill or in anything contained in it, and I would ask the hon. and learned Gentleman (Mr. Carson) where he can find the material for defending the extraordinary proposition that under this measure the officers appointed by one Government are to be at the disposal of officers appointed by another Government? It is quite obvious that the question raised in the extraordinary proposition of the hon. and learned Gentleman, so far as it is relevant at all, is a question that will arise in every one of our colonies that has responsible self-government. In the case of this Bill we deal with the legitimate action of the Executive under the Commission of the Lord Lieutenant, which gives him, as Her Majesty's Governor General, “Power and authority to give such orders and directions to the Commander of the Forces for the time being in Ireland as he, our Governor General, may judge necessary for the support of the Civil authority, the protection of our Revenue,” and other purposes. It is consequently to the Governor General, and not to the Irish Executive apart from the Governor General, that this power is given. Under these circumstances, I think the hon. and learned Gentleman must see that unless he brings forward very different considerations the ground is cut from under his feet.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: There is in this Debate extreme difficulty in discovering what the law really is on the subject, and also as to what policy we ought to pursue. The learned Solicitor General alluded to Common Law, but I would ask the House to come back from the mysteries of Common Law and look at the matter in the light of common sense. The Solicitor General has said that every individual, as a citizen, is bound to come out and support the Magistrates in keeping order. A soldier is an individual and a citizen; no doubt he is bound to come out, “and no doubt,” said the Solicitor General,

“When he does come out at the order of the Civil authority, he is in a very embarrassing position. He may be shot if he does one thing, and he may be hanged if he does the other.”

That is an extraordinary position for the soldier—who is also an ordinary citizen—to be in, and this Bill does nothing to extract him from it. The Common Law, according to the hon. and learned Gentleman, has very little to do with the question before the House. The late Home Secretary differs in his view of the Common Law from the version given by the Solicitor General, and that was to be expected, because my experience of debate has been that whenever a learned lawyer expounds a doctrine, another learned lawyer is sure to get up and contradict him. We may put aside the subtle and almost metaphysical question whether a soldier acting in his capacity of citizen has to go out with or without arms and accoutrements. The Solicitor General says he can come out with arms, and form part of a Regular Army. My hon. and learned Friend admits that every citizen is bound to support the law, but says he is not bound to support it with all the arms he can lay his hands upon. Between the versions of the Common Law given by the Solicitor General, on the one hand, and by the late Home Secretary, on the other, the House may well pause and hesitate. But the House has to consider the matter from the point of view of the soldier and also from the point of view of public policy. From the soldier's point of view, I think it would be an extreme hardship, as my hon. and learned Friend near me has pointed out, that he might be called upon by a Magistrate to come forward and support a law or Act of the Irish Legislature which might turn out in the long run to be no law at all, and for which there might be no defence. It is a hard case to put the soldier in that position, and all the harder for the reason that when a civilian has to decide these embarrassing and complicated problems which the Solicitor General has put before the House, he decides them for himself, and is bound by that decision; but the unfortunate soldier is obliged to obey his commanding officer. He is not allowed to think for himself; and if the commanding officer does not think successfully for him, he is liable to all the pains and penalties attaching to those who show too much zeal in carrying out a law which is no law at all. But it is the question of public policy which I regard as of far more importance. We have to reflect that the Army of the Queen is and must remain at the orders of Her Majesty and of those who are directly responsible to Her Majesty, and that they should act as the Central Government, and the Central Government alone, may, in the long run, determine. No doubt, they may act through the Magistrates. We are responsible in this Central Parliament for having produced a disciplined force, and we are responsible for the way in which this force shall be used. Would that be the case if the

Home Rule Bill should pass? The British Government pays for, organises, and directs the Military Forces, and the only man responsible for the manner in which the Army is used is the Secretary of State for War, who sits in the House of Commons and not in the Irish Assembly. He is the only person whose action can be criticised, whose salary can be reduced, and whose Government can be turned out of Office. If these powers were handed over to the Irish Government—

MR. J. MORLEY : We are not going to hand them over.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR : They will be handed over to the Lord Lieutenant.

MR. J. MORLEY : That is done now.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR : But the Lord Lieutenant now is a Lord Lieutenant of the United Kingdom. He will not be so in future. He will not be responsible to this Parliament. The new Lord Lieutenant will only be responsible to this Parliament when the British Government has declared that the Lord Lieutenant shall obey the orders of the British Executive. What words are there in the Act to show that the Lord Lieutenant, in giving orders to the military, is responsible to the British Parliament?

MR. J. MORLEY : The words of his Commission.

MR. W. E. GLADSTONE : I read the words to the House.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR : Are the Government prepared to introduce an Amendment declaring that the Lord Lieutenant, in as far as he gives any directions to the Army—assuming it to be true that he does give directions to the Army and that proposition is disputed by many authorities—acts as an officer of the English Executive and not of the Irish Executive?

MR. W. E. GLADSTONE : Passing this Bill will not alter the prerogatives of the Crown.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR : It is not a question of a prerogative of the Crown, but of the discretion of the Lord Lieutenant, who is called upon to play two parts. In some circumstances he is to act on the advice of the Irish Executive, and in other circumstances possibly in direct opposition to the advice of the Irish Executive and in obedience to the British Cabinet. In which capacity is he to have the direction of the Army? That is a plain question, and it is not decided by the terms of the Commission now issued to the Lord Lieutenant—and if it were, the terms might be altered at any moment. The thing ought to be on permanent record in the Bill. The Government will admit that this is a point of first-rate importance. Is the Lord Lieutenant, in dealing with the Army in Ireland, to take advice from the English or the Irish Cabinet?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR : Then it will be in the power of the Lord Lieutenant to issue a General Order that no Irish Magistrate shall be able to call out troops. [Cries of "No!"] If the Lord Lieutenant has not that power, what is the relevance of the speech just made by the Prime Minister? The whole point of it was that these powers are vested in the Lord Lieutenant, and that we need not trouble ourselves about them. It now appears that power is not vested in the Lord Lieutenant to carry out the object of this clause. I do not understand what the position of the Government is in the matter, and I doubt if the Government themselves have fully made up their minds. But I leave that question—which must be determined before the Debate closes.

MR. W. E. GLADSTONE : The right hon. Gentleman often says that I cannot make myself intelligible; but the Commission can make itself intelligible, and I read out from it the words which place the Army explicitly and exclusively under the Viceroy, who, in giving directions to the Army, is discharging an Imperial and not an Irish function.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR : Do the Government, or do they not, hold that the Commission, whatever its character, and whatever the powers conferred by it on the Lord Lieutenant, give the power to carry out the objects of the clause?

MR. W. E. GLADSTONE : I speak not of the clause, but of the powers existing in the law.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR : The question cannot arise at present, but it will in the future. I want to know whether the powers are such that they will enable the Lord Lieutenant to carry out the objects of the clause? I now pass from the Lord Lieutenant to the Magistrates. They are supposed to have a legal right to call out the military irrespective of the Lord Lieutenant and his Commission. We think that Magistrates appointed by the Home Rule Government ought not to have the power. We say not only that it is not fair to the soldier to punish him for obeying instructions, but that it is inexpedient to give to the Irish Executive or the Irish Magistrates the power of employing purely British forces, the Minister responsible for which sits in the British Parliament, for any purposes they may think proper. This is not a question of Common Law, but of policy, and on the merits of that question I entertain no doubt at all. Whether the Amendment adequately carries out the object of my hon. Friend I do not undertake to say, as we are only on the Second Reading of the clause. It is not a question for lawyers to deal with at all. It is a question of high policy whether an Executive over which the British Parliament has no control and Magistrates which it does not appoint are to have the power of employing the organised military forces of the Crown in a manner in which possibly, and even in certain contingencies probably, this House might highly disapprove.

MR. BYRNE (Essex, Walthamstow) said, he wished to refer to a point taken by the Solicitor General—a point which could be met by the simplest addition to the clause. The clause ran as follows:—

and so on. The hon. and learned Member's objection would be met by making the latter part of the clause read—

“Not having refused ‘in his military capacity,’ to give assistance,” &c.

That was what the clause meant beyond any possibility of a doubt. The whole question that lay at the root of this matter was which Executive was to be responsible for the movement of troops in Ireland? If anything illegal was done in this respect who was to be held accountable? In his opinion, it ought to be an Imperial official, who should be responsible to the Imperial Government and to that House. So far as he could see, there was no clause in the Bill to the effect that in disposing of troops the Lord Lieutenant should act only on the advice of the Imperial Executive. If a difficulty arose with the Civil authority in Ireland—if the Cork Magistrates demanded military assistance to put down a disturbance in Cork, and if the Belfast Magistrates made a similar demand for Belfast, who would be held responsible for granting or refusing such assistance? The question should be placed beyond all possibility of doubt in the manner he had described. Soldiers should not be liable to civil action if they could show that they had acted in accordance with General Orders laid down by responsible Executive Ministers in the Imperial Parliament. It appeared to him that the clause was one which could do no harm to anyone. If the Government, however, found themselves unable to accept it, they themselves should introduce one giving an indemnity to military men who should merely carry out the orders of the proper Military authority.

*MR. BLAKE (Longford, S.) : I venture to suggest that, under the Act, the Army is placed distinctively outside the legislative control of the Irish Legislature—and I say the Army in the widest sense in which that word is used: Volunteers, Militia, and so forth. It follows from that that the Executive authority which is to be exercised with reference to the Army as a military force is to be exercised upon the instructions and the responsibility of the Imperial Government. To the extent to which the Crown and the Executive authority is represented in Ireland its representative acts. Therefore, in that regard, upon that responsibility and under those instructions, and, as has been before observed with reference to other questions which have been raised, the truth is that Parliament is reserving to itself under the scheme of this Bill the method by which that Executive authority shall be exercised, and the restrictions which shall be created. The prerogatives of the Crown to be delegated to the Viceroy are prerogatives to be delegated in a form, upon instructions, and after a fashion to be hereafter framed by the Imperial Executive, for its action in respect to which it is to be responsible to this House, who can control the action, who can modify and change the Commission. It certainly does seem to me to follow, from the new state of things which is created by the proposed Bill, that there will be a necessary intervention of Imperial authority through the Viceroy acting upon Imperial instructions in case the military be requisitioned in their military capacity by the Civil authority in Ireland. It seems to me that there flows from the restriction which keeps all the military forces under the Executive control of the Imperial authority, the view that if they are wanted as soldiers to preserve the peace in Ireland they must be requisitioned from the Imperial officer, the Viceroy; and the Viceroy, in determining whether they are to be given or not, must act upon the responsibility and the instructions of an Imperial Minister. That seems the only solution of the question. It may leave the question, as it concerns the preservation of the peace in certain grave contingencies in Ireland, in a position not wholly satisfactory, but certainly not from the point of view of those who are creating these difficulties, but rather from the point of view of those who may conceive that the time required and the formalities necessary before the troops are obtained may be too lengthy and complicated. That it follows from the proposition that the forces are under Imperial control, that an Imperial officer under Imperial advice is the authority under which the forces must be called into the field, seems to me to be absolutely clear.

MR. J. CHAMBERLAIN : The statement made by the hon. Member for Longford — like that of the Prime Minister—will be satisfactory if only it is correct. But I do not think the hon. Member and the right hon. Gentleman have appreciated the point which we are endeavouring to put before the House. Let us first take the answer of the right hon. Gentleman. He has said that by Clause 5 of the Bill the Executive power of the Queen is to be delegated to the Lord Lieutenant by Her Majesty, and that the terms of such delegation are to be laid before both Houses of Parliament. The Commission will, therefore, contain all the powers delegated to the Lord Lieutenant as to the control of the military forces. The right hon. Gentleman says that the Lord Lieutenant, who will be, of course, responsible not only in his own person, but, in regard to the Commission he has from this House, will have full control over the military forces. I will test that by a concrete instance. Suppose that, after the passing of Home Rule, a disturbance breaks out in Cork. In Cork there is a military garrison. The Civil authority calls on the commanding officer of the military garrison there to assist in suppressing the disturbance. I assume that, as in this country, the commanding officer will telegraph to headquarters—to the Commander-in-Chief or to the Lord Lieutenant. Supposing the Lord Lieutenant, considering all the circumstances, thinks it is a case in which the military power is not required, and accordingly telegraphs back informing the commanding officer that he is not to assist the Civil power, the first question I ask the Government is whether, in their view, the Military authority can in these circumstances refuse to assist the Civil power? If the Commander-in-Chief himself were in Cork at the time, would he refuse to put the military power at the disposal of the Civil power? Grant that all the powers of the Queen had been reserved to the Lord Lieutenant, and that the mission of the Lord Lieutenant came from this House, but suppose that he was in conflict with the Civil authority, does the right hon. Gentleman mean to say that the Commander of the military garrison could refuse assistance? If there is anything in the argument of the Prime Minister the Military authority ought to be able to refuse assistance; otherwise there is no security in the Commission or in the delegated authority to the Lord Lieutenant. If the Lord Lieutenant himself is powerless, even after he has received our Commission, what is the good of appealing to him if by the Common Law of the land the Military authority must assist the Civil power whether the Lord Lieutenant approves of it or not? In the second place, I ask whether, supposing the commanding officer obeys the Lord Lieutenant, an action would not lie against him for refusing to assist the Civil power? Can he legally refuse assistance? Recently the Chief Secretary refused the assistance of the police to the Civil authority; but when the matter came before the Courts, the right hon. Gentleman was held to be wrong, and was told that he was personally responsible, and that he might be brought up under some form of law and condemned for having interfered between the execution of the law and the Civil authority. If that is so, does not the same law apply to the Military authority as to the police? Is not the law the same, whether it affects the policeman, the civilian, or the soldier? Are they not all bound to obey the Civil authority? I venture to submit that it is only by some such clause as that proposed that the Military authority can be protected from the consequence of obeying the orders of the Lord Lieutenant. Surely it is absurd that we should waste our time in considering that Commission of the Lord Lieutenant if the Commission is to be waste paper from the time it is signed, and to have no real authority whatsoever—and not to be in itself sufficient to protect those who obey it from the ordinary process of law. I do hope the Government will give us their view of this case. If they think, as I understand they do think, that the Military authority ought only to be moved with the assent and approval of the Lord Lieutenant, will they tell us whether or not under this Bill that object has been secured, because it certainly appears to me, according to the law laid down by the Solicitor General, that it has not been secured.

*THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR WAR (Mr. CAMPBELL - BANNERMAN, Stirling, &c.): I am not a lawyer any more than the right hon. Gentleman, and I am, therefore, little qualified to instruct the House on the special legal aspect of this case. The right hon. Gentleman has very properly and wisely given a concrete instance. He asked what would happen if a disturbance broke out in Cork and the Civil power called on the officer commanding the troops for assistance. My answer is, precisely the same thing as would happen if the disturbance occurred at Birmingham. Speaking from some study of the legal aspect of the question, I wish it to be understood that on such an occasion the troops act not as troops, but in their capacity of armed citizens. It is the duty of every citizen to assist in maintaining the peace, and it is a handy thing, to say the least of it, to be able to call out citizens who possess the advantage of being armed and trained. That is literally, I believe, the legal aspect of the case. In Ireland, under the new system, the circumstances will be precisely the same as they are at present both in Ireland and in England. The Lord Lieutenant has had full powers under the Commission that my right hon. Friend has read out, so that he has complete authority over the troops precisely as the supreme Military authority has in this country. I am at a loss to imagine where the difficulty arises. My right hon. Friend imagines all sorts of contingencies arising. He has suggested that the Civil authority might unreasonably call upon the troops for assistance. The officer commanding the troops on the spot has, of course, a very grave responsibility. It has been found to be so in cases which have occurred. There was the case of the Bristol riots, and there was the more recent case of the collision that took place at Six-Mile-Bridge, where, if I remember rightly, either one officer was charged with two offences or two officers were charged each with one offence—the one offence being that he did too much, and the other that he did too little. It is subject to that unfortunate contingency of responsibility, that every officer must act, and the officer in charge at Cork must take the responsibility after the passing of this Bill just as he does now.

MR. J. CHAMBERLAIN: My right hon. Friend has not answered my question. Could the Military authorities, whether at Birmingham or Cork, legally refuse to obey the orders of the Civil authority?

*MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: On their own responsibility, I take it that they might.

MR. TOMLINSON (Preston) said, the subject did not seem to him to get clearer as the Debate proceeded, and as explanation after explanation was given by Members of the Government. The Solicitor General had rested his case entirely on the duty of the troops as subjects of the Queen to render assistance in their civilian capacity. Since that time the Debate had turned on quite a different question—namely, the power given to the Lord Lieutenant by his Commission. For his own part, he was certain that some such clause as this was required. He hoped that, in view of the difficulties that had been suggested in the course of the Debate, the Government, if they did not themselves suggest some Amendment to one of the clauses, in the event of the new clause being rejected, would at least look favourably upon Amendments on the subject.

MAJOR-GENERAL GOLDSWORTHY (Hammersmith) said, he had already called the attention of the Government to the great necessity there would be to be careful in handling the troops in Ireland. He had done so in the best interests of peace. If a clause like that before the House were not adopted, the troops would be practically brought under the control of the Local Authorities, and he thought that was very much to be deprecated. The Secretary of State for War was quite content that the officers should be left with the chance of a halter on the one side and the chance of a bullet on the other. He (General Goldsworthy) was not content that the officers in Ireland should be left at the mercy of the local authority, and he thought it would be wise if the Government could see their way to accepting some clause of the kind proposed, amended as suggested by the hon. and learned Member for Walthamstow (Mr. Byrne). If this Bill passed, the troubles of the Government only began; and unless they took every opportunity to protect the military they would find themselves in a mess.

MR. COURTNEY (Cornwall, Bodmin) said, he did not know whether he expressed the opinions of any other Members, but he was afraid they had not quite got to the bottom of this question. He could not help expressing his regret that they were not discussing this point in Committee, so that they might then have had a repetition or a completion of the statement made by his right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for War (Mr. Campbell-Bannerman). He, like his right hon. Friend, would take the illustration of Birmingham instead of Cork. Suppose a tumult arose in Birmingham, and that the Mayor required the officer of troops near the town to come to his assistance; but the officer declined to do so. His right hon. Friend said he could do so on his own responsibility, and must take the consequences of any action brought against him for his refusal. The point which he (Mr. Courtney) wished to put, and which was really the point of this question, was—Could the responsible officer in question be absolved by superior orders from the Home Secretary?

MR. ASQUITH: No.

MR. COURTNEY said, his right hon. Friend said distinctly not; but that was the real question which his right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for War did not touch. He might say, in reference to the observation of the Home Secretary, that Todd said that, as far as regarded the movements of the Regular Army, the Militia, and the Volunteer Forces, the authority of the Home Secretary was superseded in 1854 by that of the Secretary of State for War. In the cases of riots or tumults the Home Secretary had the duty of conveying Her Majesty's commands to the officers in charge of districts, placing them under the control of Magistrates and directing them how to act. It followed that the Home Secretary would really have the power to order an officer in charge of a district to disobey a requisition put upon him by a Magistrate. Could the Lord Lieutenant absolve an officer in command of a district by giving him direct authority not to obey a requisition from the Civil authority? As the Home Secretary had not spoken he would, of course, have the power of replying to him, and he hoped his right hon. Friend would inform the House what would be the position of the Lord Lieutenant in the event of a requisition being made to an officer in charge of a district to direct that officer not to obey the requisition. The Lord Lieutenant was at the present time directly responsible to the Home Government; but what they were anxious to know was what responsibility would attach to him in the future under this Bill?

THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE HOME DEPARTMENT (Mr. ASQUITH, Fife, E.): The speech of my right hon. Friend the Member for Bodmin (Mr. Courtney), I think, clearly shows to the House that, under the guise of debating a special clause of this Bill, we are discussing a question which has no special relevance to the future government of Ireland. [Cries of "No!"] Hon. Gentlemen say "No, no!" but that was my right hon. Friend's own position, for he accepted the illustration given by the Secretary of State for War, and admitted, for the purposes of his argument, that the question would be identical, whether it arose at Birmingham to-day or in Cork after the passing of this Bill.

MR. COURTNEY: I said the question would be the same to-day; but I pointed out that in the future, when this Bill passed, it would not be so.

*MR. ASQUITH: My right hon. Friend then devoted the whole of his speech, except the concluding sentence, to the discussion of the question of what would be the case to-day, and he has not given the House the very faintest guidance as to what difference the passing of this Bill would make. I desire to state, not in any controversial spirit, what I conceive to be the position under the law as it at present stands, and I would express my own opinion that the law will not be changed in the slightest possible degree by the passing of this Bill, and that the responsibility of a military force for the preservation of the peace when called upon by the Civil authority will be no greater and no less in Ireland under this Bill than it is now in this country. What is the law? The military, in such cases, do not stand in any exceptional or differentiated position. When a tumult arises, when the peace is threatened, when public order is in danger of being disturbed, it is the duty of the Civil authority, as it is their power, to call upon all citizens, be they armed or not, to take their part in preventing or repressing disorder. I do not deny that in one respect the armed citizen stands in a different position from the unarmed citizen, not because he is subject to military discipline, not because he is bound to obey superior orders, and least of all because he can shelter himself under some extra-legal authority, but merely because, by possessing arms and belonging to a disciplined body, he is in a better position for discharging the duty he is called upon to perform than an ordinary citizen. [A laugh.] I do not know why that observation should excite the ridicule of one of the hon. Members for Sheffield opposite. I am stating what I believe to be an elementary, common-place, and even a platitude of Constitutional Law. Let us suppose this state of things to arise: A tumult is threatened, and the Civil authority calls upon a military force to intervene. The officer in command of that force takes upon himself the responsibility either of obeying or disobeying the summons addressed to him. Does either my right hon. Friend (Mr. Courtney) or my right hon. Friend the Member for West Birmingham (Mr. J. Chamberlain) mean to say that the responsibility of the military authority can in the slightest degree be qualified or mitigated by a reference to head-quarters? Not in the least. I should say, as one who has had some small experience in this matter, that it does not matter in the smallest degree whether the military officer refers to the War Office or the Home Office or the Lord Lieutenant, because in the last resort the question has to be tried before a jury, and the question the Judge would leave to the jury would not be whether the officer had the sheltering command of a superior authority, but whether, having regard to the surrounding conditions, he did or did not perform the duty which the law casts upon every citizen. What difference does it make when the authority—from which, I admit, he may obtain useful and even authoritative advice—is the Home Secretary or the Lord Lieutenant? It would not qualify, or add to, or subtract from the responsibility which the law casts upon him as a citizen. What is the principle which we are now asked to adopt by the clause, almost, I venture to say, for the first time in the history of the British Parliament? It is that we are to take away the responsibility which the law casts upon the military man no less than upon the civilian, the responsibility of exercising his own judgment, under the particular circumstances of the case, for the maintenance of the law, and to clothe him with an immunity which Parliament has always refused to sanction, and to allow him to set up the plea in excuse for failure or excess of duty that he acted under the orders of a superior military authority. That is one of the most reactionary and un-Constitutional proposals that has ever been submitted to the House. The Government asks the House to leave the law as it now stands alike in England and Ireland, under which the officer exercises his own judgment, subject to his own responsibility, with due regard to the particular circumstances of every case, leaving the question when it arises to the decision of the Courts of Law. We refuse to clothe the military power, either in Ireland or in any other part of the Empire, with this extra-Constitutional safeguard which Parliament has never sanctioned and, we trust, never will sanction.

SIR R. WEBSTER (Isle of Wight): So many complimentary allusions have been made to lawyers in this Debate that I should have hesitated to address the House; but as there is a difference between the Home Secretary and myself on the law of the matter, I may be able, perhaps, to render some slight assistance. I think the speech of the right hon. Gentleman must have astonished the Prime Minister. It is certainly very difficult to reconcile the Home Secretary's view with that so confidently put forward by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Midlothian, who, I understood, laid down that the whole of this matter would be in the discretion of the Lord Lieutenant. I was very much surprised to hear the Home Secretary express the opinion that the question had no relevance to the Bill before the House, for, in view of the alteration that will follow in the government of Ireland if the measure becomes law, and in view of the fact that the Executive Government of Ireland will not be responsible to this House, I think it very relevant and important that we should understand clearly what the position of matters then will be. The question we are now considering is whether or not it is right that, where a military officer or a soldier refuses, in pursuance of military orders which have been sanctioned by the Secretary for War, to obey the Civil authority when requested, he is to be subject to trial by an Irish jury and to proceedings by an Irish Executive. The point which the Members of the Government do not seem to be able to appreciate is that a military officer, though acting under the orders of the Secretary of State for War, may still be liable to proceedings, not where there will be the control of the Imperial Parliament, but under an Irish Executive, the Members of which cannot be called to account for their conduct in this House. It is not a question of legislative interference; it is a question of Executive action. Suppose a riot took place in Birmingham. If the Civil authority requested the assistance of the military, would the officer in charge of the soldiers obey or disobey on his own responsibility, and thereby incur the liability, it may be, of criminal proceedings?

MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: He would.

SIR R. WEBSTER: That is the point. He would be liable, it may be, to indictment. But the Government do not seem to appreciate that in such a case we in this House could call in question the action of the Secretary of State for War or anyone else responsible for the orders, whereas we should have no control whatever over the action of the Irish Executive, if the case occurred in Ireland instead of in Birmingham. I maintain that the reasons given by the Government in opposition to the clause are not consistent with themselves. When the Government of Ireland is not responsible to this House it is not right that the conduct of the military men, who are obeying orders, should be called in question, and that those men should be tried by Irish Judges and juries, tribunals over which the House of Commons has no control.

MR. DARLING (Deptford) said, that as it was evident the Government did not intend to accept the clause, it might be useful to point out to the military men in whose interest this clause had been proposed a way which had been suggested by that very eminent lawyer the Home Secretary. The right hon. Gentleman had told them that when a Colonel of a regiment was called upon to act he was called upon as a citizen. If that be so, and if the Mayor of Cork asked the Colonel of the regiment there to assist him in quelling a disturbance, all the Colonel would have to say was, "I am summoned as a citizen; I will go as a citizen; I will go as an unarmed citizen ought to go; I will go in my black coat and tall hat; I will not take my uniform or sword with me." He could thus go, but he would have absolutely no right to order any other citizen to go with him.

He could not compel the men under his command to follow him; they could only be forced to attend by the Mayor giving an order to each individual, and the result would be an unarmed crowd instead of an armed and disciplined force. Now, the Government could avoid all risk of that by accepting the clause.

MR. AMBROSE (Harrow) said, he only wished to congratulate the Home Secretary upon the most useful speech he had made. When discussing the question of the supremacy of the Imperial Parliament they were told there would always be the military in Ireland to assert that supremacy. They were told the military would insure the success and triumph of the Imperial Parliament. Now, however, the Home Secretary told them the military were at the beck and call of the Home Rule Government. How could the military be a protection of Imperial supremacy if it were to be subjected to the orders of the Civil Government? What became of Imperial supremacy under such circumstances? Nothing could show more completely the hollowness of the scores of speeches delivered during these Debates than the speech of the Home Secretary.

Question put.

It being Midnight, Further Proceeding on Consideration, as amended, stood adjourned.

Bill, as amended, to be further considered To-morrow.

SEA FISHERIES REGULATION (SCOTLAND) BILL.

SIR H. MAXWELL (Wigton) asked whether the Government really intended to bring on this Bill?

THE PATRONAGE SECRETARY TO THE TREASURY (MR. MARJORIBANKS, Berwickshire): The Government certainly intend to pass this Bill during the present Session.

ATTENDANCE) BILL.—(No. 241.)

THIRD READING.

Order for Third Reading read.

Motion made, and Question proposed,
“That the Bill be now read the third time.”—(Mr. Acland.)

**SIR R. TEMPLE* (Surrey, Kingston) complained that, owing to the sharp manner in which his right hon. Friend the Minister for Education had taken the various stages of this Bill, he had not had an opportunity of submitting certain Amendments desired by the teaching profession. The Bill came on in the Committee stage in the small hours of Thursday night or Friday morning. He had certain important new clauses which would not alter the Bill, but which, in his judgment and in the judgment of the teaching profession, would greatly improve the Bill. These new clauses were moved out of Order by the Chair, but it was said that they might be moved as Amendments to the clauses of the Bill. He therefore gave notice that he would move his points as Amendments to the clauses on the Report stage. But the Bill passed through Committee, and straight away his right hon. Friend the Minister for Education put the Bill down on the Notice Paper, so that it came on on the very same day, and it was impossible for him in point of time to remodel the Amendments so as to bring them on on the Report stage. It was the practice at the Report stage to give written notice of Amendments beforehand, and that was impossible on his part owing to the manner in which the right hon. Gentleman put down the Bill. Then when the Bill came on on the Report stage there was so much noise at the moment in the House that he could not hear the Clerk at the Table, and it was only by the kindness of Mr. Speaker, to whom he had appealed, that he got to know that the Bill before the House was the School Attendance Bill. The Report stage was passed, so that again he had no opportunity of taking the sense of the House on the important questions he had to raise. His Amendments proposed to facilitate the manner in which children might leave school now that the age for half-time employment had been raised. He had no hope of passing these Amendments on this occasion if his right hon. Friend objected. But he wished a specific deliverance from the right hon. Gentleman as to whether he agreed with him on the point. Probably his right hon. Friend agreed with him, only there were certain objections raised in the Education Department which his right hon. Friend did not feel himself quite strong enough to overcome. He should, however, like his right hon. Friend to take the responsibility of saying in face of the House whether or not he agreed with him and with the great mass of the teaching profession of England on this point? His right hon. Friend had, so far, taken refuge in silence. Having said so much, he had no objection to raise to the Bill, and would vote for its Third Reading.

THE VICE PRESIDENT OF THE COUNCIL (Mr. ACLAND, York, W.R., Rotherham): I do not think it would have been in Order for my hon. Friend to have moved the proposed Amendments to this Bill. I know the interest which my hon. Friend has taken in this question, and I agree with him to a large extent. The matter has my close attention, and as I am sure my hon. Friend will not expect me to go into general details, I hope the Bill will now be allowed to pass.

Question put, and agreed to.

Bill read the third time, and passed.

HOUSING OF THE WORKING CLASSES
BILL.—(No. 37.)

Order for Second Reading read, and discharged.

Bill withdrawn.

MR. T. M. HEALY (Louth, N.) said, that when this Bill came on he was induced to allow it to go through at the request of the Patronage Secretary to the Treasury. The Lords had now riddled the Bill with Amendments, and as the promoter of the Bill had objected to his Bill that night, he would see when the Lords' Amendments came on that they were fully discussed.

House adjourned at ten minutes after Twelve o'clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

Tuesday, 15th August 1893.

QUESTIONS.

THE IMPRISONED ARMENIANS.

MR. HEYWOOD JOHNSTONE (Sussex, Horsham): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether of the 63 Armenian Christians now or lately imprisoned at Angora 24 are still awaiting their trial, while 15 have been sentenced to death, and 24 to terms of imprisonment varying from 7 to 15 years, and if he can state to the House the nature of the charges against these persons, and the evidence by which such charges have been supported; and whether at Easter of this year His Majesty the Sultan promised to release all Christian prisoners charged with political offences who were not political leaders, and if all or what number of these 63 persons are so charged as being political leaders?

*THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR FOREIGN AFFAIRS (Sir E. GREY, Northumberland, Berwick): Of the 24 prisoners referred to seven have been liberated; but we have not heard the result of the trial of the remainder. An amnesty was granted at the end of March to most of the Armenians of Marsovan, Cesarea, and Guzgat who were suspected of being implicated in the posting of the seditious placards. Those reserved for trial were considered by the Turkish Authorities to have been the authors or instigators of the placards.

MR. H. JOHNSTONE: Can the hon. Baronet say if it is the fact that 15 of these persons have been sentenced to death, and 24 to terms of imprisonment varying from seven to 15 years? What was the nature of the charges preferred against them, and of the evidence on which the accusations were based?

*SIR E. GREY: No, Sir. I think the 15 prisoners referred to by the hon. Member as having been sentenced to death were those as to whom I stated some time ago that five had been executed, and others had had their sentences changed to terms of imprisonment ranging from eight to two years. In these cases the Porte has promised to supply the procès verbal to the British Embassy.

THE OUTDOOR RELIEF QUESTION.

MR. COBB (Warwick, S.E., Rugby): I beg to ask the President of the Local Government Board whether he has received any, and what, communication from the Southam Board of Guardians as to the case of James Morrey, of Napton; whether he is aware that, since the subject was mentioned in the House on 21st July, Morrey applied to the Board for outdoor relief, and that they allowed him 7s. 6d. a week for two weeks, and that he is now only receiving a few loaves; whether he is aware that, after being ill for 22 weeks, and receiving outdoor relief for only six weeks, although the hospital physician certified that it was a case for outdoor relief, Morrey was seized with a fit and was senseless for an hour and apparently dying, and that the doctor advised that this was brought on through weakness from want of food; whether he is aware that Morrey appealed to one of the Guardians for Napton, and that the Guardian told him that he must go to the Member for the Rugby Division for relief; and whether he will make strong representations to the Southam Board to induce them to support Morrey by outdoor relief, as advised by the hospital physician, and not force him into the workhouse?

THE PRESIDENT OF THE LOCAL GOVERNMENT BOARD (Mr. H. H. FOWLER, Wolverhampton, E.): I am informed by the Guardians of the Southam Union that on the 25th of last month James Morrey attended before them, and that an order was given for his admission to the workhouse. He refused the order, and the relieving officer who visited him on the following day, in the exercise of his discretionary power, gave tickets for necessaries to the value of 7s. 10d. On the 2nd August Morrey was again relieved with necessaries to the value of 7s. 7d. On the 8th August the Guardians, having further considered the case, passed a resolution to the effect that the order for the workhouse should be continued, as they considered that Morrey would have a better chance of recovery if regularly treated in the workhouse. The relieving officer was at the same time instructed to give bread not exceeding seven loaves per week in case he considered it necessary. No application was made by Morrey for relief between the 30th May and the 20th July. The Guardians state that they are not aware that he was seized with a fit, nor any of the circumstances alleged in connection with it. They also say they are not aware of any appeal by Morrey to one of the Guardians for Napton. If, however, it is correct that any Guardian told any applicant for relief that he must go to the Member for the Rugby Division for such relief, I think such a reply was a most improper one. As I have already stated with regard to this case, it is entirely in the discretion of the Guardians whether they will give indoor or outdoor relief. The Local Government Board are expressly precluded by Statute from giving any directions in the case.

OVERCROWDING THE THAMES STEAMERS.

CAPTAIN DONELAN (Cork, E.): I beg to ask the President of the Board of Trade whether he is aware that the only means taken by the Victoria Steamboat Association to give publicity to the regulation limiting the number of their passengers is to hang up the certificate in an obscure corner of the cabin; whether he is also aware that each ticket issued by them contains the following notice:—"The Association are not responsible for injury or loss of life to passengers travelling by their boats, from whatever cause;" and whether the Board of Trade will consider the means of securing the safety and comfort of passengers?

THE PRESIDENT OF THE BOARD OF TRADE (Mr. MUNDELLA, Sheffield, Brightside): My officers report that the passenger traffic of each of the vessels of the Association referred to by the hon. Member is put up in some conspicuous part of the ship, as required by the Merchant Shipping Act. In no instance, in their opinion, has it been hung up "in an obscure corner of the cabin." The tickets issued by the Association do, I understand, contain a notice in the terms quoted in the question; but whether such a notice has any legal validity is a question upon which I am not prepared to express any opinion. The safety of passengers is provided for by careful survey in each case before a certificate is granted; but, as I have already stated, the question of comfort, as distinct from safety, is not one in which the Board of Trade have power to interfere.

CAPTAIN DONELAN: Is there anything shown on deck which gives the number of passengers allowed on board?

MR. MUNDELLA: No. This information is usually exhibited in the saloon, and in the cabins; not on deck.

CAPTAIN DONELAN: Is it put in a conspicuous place?

MR. MUNDELLA: I am informed that it is shown in a manner required by the Merchant Shipping Act.

WITU.

MR. MACFARLANE (Argyll): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs why the town of Witu was attacked by a force landed from Her Majesty's ships, and a number of persons killed?

*SIR E. GREY: The town of Witu has not been attacked, but a fortified stronghold named Panwani, where a Chief named Fumo Omari had established himself with a band of robbers. He was understood to have accepted the terms offered him by Mr. Rodd, the acting Consul General, but treacherously fired on the escort which had been landed from the ships. It therefore became necessary to take the position by storm, which was done with great gallantry by the Naval Brigade, assisted by Soudanese and Zanzibar troops.

THE TAFF VALLEY RAILWAY ACCIDENT.

MR. J. E. ELLIS (Nottingham, Rushcliffe): I beg to ask the President of the Board of Trade whether, having regard to the statements made by some of the survivors of the lamentable accident on the Taff Vale Railway on the 12th August, the Inspector sent down will pay specific attention at the Board of Trade inquiry to the question of how far the carriage doors were locked, and whether this had any bearing on the magnitude of the disaster?

MR. MUNDELLA: Yes, Sir; Major Marindin's attention has been specially directed to this point.

ECCLESIASTICAL & NON-ECCLESIASTICAL CHARITIES.

MR. TALBOT (Oxford University): I beg to ask the President of the Local Government Board how it is proposed, in the event of the Local Government Bill passing into law, to discriminate between Ecclesiastical and non-Ecclesiastical Charities; who is to decide any case of dispute on such a matter; and whether he will consider the advisability of appointing a Commission, as was done in the case of the City Parochial Charities Act, to inquire into this difficult question?

MR. H. H. FOWLER: There is no discrimination in the interpretation of the law; but I quite appreciate the point raised by the hon. Member, and will consider his suggestion.

QUEEN'S CONSENT TO PRIVATE BILLS.

MR. BENN (Tower Hamlets, St. George's): I beg to ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether his attention has been directed to the recent practice of the Treasury in giving notice at the Private Bill Office that the Queen's Consent is required to Private Bills which do not involve any taking of or interference with property of the Crown, but in which one of the Government Departments desires the insertion of some clause involving obligations on the promoters which the promoters deem unreasonable, and wish to submit to the Select Committee on the Bill; and whether the Government Departments are within their right in refusing to submit such questions to the decision of Select Committees on the Bills, and in claiming to veto the further progress of a Bill passed by a Select Committee, except upon terms dictated by themselves?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER (Sir W. HARCOURT, Derby): By Constitutional practice Bills dealing with the property of the Crown and the Public Revenue, which are in effect national property, require the consent of the Crown—that is, of the responsible Government. This, however, is a power which ought not to be arbitrarily exercised, interfering unnecessarily with useful measures. Such consent ought not to be withheld except on substantial grounds; and, if any case should arise in which it is alleged that this power is abused, I will take care that the circumstances shall be carefully examined.

THE POLICE AND SANITARY COMMITTEE.

MR. LONG (Liverpool, West Derby): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether he has considered the Report of the Police and Sanitary Committee; if so, whether he is in a position to state what view the Government take of the proposals contained therein?

SIR C. W. DILKE (Gloucester, Forest of Dean): Is the right hon. Gentleman aware that there is a great difference of opinion upon this subject, that some of the great Corporations have taken up the case of Leeds which was before the Committee this year, and are likely to make representations on the subject?

THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE HOME DEPARTMENT (Mr. ASQUITH, Fife, E.): Yes, Sir; the question is receiving careful consideration. I am not yet in a position to announce the views of the Government.

GRAZING RIGHTS IN WOLMER FOREST.

MR. WICKHAM (Hants, Petersfield): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for War if he is aware that notice has been given by the War Department to the occupiers of certain grazing rights on part of Wolmer Forest that such occupations will not be renewed after next Michaelmas; and, if so, if he will take into consideration the great loss and hardship which will be suffered by many poor persons by the withdrawal of rights which they have enjoyed for many years past?

*THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR WAR (Mr. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN, Stirling, &c.): In consequence of the absence of fences, and consequent danger of cattle straying, it became necessary to resume a letting in Wolmer Forest, and a week's notice, in accordance with the terms in the agreement, was given to the tenant. The tenant represented that it would cause inconvenience, and requested to be allowed to continue the tenancy to Michaelmas. Permission to do so was at once given.

MR. WICKHAM : But does not this tenant represent dozens of smaller tenants ?

MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN : I believe he sub-lets, but they are only tenants under him.

H.M.S. "ASSISTANCE."

CAPTAIN M'CALMONT (Antrim, E.) : I beg to ask the Secretary of State for War whether he has had satisfactory assurances from the Admiralty regarding the conveyance of troops in H.M.S. Assistance in respect to overcrowding ; and whether, in future, ample accommodation will be provided for the men, women, and children, especially during the winter months ?

MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN : It has been arranged, as regards winter transports in the Assistance, that the number of troops to be carried shall be reduced, and the voyages made as short as possible, and wherever practicable shall be by day only.

THE "DROPMORE PAPERS."

MR. THORNTON (Clapham) : I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury whether he will endeavour to get the second volume of the Dropmore Papers, which are issued by the Historical Manuscripts Commission, published, if possible, in time for the Third Reading of the Government of Ireland Bill, containing, as these documents do, valuable matter concerning Grattan's Parliament ?

*THE SECRETARY TO THE TREASURY (Sir J. T. HIBBERT, Oldham) : I am informed that the materials for the second volume, though collected, have not yet gone to press ; and in view of the necessity for careful revision of the proofs, I fear that there is no possibility of meeting the hon. Member's wishes.

MR. THORNTON : Can the right hon. Gentleman promise these Papers before the Irish Government Bill comes back to this House ?

SIR J. T. HIBBERT : I am afraid it is impossible for me to give any such undertaking.

IRISH LORDS LIEUTENANT AND CUSTOS ROTULORUM.

MR. HANBURY (Preston) : I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether Lords Lieutenant of counties will, if the Home Rule Bill becomes law, be appointed by the Crown or by the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, and in the latter case whether on the advice of the Irish Executive or how otherwise ; and whether in Ireland as in England the Lord Lieutenant of a county is essentially a military officer, discharging Civil functions in virtue of the separate office of Custos Rotulorum ?

THE CHIEF SECRETARY FOR IRELAND (Mr. J. MORLEY, Newcastle-upon-Tyne) : The Lieutenants of counties in Ireland will continue, as at present, to be appointed by the Lord Lieutenant subject to any direction of Her Majesty. The reply to the inquiry in the second paragraph is an affirmative.

MR. HANBURY : Then the custos rotulorum will be appointed by the Lord Lieutenant acting on the advice of the Irish Executive, while the Lords Lieutenant will be appointed as the Representatives of Her Majesty not on the advice of the Irish Executive ?

MR. J. MORLEY : I said the answer to the question on the Paper was in the affirmative—that is, the Lord Lieutenant is an essentially military officer discharging Civil functions. The appointments are to be made under the Bill exactly as they are now made.

MR. HANBURY : Do I understand that these military officers will be appointed on the advice of the Irish Executive ?

MR. J. MORLEY : I said exactly the contrary. I believe the Lords Lieutenant of counties in Ireland will continue, as at present, to be appointed by the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland.

RESPITE OF AN ESSEX MURDERER.

MR. DODD (Essex, Maldon) : I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether, in view of the fact that the confession of Davies exonerates his brother Richard Davies to some extent from the crime of the murder of Sergeant Eves in Essex, he will consider whether the clemency of the Crown can be extended to Richard Davies, now under sentence of death ?

MR. ASQUITH : I have carefully weighed all the circumstances connected with this case, with the result that I have felt myself justified in advising that the execution of the capital sentence on Richard Davies be respited, with the view to its commutation to penal servitude for life. In the case of John Davies the law must take its course.

CUSTOMS WAREHOUSE ACCOUNTS.

MR. THEOBALD (Essex, Romford) : I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury whether a system of warehouse accounts common to the Customs and Inland Revenue Departments was adopted with the approval of the Treasury in 1885, and whether the Treasury then ordered that no change should take place in this system without the joint approval of the respective Revenue Boards ; whether this system of book-keeping has worked satisfactorily in the Inland Revenue Department ; and whether the proposed alterations, involving the abolition of warehouse ledgers and the reduction of the checks against fraud in the Customs Outdoor Department, have been submitted to the Inland Revenue Board for approval ?

*SIR J. T. HIBBERT : The statement in the first paragraph is substantially correct, and the system of book-keeping has worked satisfactorily in the Inland Revenue Department. The changes in the Customs system were made with the full approval of the Treasury, and were notified to the Board of Inland Revenue. They were made on competent advice with the object not of reducing, but of strengthening the checks against fraud.

SUNDAY ELECTIONS.

SIR T. LEA (Londonderry, S.) : I beg to ask the Attorney General if there is any provision in the Ballot Act which prevents an ordinary Parliamentary Election from taking place on a Sunday ; and, if so, which section ?

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL (Sir J. RIGBY, Forfar) : As the hon. Member has probably ascertained, there is no section in the Ballot Act which expressly provides that elections shall not be held on a Sunday, but if such an enactment was required it is to be implied from the terms of Section 56 of the First Schedule to the Act.

SIR T. LEA : But would that hold good as a legal preventative ?

MR. T. M. HEALY (Louth, N.) : Does not the section provide that in the reckoning of time Sunday is not to count ? Is not that sufficient ?

[These questions were not answered.]

SUGGESTED EXPORT DUTY ON COAL.

MR. H. R. FARQUHARSON (Dorset, W.) : I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether, having in view the loss and suffering caused to the industrial classes by the increased price of coal caused by the strikes among coal miners, Her Majesty's Government will consider the advisability of imposing an Export Duty on coal during the period of the strike, with a view to keeping the price of coal at a moderate level ?

THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY (Mr. W. E. GLADSTONE, Edinburgh, Midlothian) : Even if the Government desired to take such a step they are not at liberty to do so, and it would be against the public interest to give effect to the suggestion. Besides, this country was under Treaty obligation with Germany not to impose an Export Duty.

THE WELSH SUSPENSORY BILL.

MR. BARTLEY (Islington, N.) : May I ask whether it is correctly stated in the newspapers that the Welsh Suspensory Bill has been abandoned this year ?

MR. W. E. GLADSTONE : I am not aware of any statement in the newspapers on the subject, nor is there any justification for the report.

THE BEHRING SEA ARBITRATION— THE AWARD.

MR. TOMLINSON (Preston) : Can the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, or the Prime Minister, give the House any information with respect to the statements in the evening newspapers as to the award in the Behring Straits case ? Is the account published substantially correct ?

MR. W. E. GLADSTONE : We have an intimation of the result of the inquiry, but it is in the nature of a private and not of an official telegram. I have no objection, however, to communicate the substance of it. Speaking generally, and with partial exceptions, the award is entirely satisfactory to the British interest.

ORDERS OF THE DAY.

GOVERNMENT OF IRELAND BILL.
(No. 428.)

CONSIDERATION. [SEVENTH NIGHT.]

Bill, as amended, further considered.

*MR. KIMBER (Wandsworth) moved the following new clause :—

“Upon an Address of both Houses of Parliament representing to Her Majesty that any Act passed by the Irish Legislature is, in their opinion, in contravention of Section 3 or Section 4 of this Act, or is in excess of any powers conferred by this Act, or ought for any reason to be suspended or repealed wholly or in part, Her Majesty may suspend such Act either absolutely or temporarily, and either in whole or in part.”

He said, in proposing the Second Reading of this new clause, there were no fewer than 12 sections of the Bill, besides six or seven sub-sections, naming subjects on which the Irish Parliament could or could not legislate. Sections 3 and 4, after giving a list of the prohibited subjects, declared that if the Legislature did pass a law affecting any of them such law should be void. In Clause 2 there was a general power, with the limitation that any laws passed must relate exclusively to Ireland. But there was not, from the beginning to the end of the Bill, any provision against evils that might arise or mischiefs that might be done supposing the Irish Legislature chose not to recognise those declarations, or passed laws which they reasonably thought came within the purview of the Act, although we held that they did not. Certainly Clause 20 gave power, in the event of the Secretary of State thinking an Act to be ultra vires, to certify that opinion to the Privy Council as a preliminary to securing a judicial opinion from that Body on the construction of the present Bill; but there were points other than the mere construction of the law likely to arise, and it might be that this House, and the other House, might consider that whatever the construction placed, the Irish law was passed contrary to the intention of the Imperial Parliament. The law which he proposed to enact applied to three sets of cases—(1) where the general power conferred by the Act to make laws for the government of Ireland should have been exceeded; (2) where laws were passed in specific contravention of any of those subjects which were categorised in Sections 3 or 4; and (3) where any law which for any reason in the opinion of Parliament might be considered so dangerous or so mischievous or not to have come within the provisions contemplated by the Bill that it should be suspended or repealed; and in regard to the third set he would point to the enormously wide range of subjects to which the Bill extended. It provided nothing less than a new Constitution for what had been called by some a separate Kingdom and Nationality, and that Constitution was supposed to last for all time. At any rate, it was to be a permanent law, and it would not be denied by any Member of the Government, or any one of their supporters, that there must arise in the future many cases which have not been, and could not have been, foreseen. The Prime Minister, with all his enormous talents, would not argue that the Bill covered every case that could possibly arise. He once said it passed the wit of man to find words which would do that, yet he had attempted the gigantic task of defining in words what it should be in the province of the Irish Legislature to pass laws upon. Surely he would recognise that he was fallible, and that it was probable that, in the lives of nations as of men, circumstances might arise which might not come under any specification now made, and, therefore, could not be dealt with under the general powers of the Act, and which ought not to be made merely the subject of judicial pronouncement simply on the point of the construction of the Act. It might be said that this power was not necessary, because there was a right given to go to the Privy Council; but this right was not only expensive and not open, consequently, to the poorer subjects of the Crown, but it took time to enforce it, and the mischief might meanwhile be going on under the supposed void law. They could not expect the Irish Legislature to admit that any law passed was void; they would, of course, insist that it was good and valid, and the Irish Executive would enforce it until it was proved by judicial decision to be otherwise. Hence mischief of an irremediable character might be done before the decision of the Privy Council could be obtained, and no remedy was provided for that mischief. There was no provision in the Bill by which the Government reserved power to deal with or to prevent mischief of this character. It might be said that—the supremacy of this Parliament having been reserved—it would be competent for this House to join with the other House in passing a Bill to remedy the defective Irish law. That would not, however, meet a case of abuse of power, or some mischief which required prompt and immediate remedy. The process he proposed in the new clause required merely that the two Houses should pass a Resolution which, on being sent to Her Majesty, would afford an efficient, immediate, and prompt remedy, and would avoid all the delays attendant on getting a Bill through the two Houses of Parliament. He hoped the House would accept the clause.

Clause (Suspension of Irish Act on Address from both Houses of Parliament,)—(Mr. Kimber,)—brought up, and read the first time.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Clause be read a second time."

THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY (Mr. W. E. Gladstone, Edinburgh, Midlothian): I confess I did not expect to be called upon to discuss a clause of this nature; but, by stating in a few minutes the objections of the Government, I shall say quite as much as the merits of the clause warrant. The objections are these: The clause deals with Acts of the Irish Parliament which are ultra vires. The Bill provides carefully-adjusted judicial procedure of the most impartial character, and the highest authority to dispose of all these cases. The hon. Member proposes to take away these cases from that Judicial authority and to adopt a process which is in the highest degree summary; he proposes to hand them over to this Parliament, so that a political vote given on some one occasion in this House of Parliament, and still more easily in the other House of Parliament, is to take the place of the Judicial Committee, and is absolutely to cancel what the Irish Legislature has enacted in the form required by the Bill. But what follows is still more extraordinary. If a majority of the House of Lords disapproves of an Irish Act which has been passed in due form, and on which the Irish Legislature may have spent—I will not say 80 or 90 days, but some ample period, and if the political majorities in the two Houses of the British Parliament happen to be of the same way of thinking, then by a single vote it will be possible totally to quash and cancel such legislative Act, although it has passed through the two Houses of the Irish Legislature and has been assented to by the Viceroy in the name of Her Majesty, upon the responsibility of his position as the Representative of Her Majesty. That appears to me to be a proposal which will not commend itself to any very considerable number of Members in this House. The third proposal is that, upon the strength of a single vote, not only may an Act of the Irish Parliament be quashed and cancelled, but any part of it which the Government of the day may think fit to quash and cancel may be separated from the rest and may be so dealt with, and the rest may be left to take effect as a law of the Irish Legislature. Such is the degree to which the hon. Member has perverted the fertility of his ingenuity that I doubt whether the hon. Member or any other gentleman can carry it further. The power to select any portion of the law to take effect and to cancel the rest of the law is a power in many cases to turn the law absolutely inside out and to make it, by a partial enactment, produce effects precisely the reverse of that which was intended. We object to the substitution of a political majority for the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council; we do not think there should be power to quash by one single vote the well-considered Legislative Act of the two Houses of the Irish Parliament, and we do not think there should be such a power of selection and of cancelling part of an Act as would be tantamount to allowing to operate as part of the Irish law passed by the Irish Legislature a portion of an Act so manipulated as to give effect to precisely the reverse of what was intended.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR (Manchester, E.): If my hon. Friend has been driven to make proposals which were open to objection, as no doubt they are, the fault lay, not with him, but with the Government—[Mr. W. E. GLADSTONE: Of course]—who have upon this all-important question of the veto upon the Irish Acts refused at any single period of the discussion, so far as I recollect, either to answer the arguments of the Opposition or to make such alterations in the Bill as would meet their objections. I do not, however, wish to dwell upon this beyond saying that we have a right to bring forward any proposals we desire to improve the Bill. There is no doubt that the power of the veto as it stands in the Bill is eminently unsatisfactory, and undoubtedly the power of the Privy Council could not be exercised at periods and on occasions when its judicial authority would be most valuable. Unquestionably, as the Bill stands at present, an Act might be passed by the Irish Legislature, assented to by the Lord Lieutenant, and enforced for years. Gross injustice might be done under it, and yet, until some private suit was brought before the Privy Council, the question of its injustice could not be decided. Moreover, the Privy Council would be precluded, and rightly precluded, from dealing with the question of policy at all. It is said that it will be the duty of the Lord Lieutenant, in giving or withholding his veto, to exercise his discretion, on the advice of British Ministers, as to the policy and legality of the Act to which he is called upon to give his assent. Yes; but the Lord Lieutenant is to give his assent to these Acts before they are enforced. But when he is asked to give his veto he can only prophesy and conjecture as to what the effect of the legislation will be. If the Government had not turned an absolutely deaf ear to our suggestion, but had agreed to adopt the colonial method by which the veto might be used after an interval, my hon. and learned Friend would, I admit, have had no primâ facie case for dealing with this question. The Government have, however, refused to accept the Amendment; and it is, therefore, no matter for surprise that the hon. Member, deeply conscious of the absurd position in which the question has been left by the Government, should have brought forward his proposal. I admit that some of the criticisms of the Prime Minister are well founded, and I therefore suggest to my hon. Friend that he should not press his Amendment to a Division, but that he should consider whether he cannot bring forward at a later stage some other Amendment to carry out his undoubtedly worthy object.

MR. J. CHAMBERLAIN (Birmingham, W.): I have no doubt the hon. Member will take the advice that has been tendered to him. But I must say that the point to which he has called attention deserves a little more consideration than it has at present received. [Ironical Nationalist cheers.] I am glad to find that hon. Members opposite agree with me as to its importance. They will, no doubt, take part in the discussion—[Mr. W. E. GLADSTONE: Hear, hear!]
—in some other than a purely inarticulate way. I am, at any rate, not to be debarred from discussing this matter by the ironical cheers of hon. Members, even when they are sustained by my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister. I do not think the answer of the Prime Minister is altogether conclusive. The right hon. Gentleman seems to lay great stress upon the fact that under this Amendment there will be substituted for the proceeding of a judicial tribunal what he has called a political vote in the Houses of Parliament. But that exists under the Bill at present. Supposing that, after the Bill passes, the Irish Legislature are to devote the 90 days of which my right hon. Friend has spoken to the passing of a measure which, the Lord Lieutenant is advised by the British Government, is ultra vires, what would happen? Why, according to the principle laid down by the Prime Minister himself, the Lord Lieutenant will veto that Bill. What is that veto? Not, indeed, a political vote of the House of Commons, but a political vote of a Ministry representing, perhaps, a very small majority of the House of Commons. I must say that seems to me a much stronger case; and if it be right to give this power to the Lord Lieutenant, representing the Government, I cannot conceive why the right hon. Gentleman should be so indignant when my hon. Friend proposes to give similar power to the House of Commons as a whole. Then the right hon. Gentleman refers to the words “wholly or in part”; and he seems to think that they make the proposal more objectionable than it would otherwise be. I suppose the words were introduced by way of qualification—

*MR. KIMBER: I took them from Clause 20.

MR. J. CHAMBERLAIN: That is a better illustration than I was going to offer. There may be many cases in which an Act of the Irish Legislature, on the whole a useful Act, which it is quite right to propose and pass, may contain a clause or a section which is illegal and ultra vires. Under the Bill as it stands, it would be necessary to veto the whole of the Bill in order to deal with one irregular clause or section. I should have thought it would be a convenient thing that power should be given to deal with a section objected to, while leaving the whole of the rest of the Bill untouched. But the question I wanted to call attention to is this — Do not the Government see that, in the event of a Bill having passed which is ultra vires, it is desirable that it should be rendered innocuous with as little delay as possible? It is really a serious difficulty. I am sorry the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Duchy (Mr. Bryce) is not here, for he would correct me if I am wrong. But I believe this is a difficulty which has given rise to serious trouble in the United States, where there is not the same sharp division of political opinion as in this country. But, even there, there have been cases in which an illegal Act has practically been operative for a considerable period after it has been decided to be illegal. There is the case of Virginia. The point arose in connection with a loan issued by the State of Virginia, the coupons being made receivable in lieu of taxes. For some reason or another the State of Virginia afterwards passed an Act declaring that the coupons would not be receivable, and the Supreme Court decided after a considerable interval that the State was wrong, and that the coupons must be received. But, in the meantime, the Legislature of Virginia passed another Act practically to the same effect, and by the time that the first Act was declared illegal the second Act came into force. They went on repeating that course for a considerable time; I do not know for how long, but I believe for some years. The coupons were not receivable for taxes, in spite of the decision of the Supreme Court. A similar case might easily occur in connection with the Irish Legislature; and the hon. Member is not to blame for attempting to devise some system by which, in the event of recalcitrancy such as that shown by the State of Virginia, the Irish Legislature might be speedily brought to book.

MR. SEXTON: I cannot admit that the case of the State of Virginia applies to the proposal before the House. The right hon. Gentleman says, with regard to certain Acts passed by the State of Virginia, that they were brought before the Supreme Court and declared void, and that the State of Virginia did not thereby recognise certain coupons. The right hon. Gentleman leaves entirely out of view the fact that the Congress of the United States had no power to legislate for the State of Virginia in the matter that formed the subject of the judgments. That makes the case entirely inapplicable to this Debate, because by Clause 30 of the Bill, after the Home Rule system has come into force in Ireland, this Parliament will have the power to pass overruling Acts, and any Act passed by this Parliament for Ireland after the establishment of the Home Rule system cannot even be altered by the Irish Legislature; and, therefore, it will be apparent to the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. J. Chamberlain) that he has misled the House, perhaps having previously misled himself. If any Act of the Irish Legislature were found to be inexpedient it would be open to this Parliament to pass a Bill nullifying the measure, which Bill, having been passed into law, could not be altered by the Irish Legislature; and, therefore, such a state of things as that which prevailed in Virginia could not arise in Ireland. I listened to the very weak apology made by the Leader of the Opposition for this Amendment. He says the power of veto is not satisfactory. Why is the power of veto not satisfactory? Because, he says, under this Constitution a period is not allowed to elapse after the passing of a Bill within which the question could be considered whether or not the veto should be applied. Surely, in the case of a country within four hours' sail of your shores, and seeing that the legislative proceedings would be reported in your Press, it is absurd to suggest that the time that will elapse in the passage of a Bill, especially of a contentious Bill, will not be sufficient to enable you to become absolutely familiar with all its provisions and all its effects, and that you will not be in a position to say whether or not the veto should be applied at the time of its passing. The first part of this Amendment proposes, for the first time in your Parliamentary history, to make the interpretation of Statutes a Parliamentary and not a judicial function. Hon. Members suggest that this Imperial Parliament should take up the function of determining whether or not an Irish Act is beyond the powers of the Organic Statute. The absurd effects of such an arrangement as that have been pointed out already; but I may add that it might lead to conflict between Parliament and the Judicial Authorities, because, notwithstanding this Amendment, if it were adopted, the question whether an Irish Act was ultra vires or not might come before the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council; and at the very time that the two Houses passed an Act declaring it ultra vires, the Judicial Committee might come to a decision that the Act was within the powers of the Irish Parliament. How absurd would be such a consequence! With regard to the second part of the Amendment, the suggestion is that the due process of legislation of the Irish Parliament ought to be overcome by a simple Resolution of this and the other House. Of that I can only say it is a proposal, after a lapse of 400 years, to re-enact the Law of Poynings in a much more offensive and unjust form. That law, which was passed in 1494 at Drogheda, provided that the Irish Houses should not proceed with any Bill unless the heads of the Bill had first been submitted to an English authority, and they had been approved of. Such parts of the heads of the Bill which the English authorities struck out could not be proceeded with. The Law of Poynings had this advantage—that the Irish Houses knew how far they might proceed. They knew that the heads of a Bill struck out by the English authorities could not be proceeded with, and that they must limit the heads to those approved of by England. But what is this proposal? It is that after the two Houses have taken all the trouble of going through and discussing a Bill, that then the Law of Poynings shall come into operation, and such parts of a Bill passed by the two Irish Houses as are not agreeable to the political Party that for the time dominated in England shall be struck out. Therefore, the difference between the Law of Poynings and the proposal of the hon. Gentleman is this—that the Law of Poynings gave us warning as to how far we might proceed; but this Amendment proposes that, after we have exerted ourselves by a laborious course of legislation to pass a particular Act, this House and the other House may, by a single Resolution, strike out such parts of the Bill as they disapprove of. It is a curious thing that when we are engaged in setting up an Irish Constitution a Tory Member should make a proposal more offensive and more injurious than that law which has been considered the most detestable of your Statutes in Ireland for the last 400 years.

MR. DUNBAR BARTON (Armagh, Mid.) said, he did not think there could be anything more contrary to each other than the veto of Poynings Act and the veto of his hon. Friend. As the right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Birmingham (Mr. J. Chamberlain) had reminded the House, the supremacy which the Government was giving throughout the Bill was a supremacy subject to a Party vote in the House of Commons. Unionists were of opinion that the supremacy should be exercised by legislation, and that the protection of a chance vote by which a majority might be turned out was not a sufficient protection.

*MR. BLAKE (Longford, S.) thought nothing could be more important than to recognise the fact that, as stated by the Prime Minister, 99 cases of ultra vires legislation out of 100 it would be found convenient to leave to be disposed of by the Courts. Many Acts, useful in themselves, might contain per incuriam slight provisions transcending the power of the Legislature; but, as a rule, such provisions were utterly innocuous. They had no force, inasmuch as they were beyond the power of the Legislature, and they were also otherwise innocuous, while the Act itself would probably have many virtues, and the provisions he spoke of would be found in due course to be waste paper, as they really were. He quite admitted that there might be cases even of excess in which the power of the veto might be exercised. For instance, there might be cases in which some immediate effect might be accomplished by legislation being placed upon the Statute Book, giving apparent Executive authority to the Government of the country, and there might be cases in which legislation might be in gross contempt of the Constitutional Act, and in flagrant abuse of the power of the power of the Legislature. Such a case would arise if the Legislature were to attempt to alter the succession to the Throne, or to create a Standing Army. One could understand that such a flagrant attempt to defy the fundamental law might be met by the use of the veto. But, generally speaking, the Constitution would be best, and most peacefully, and usefully worked, by leaving cases of ultra vires to the tribunals with resort to the Judicial Committee.

Question put, and negatived.

MR. SPEAKER: The next clause, standing in the name of the hon. Gentleman (Mr. Kimber) (Disqualification of persons found guilty of conspiracy), is, I think, out of Order, and was so ruled in Committee.

*MR. KIMBER said, he did not understand it had been ruled out in Committee, and he wished to know whether it would be in Order if he left out the specific reference to the Commission and made it general?

MR. SPEAKER: The objections I have to the clause are that it is ipso facto legislation—that it is a disqualifying section sought to be introduced into a Bill which contains no other disqualification, and that it would require an Instruction to make it in Order.

*MR. GERALD BALFOUR (Leeds, Central) moved the following Clause:—

(Civil process against persons resident in Great Britain.)

“From and after the appointed day no writ of summons nor other civil process shall issue from any court in Ireland for service or substituted service outside of the jurisdiction of such court upon any person domiciled or ordinarily resident in England or Scotland.”

He said, that the general rule which guided the procedure in reference to the issue of writs of summons or other Civil process from any Court in Ireland for service outside the jurisdiction of such Court on persons domiciled or ordinarily resident in England or Scotland was the old legal maxim to the effect that the plaintiff must sue in the country in which the defendant was domiciled or habitually resident. Until within a comparatively recent period, the rule had been absolute and admitted of no exceptions.

MR. T. M. HEALY (Louth, N.), rising to Order, submitted that the new clause would, if adopted, alter the English Judicature Act, and could not, therefore, be moved.

SIR H. JAMES (Bury, Lancashire) pointed out that the Amendment affected only the right of Irish Courts to issue writs.

MR. SPEAKER: I do not think the new clause requires an Instruction, or is out of Order. Had I thought so I should have stopped the hon. Member.

*MR. GERALD BALFOUR said, that even as regarded writs of subpœna, it was only since 1854 that such writs had been valid outside the jurisdiction. When Ireland had a Parliament of her own, the rule as between Ireland and England was absolute. His clause provided, so far as the Irish Courts were concerned, for a return to the state of things which existed before the Union, and for a considerable number of years after the Union. At that time the Irish Courts were, as regards this particular matter in the position of foreign Courts. So long as Ireland had an independent Parliament this was natural and inevitable. It was only the Act of Union which by fusing together the Executives and Legislatures of the two countries made a relaxation of the rule possible, even though the judicatures remained distinct. Even now the exceptions to the rule were confined to five or six special and well-defined classes of cases. He did not deny that there was considerable convenience in the existing system, nor would he suggest any change if the appointment of Judges in Ireland were to remain, as heretofore, in the hands of the Imperial Executive, if the Judges themselves were to continue responsible to the Imperial Parliament, and if the power to alter judicial procedure had been withheld from the competence of the Irish Legislature. Members from Ireland, however, could not eat their cake and have it. They could not expect to have a Legislature in Ireland which for domestic purposes was to be practically independent, and, at the same time, to enjoy all the advantages of the present system of closer union. At the present time, the rules of judicial procedure were drawn up by the Judges of the High Court of each country, were then laid upon the Table of both Houses of Parliament, and, after a certain period, ipso facto obtained the force of law. By this Bill the Irish Legislature would have the power to remodel the system of judicial procedure in Ireland. What could be more natural than that it should pass an Act providing that the rules drawn up by the Irish Judges should be laid on the Table of the two Houses of the Irish Legislature instead of on that of the Imperial Parliament? The Irish Legislature might go further and take into its own hands to determine the rules of procedure by legislative Act. Consider again the position of the Judges under the Bill. The existing Judicature Act directed them, in considering whether they should issue a writ of summons out of the jurisdiction, to take into consideration the amount of the claim and the convenience of the public and the parties to the action. These were clearly somewhat vague matters, in which there was plenty of room for difference of opinion. They were matters which must be left to the discretion of the Judges, who in Ireland were to be appointed by the Irish Legislature. In deciding such questions it was difficult for any man entirely to free himself from his personal leanings, or from such bias as the circumstances of the case might tend to give him. Therefore, without any desire to depreciate by anticipation the character of the gentlemen who might, under this Bill, be appointed Irish Judges, he could not help thinking that they would almost inevitably be prejudiced in favour of their own jurisdiction, and could not always be relied upon to hold the balance even between an Irish plaintiff and an English defendant. It was easy to see that the new order of things might result in very serious hardship to defendants domiciled in England or Scotland. He would give one example. At the present time the right to issue writs out of the jurisdiction did not extend to torts or civil wrongs. It did not extend, for instance, to the case of libel. Suppose the Irish Legislature were to extend it to the case of libel. Hon. Members below the Gangway had sometimes shown themselves extremely sensitive as to what was said of them by public men speaking upon public platforms in this country. One well known Member of the Party had brought an action against a British statesman for libel. That action had, of course, been tried in Great Britain. But suppose the Irish Legislature were to extend the issuing of writs outside the jurisdiction to actions for libel, public speakers in this country might be sued in Ireland before Irish Judges and Irish juries for statements made on English platforms. He hoped that the Prime Minister or the Solicitor General, or whoever might speak on behalf of the Government, would not oppose this clause on small technical grounds, or insist on minor difficulties that might arise under its provisions. He admitted that the clause, as it stood, might have been drawn somewhat too widely. It might, for instance, be argued that, the Exchequer Judges being Imperial Judges, the Exchequer Court ought to form an exception to the operation of the clause, and he would not be averse to accept an Amendment of the clause in that direction. He would even be prepared to go further, and accept a proviso that writs of summons might issue from Irish Courts by leave of the Exchequer Judges previously obtained, those Judges acting, of course, in accordance with the principles laid down by English law. But, at present, he only asked the House to read this clause a second time on the broad ground that the Irish Courts could have no just claim to issue writs out of the jurisdiction on persons resident in Great Britain when the Irish Executive would appoint the Irish Judges, when the Irish Judges would be responsible to the Irish Parliament, and when the Irish Parliament would have power to remodel the whole system of judicial procedure in Ireland. It seemed to him the proper course for them to pursue at present was to withdraw all such powers from the Irish Judges, leaving it to the Imperial Parliament to deal with the whole question, if it should see fit to do so hereafter, unhampered by any terms of settlement contained or implied in this Bill.

Clause (Civil process against persons resident in Great Britain,)—(Mr. Gerald Balfour,)—brought up, and read the first time.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Clause be read a second time."

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL (Sir J. RIGBY, Forfar): This proposed new clause has relation to a subject of very wide extent. It suggests a vital change between English and Irish Courts, and the only reason urged on behalf of it is that the Irish Courts cannot be trusted to act with reasonable judicial discretion in a matter of this kind, nor the Irish Legislature to make laws which will be in themselves reasonable. If they make unreasonable laws, we shall have it in our power to prevent them by a much simpler method than is suggested in the clause. The hon. Member who proposed this clause seemed to think that by accepting it we should get back to a state of things which existed when the two Kingdoms were absolutely distinct, and I think he rather put forward—

Mr. GERALD BALFOUR: Only as regards Ireland.

Sir J. RIGBY: He suggested that we were always to have the powers already given to us by the Judicature Acts and the Rules made under those Acts to serve our writs, but that the Irish Courts were not to have similar powers. That is a wholly one-sided proposal.

Mr. GERALD BALFOUR: The Bill is a one-sided Bill.

Sir J. RIGBY: The hon. Gentleman has a perfect right to say he opposes the Bill on that ground; but I also have a right to use the same argument as a reason for opposing the clause, which, whatever the Bill may be, is absolutely one-sided, and as an argument in favour of leaving the Judicature in both countries in exactly the same position. Even then we should not come to anything like the state of things which existed before the Judicature Acts were passed. The whole question of land, for instance, will be in a totally different position. Our Courts in England cannot deal directly with matters affecting land in Ireland. If, therefore, a question of that kind arises, it will be impossible to deal with a person resident in Great Britain, according to the terms of this new clause. I will give credit to the hon. Member for any Amendment which he may possibly introduce into the clause;

but I still maintain that it is objectionable, mainly on the ground that it would be humiliating to the Irish Courts by placing them in a position of inferiority as regards the corresponding Courts in England and Scotland in this respect. This question of domicile, as it now stands, will be an entire alteration of the law, even as it existed before the Union. Domicile never has had, and never ought to have, anything to do with it. It has been pointed out in Committee that a man may be resident in Ireland and may carry on his business there, and yet be domiciled in England or Scotland. Such a man will be allowed, according to this clause, to escape the jurisdiction of the Irish Courts by leaving Ireland after passing years of his life and engaging in transactions of wide extent in that country. That it is expedient, and even necessary, that there should be a right to issue writs out of the jurisdiction is shown by the fact that actions are not necessarily by one plaintiff against a single defendant; but that numberless questions often arise in which a question cannot satisfactorily be settled between A and B without bringing in C and D, who may be domiciled, or habitually resident, out of Ireland. It has always been one of our special boasts in our dealings with foreign nations—and for this purpose alone I will argue as if Ireland were a foreign nation—that what we demand from them we also in our turn concede. I do not think that a single case in modern history can be cited in which we have said that we insist upon serving our writs in their country, but refuse to that other country similar advantages. It might take weeks, according to the progress already made with these Debates, if we were to try and introduce into the Bill a full and equitable and reasonable scheme which should comprise any important part of this clause; and I do not think the House would have proceeded far in that matter without its becoming apparent that it would be altogether inequitable to say to any portion of the nation that we demand to issue writs as against them, but that we are not prepared to concede that right to their Courts as against ourselves. Though we are by this Bill creating, with knowledge and full intention, a state of things which we think ought to exist in Ireland in the future, it is proposed we should accompany that by an admission that we are thereby doing something so hazardous and dangerous to the proper administration of justice that there must be withdrawn from the Courts of the future that equality which they now enjoy, and they must be thrown back into the position of semi-barbarous nations, with whom we are bound, as a matter of policy, to impose some part of our law without giving them the same rights as against ourselves in return. I cannot conceive how such an Amendment can commend itself to the acceptance of the House, and I submit that it ought to be negatived.

MR. DUNBAR BARTON said, the hon. and learned Gentleman the Solicitor General had entirely mistaken the grounds upon which the Amendment was brought forward. With some parts of the hon. and learned Gentleman's observations both he and the proposer of the clause agreed, especially those which were delivered from a lawyer's point of view. But his hon. Friend did not desire that any single power of serving the writ out of England into Ireland should exist without mutuality and reciprocity—all he said was that before they had such mutual and reciprocal service of writs they must make a tabula rasa, now that they were setting up a separate Judicature no longer appointed by, and responsible to, the British Parliament. The Judicature Act was liable to be changed in every detail by the Irish Parliament. The question was one that affected every English and Scotch citizen, whatever his politics. The clause said that in future any English or Scotch citizen, who was liable to be sued in any jurisdiction, might be brought over to Ireland—

SIR J. RIGBY: He cannot always be sued in his own jurisdiction.

MR. DUNBAR BARTON, continuing, said, an English or Scotch citizen would, in future, be liable to be called over to Dublin at the will of the Irish Courts, and under the jurisdiction of the Irish Legislature rules might be made enforcing that. It would be an outrageous thing that the Courts and Legislature in Ireland should not only have power to legislate for its own people, but that the Court should have power to issue writs at its own sweet will and discretion against any Englishman or Scotchman in excess of the Judicature Act and the Scotch law. Experience taught them that Courts invariably tried to attract business to themselves, and it was only common sense to suppose that the Irish Courts would be placed under rules which would bring before them, when possible, English and Scotch litigants. He agreed there ought to be mutuality, but that should be set up by the Imperial Parliament—not by the Irish Legislature. The Solicitor General said this was an attempt to set up something only fit for a semi-barbarous State; but would he be surprised to hear that the very words of this Amendment were to be found in the Federation Act of Australasia of 1885, and were applied to the Australian Colonies with their consent by the Imperial Parliament? Was it not common sense that where any bodies of people formed together for a common purpose there should be mutuality. But if they allowed the Irish Judicature to do as it wished it would not be mutual—it would be non-reciprocal, and only afford it means of harassing and inconveniencing those over whom it should have no control. Before the Union there was no power of issuing writs out of the jurisdiction of Ireland in England, or out of the jurisdiction of England in Ireland; but in 1806 subpoenas were allowed to be issued in criminal cases, and in 1832, for the first time, writs were allowed to be issued in cases referring to the land. These powers were given under Common Law Procedure Acts which had been since repealed, and were now provided for in the Judicature Act. There was no objection to re-enacting them in an Imperial Act; but there was an objection to leaving the Judicature Act liable to be amended by the Irish Legislature, and by Irish Judges responsible only to that Legislature. The change proposed by the Amendment was the natural corollary of the Home Rule Bill. In the Colonies, under the rules as to service, a judgment obtained against a British subject at home could only be enforced by bringing a new action in England founded upon such judgment; but if the defendant could show he was out of the jurisdiction the whole of the judgment would go to pieces. But in Ireland the case was very different, as, under the Judgments Extension Act, a judgment obtained in an Irish Court against an English or Scotch citizen could be brought over here and registered, and the following day placed in the hands of the Sheriff, and all his goods and chattels could be taken in execution of the judgment. An ex post facto law might be passed by the Irish Legislature, because by this Bill they were going to give the Irish Legislature that power, as an Amendment to prevent it had been rejected. Such a thing could not happen in the case of the Colonies. What would happen in Ireland—say in Ulster? A gentleman might bring an action for libel, as one of the Nationalist Members did against Lord Salisbury. The defendant might not appear, and although he was served out of jurisdiction, judgment might be entered for any amount against him, and that judgment might be registered in England, and immediately executed with very harsh consequences. This was a business question. It was not suggested that a man having business relations in Ireland should not be there liable; but he was endeavouring to show that no system of this kind could be set up in Ireland without some change being made such as was suggested in the Amendment. The fact was, that they could not eat their cake and have it. They could not throw their cake out of the window and want to have it at the same time. They could not give up the Union and retain its advantages. They might allow each part of the United Kingdom to have service for its processes in every other part, as at present, because they had control of the whole system. But once they parted with control of some part of the system, it became necessary that they should alter the state of things, and declare that the processes of the Irish Courts of Law should have no force outside their own jurisdiction. From the Irish point of view—and he was sure the Nationalist Members would admit this—it was most essential that in these matters, as in commercial matters, that there was a uniformity between the two Kingdoms, because if there was not uniformity between the two Kingdoms as to the procedure of the Law Courts, English and Scotch traders would be slow to deal with the Irish traders. If an English or Scotch merchant was aware that the Civil procedure, as altered by the Irish Parliament, was most unfavourable to him as compared with an Irish suitor, he would be slow to treat with an Irish merchant, or to give that credit which was most essential to trade. Therefore, though this might seem a very small matter, it might have a very important effect on Irish trade; and he thought the Nationalist Members would be most unpatriotic and most unwise—though they might think they had sufficient reasons to justify the course they were taking—if they encouraged the chance or the possibility of any breach in the general uniformity of the Commercial Laws, without which there could be no development of trade, which was a matter of great importance to Ireland. They must take Home Rule for better or for worse. The Unionists believed it would be for the worse. If they took Home Rule they must take it accompanied with all its inconveniences to England and to Ireland. It was most unfair, too, that Irish Members should come to the Imperial Parliament, assist in the passing of rules affecting the procedure of the English Courts, and that the Imperial Parliament should have no voice in the Irish Parliament when it set itself to passing laws altering the procedure of the Irish Courts to the injury of the English and Scotch people.

SIR R. WEBSTER (Isle of Wight): I hope this Amendment will receive some further consideration from the Government. I listened to the speech of the Solicitor General, and it did not appear to me that he really understood what was the change the passing of the Home Rule Bill will affect in this matter. The hon. and learned Gentleman was extremely angry because we ventured to point out what will be the condition of things when the Home Rule Bill is passed. The Members of the Government who speak against these Amendments seem to be unable to contemplate that the Bill will pass. They may take that view if they like, but at any rate we are justified in bringing home to their minds what will be the condition of things if the Bill is passed. The hon. and learned Gentleman said that at present there was a reciprocity between the two countries; that writs issued out of the High Court of Justice in England could be served in Ireland; and that writs issued out of the High Court of Justice in Ireland could be served in England. We have not the slightest objection to reciprocal relations of that kind between the two countries. But my hon. and learned Friend, in endeavouring to suggest a conclusive argument against the Amendment, will not bring himself to consider what the real condition of things will be if this Bill is passed. The power of altering the Law of Procedure, the Law of Evidence, and the Law of Execution will be in the hands of the Irish Parliament, and we shall not have the slightest right of interference except by causing a conflict between the two countries by passing an Act which would practically be a breach of faith so far as this Home Rule Bill is concerned. Why have the present mutual relations between the two countries for the service of writs been established? Because hitherto Acts have been passed for the two countries by the Imperial Parliament. A Judicature Act has been passed for England and a Judicature Act has been passed for Ireland by the Imperial Legislature. But if this Home Rule Bill becomes law, so far from there being reciprocity between the two countries, the condition of things will be altogether one-sided. Nothing can prevent the Irish Legislature from making a rule that in a case of libel the writ should not only be served out of England, but the action be tried in the Irish Courts. If that were done it may happen that a similar rule would be made in England, or an Act of Parliament passed with regard to the service of writs out of the jurisdiction in respect to cases in the High Court of Justice of England. But that would be an act of retaliation, which would not answer the injustice committed or the hardship inflicted on persons liable to be taken over to Ireland and sued there for actions brought against them in respect to matters entirely and solely connected with England. If you say that the Amendment as it stands is one-sided; if you think it to be unjust to prevent Irish writs being served in England, amend it by preventing English writs being served in Ireland. If that were done I would support any such Amendment. You must remember what the position will be after Home Rule is passed. British subjects are going to be made liable in actions taken against them according to laws passed by an Irish Legislature over which this country has no control. We say that the Irish Legislature ought not to be allowed to inflict serious injury on persons in England who may have committed a breach of the Irish law. The action brought against Lord Salisbury was mentioned, whereupon the hon. Member for Louth said—"Where was the action tried?" It was tried in England. We do not object to that, but we object to be brought under the jurisdiction of the Irish Courts. What we complained of is that laws may be passed and procedure enacted which will be unjust to persons who may in some way have offended the Irish Members. If there is to be reciprocity it ought to be established by the Imperial Parliament where the Members of the different parts of the Kingdom can be heard. I submit, therefore, that the Amendment is reasonable, and that it is necessary for the protection of the British subjects against vexatious and harassing litigation in Ireland.

MR. T. M. HEALY (Louth, N.): This Amendment differs from any others that have been yet proposed, in that it has not been proposed with the object of wasting time. It has been proposed out of pure malice; but not having been proposed with the object of wasting time, I think it is deserving of serious treatment. Apparently, it has been proposed by the hon. Gentleman because, he says, of actions having been brought by Irish Members against English statesmen.

*MR. GERALD BALFOUR: I gave that merely as an illustration. I did not say that the Amendment was proposed on that account.

MR. T. M. HEALY: As I understand, it has been suggested, at any rate, as one of the advantages under this Amendment, that you could not in future bring actions against English statesmen.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR (Manchester, E.): In Ireland.

MR. T. M. HEALY: Exactly. No action has been brought in Ireland against any English statesman. There was, of course, the case of the midwife Peggy Dillon, who sued the Irish Secretary in Ireland. Does anybody suggest that the Irish Secretary may not be sued in Ireland? Therefore, what is the relevance of this Amendment? Lord Salisbury was sued in England by an Irish Member, as he may still be sued in England by an Irish Member. How on earth does Lord Salisbury's action affect the matter? Lord Salisbury's libel—a very unfortunate libel it was—was a libel committed in England, and he was sued in England. What is the relevance of bringing in Lord Salisbury's case as an illustration? It has been said that we do not apply our minds to the question. I applied whatever mind I had to it. The suggestion now is that we may alter the law so as to sue the noble Lord in Ireland. It is said that there may be ex post facto legislation, which is so favourable to the Tory Party, for they moved two Amendments in favour of ex post facto legislation. Let us take that case. Let us assume that we commenced an action against Lord Salisbury in Ireland. Has Lord Salisbury any property in Ireland on which damages can be levied? The legal thing for you to do is to repeal the Judgments Extension Act. That is an Imperial Statute. You have it in your hands, and the moment the Irish proposed to bring over and implead a number of innocent English gentlemen in that country, it is quite clear that all you have to do is to repeal your Imperial Statute, the Judgments Extension Act. In the name of fortune what good would a Judgment for £1,000,000 in Dublin against Lord Salisbury be to any person? You could not levy it. He has no Irish property. It would be of no use to anybody, and it would be only when the Irish Court by its Judgment obtained the benefit of the Judgments Extension Act, and when you come across to Westminster and register your Judgment, it is only then that the thing would have force or effect. Is not the Judgments Extension Act an Imperial Statute? Are not the rules under it under Imperial authority? Cannot the English Courts make rules dealing with it? And what would be easier if you refused—with that scrupulous regard for Irish rights which this House has always recognised—if you refused to repeal the Judgments Extension Act, what is to prevent you in the Courts making rules as to Judgments in Ireland? As far as we have had any experience of the Judges of the Commission Court, they are not violent Nationalists — Judge Haunen, Judge Day, and another gentleman whose name

I have forgotten. Judge Smith is not a name we usually forget. We have had experience of these gentlemen, and we did not find a great desire or anxiety to do us that perfect justice which we might have expected. These gentlemen could make a rule that if a Judgment of an Irish Court is attempted to be brought across to England they must be satisfied that it is a just Judgment. Therefore, it does seem to me that this is a most remarkable thing. To use a mining phrase, it is the very tailings of debate. But, furthermore, may I suggest to the hon. Member for Mid Armagh (Mr. Dunbar Barton) that it would be a very unfortunate thing for firms like Guinness's Brewery, which have very large relations in England, if you pass such a law; or take the English Insurance Companies, which have large mortgages upon Irish land. The hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for the Isle of Wight (Sir R. Webster) said that we should have reciprocity: that Englishmen should not have the run of our cupboard against us without our having the run of their cupboard against them. Take the case of a man who seeks to execute in England a mortgage on Irish property. There would be no power of process whatever from Westminster across to Dublin under the proposed suggestion of the ex-Attorney General. How are you going to get at this Irish property? The simple answer is, leave it alone. You have the power in your hands to make the basis of English laws apply to Ireland just the same as before. But, finally, the clause absolutely is inoperative. Supposing it was passed, it would make no difference whatever. I pointed out that without the benefit of the Judgments Extension Act such a process as is referred to in the proposed clause would be absolutely useless. You can repeal that Act. Suppose that it was the case of a gentleman who had Irish property. Very well. There is nothing to prevent the Irish Courts making a rule that service on that gentleman on his Irish property would be good service. There is no provision as to domicile. No doubt, the right hon. Member for Bury (Sir Henry James) will put down a domicile Amendment. I make that suggestion to him, to be considered in his leisure moments. I do not think that it would be at all unreasonable—Lord Clanricarde, for instance—that a person owning half a county might reasonably be served in Ireland at his castle at Portumna. As the question of domicile has not been touched let us assume that the Irish Courts held that any gentleman who owns half a county might fairly be considered to have a domicile in that county. That being so, you can easily come at any gentleman resident in England who had property in Ireland. But then, I suppose, there must be persons who have domiciles in both countries, and their case, unfortunately, is not provided for, so that absolutely you might have a man who might have English property and Irish property, and because he had an English domicile he could not be sued at all, which, as has been once observed in this House, is absurd.

*MR. BUTCHER (York) said, the object of the Amendment was different from that of every other Amendment moved by the Opposition. Its object was to protect English and Scotch subjects from harassing litigation. The Irish Legislature might so alter the civil procedure of Ireland as to impose upon English and Scotch subjects an extremely unpleasant and harassing course of litigation. Take the case of a contract formed in England between an Englishman and an Irishman domiciled in Ireland. If the contract were broken in England, according to the existing law the Irishman would have to seek his remedy in the English Courts. But it would be quite in the competency of the Irish Legislature so to alter the rules of procedure as to place it in the power of the Irishman to inflict on the Englishman harassing litigation to which he could not now be subjected. Under the law as it stood, Judgment obtained in Ireland could be enforced in England. But, said the hon. and learned Member for North Louth (Mr. T. M. Healy), the Judgments Extension Act could be repealed by the English Judges. He should be surprised to hear that a Committee of Judges could repeal an Act of Parliament; and until he was corrected by some authority, he would believe that the Judgments Extension Act would continue in force. The Solicitor General had offered only two arguments against the clause. One was that if the Irish Legislature tampered with the procedure of the Courts an Imperial Act to checkmate it could always be passed. There were two answers to that argument. The Solicitor General might view with indifference the multiplying of causes of conflict between the Imperial Parliament and the Irish Legislature; but the object of the opponents of the Bill was to avoid these possible causes of difference. Then, again, if the argument that the Imperial Parliament could pass an over-riding Act of Parliament was a good one, it would make every single restriction in the Bill unnecessary. The object of these restrictions was to prevent possible causes of conflict between the Imperial and the Irish Parliaments by preventing the Irish Parliament from travelling into provinces which they had no right to travel upon. The Solicitor General gave another reason against the clause. He said—"I object to one-sided dealing." The very reason why the clause was submitted was to prevent one-sided dealing. As the matter stood at present, the Imperial Parliament only made laws for the service of processes out of England in Ireland and out of Ireland in England. The Solicitor General proposed that the Irish Parliament, in which the English people would be unrepresented, should have the power to make laws for the service of processes in England out of Ireland. The opponents of the Bill did not want that one-sided dealing. They desired to retain in the Imperial Parliament the power of making laws for the service of processes in Ireland out of England, and in England out of Ireland. What they objected to, and what they endeavoured to prevent by this clause, was that it should be left in the power of the Irish Legislature to harass English and Scotch subjects by a new procedure in litigation, differing from the procedure now in force between the two countries.

*MR. DODD (Essex, Maldon) said, the object of the Amendment, as he understood it, was to degrade the Irish Courts, and the reason assigned was because of the antecedents of the Irish gentlemen who would probably constitute the Irish Judges. He ventured to think the object was not one of which this House would for a moment approve. It was perfectly true, as stated by the hon. and learned

Member for Mid Armagh (Mr. Dunbar Barton), that before the Union the Irish Courts did not exercise the power of sending their writs to England, and the same thing applied to foreign countries. The reason was that in those days there was not so much commercial enterprise or so many contracts of an International character made by British subjects. But as commerce grew it was found necessary for the Courts of the country to issue writs outside their actual territorial limits; and the general rule at present was, in most countries and most colonies, that wherever there was a contract made and broken within the jurisdiction, though the persons to be sued were outside, for the Court to assume jurisdiction and send process outside. They did that with regard to France, and France did it with regard to this country, and it was the same with the Colonies. What the new clause proposed was to place the Irish Courts in a different position to that of the Courts of every other civilised country. He ventured to think the House would not for a moment assent to a clause that did that. It seemed to him that if the Irish Parliament or the Irish Executive were likely to appoint Judges who were not fit for their posts, the remedy was not to be sought by endeavouring to cripple the Courts by Amendments of this kind, but to deal with the matter under other clauses in the Bill—by keeping more control over the Courts. Whether that was wise or not he did not now propose to inquire, but he submitted to the House that it could not be right to impose on the Irish Courts this limitation, placing them in a position inferior to those of the colonies and of foreign countries.

MR. ROSS (Londonderry) could quite understand the vehemence of the hon. and learned Member for North Louth (Mr. T. M. Healy) in opposing this Amendment, but he had great difficulty in understanding the strong expressions used by the hon. and learned Member who had just sat down (Mr. Dodd). The hon. and learned Member for Louth (Mr. T. M. Healy) took the whole matter as a personal affront; he had destined himself as one of the future Irish Judges; and in that capacity, as he would have to make rules, he thought it an affront to himself for any Englishman to imagine he would not make rules perfectly fair for Englishmen and Scotchmen who might come under his jurisdiction. But as for the hon. and learned Member who had just sat down (Mr. Dodd), he had stated the intention of the Amendment was to degrade the Irish people, owing to the antecedents of the men who would be appointed. He (Mr. Ross) listened most carefully to the speech of his hon. Friend who introduced the Amendment, and he most carefully guarded himself against any such intention; he expressly stated it was not for that reason at all, but for a reason that must be patent to the mind of every commercial man, and that was that the Courts over whom the English and Scotch people had no control whatever should not be permitted to make these rules affecting their commercial position in the future. That was a plain, common-sense position to be taken up, and how had it been dealt with? The argument of the hon. and learned Solicitor General (Sir J. Rigby) had been dealt with by hon. Members who had preceded him, but the hon. and learned Member for North Louth (Mr. T. M. Healy) said the first thing they should do was to repeal the Judgments Extension Act. That was a large order; that was an Act that was most important with regard to both England and Ireland, and the first thing the hon. Member proposed was to repeal that Act. Not to give the Irish Legislature or the Irish Courts the power to issue writs for service out of the jurisdiction was comparatively a small matter in comparison to such an extreme step as the repeal of the Judgments Extension Act. What they said was that as this was a matter that dealt with their own commercial men, it should be dealt with by the Imperial Parliament, and he supported this Amendment, not maliciously as was insinuated by hon. Members on the other side, but in the sincere belief that if the Amendment were not carried it would very much tend to diminish legal business in Ireland. They all knew there was nothing so sensitive as commerce or capital; and if the great traders who sent over large quantities of capital and who dealt extensively with Ireland once got it into their minds that in case of litigation they were to be dealt with by Judges appointed by the Irish Legislature over whom they had no control, he had no doubt they would refuse to deal at all with Ireland, and in that way great injury would be inflicted upon Ireland. He submitted the Amendment was one that ought to be carried, and he also believed that if it was not serious injury would result to Ireland.

MR. WADDY (Lincolnshire, Brigg) said, that to him it seemed this was about the most extraordinary Amendment that had been put down in the whole course of the Bill. This was not a question as to any right of action, or as to any good and honest custom, but was purely a matter of procedure. The argument was that some person in Ireland, having a perfectly good cause of action against another person who would not come to Ireland to be served, and who avoided all service and avoided all action by the simple process of living at Birkenhead, Liverpool, or Holyhead for the matter of that, was to be prevented from calling upon his debtor to pay his debt, and that the debtor was to be protected by the simple process of remaining away. When they had done with these extremely fanciful notions that had been advanced that was what it came to. In order to obtain the debt the creditor in Ireland must go to Holyhead with his witnesses, and perhaps have to come to London to have the case tried. That was the suggestion, and he considered it was an exceedingly absurd one. It was one that found favour with them a good many years ago, but they had had the common sense to destroy all that. But having got rid of it now, what was proposed was to reenact half of it for Ireland; that was really the calm proposition laid before the House of Commons at this day. When they came to consider what was wanted, he thought they would treat it—he said it good humouredly—with the contempt it deserved. It meant they were to introduce for the first time a permanent protection of the absentee landlords from being attacked on any contract they might make in Ireland. He hardly thought they should lend themselves to a scheme so simple, but at the same time so monstrous and so wrong.

*SIR A. ROLLIT (Islington, S.) was glad to hear the hon. Member for Mid Armagh (Mr. Dunbar Barton), who moved the Amendment, say that this matter was not to be regarded as a Party question. From his point of view, it was a question of equity. He did not hesitate to say, if the question were whether uniformity of procedure should be maintained, the arguments on that point were complete; and when the question of uniformity of action with regard to bills of exchange was before the House, he took that view and supported the expression of opinion entertained on that (the Conservative) side of the House; but he could not see that this matter, at any rate in this Amendment, did involve any question of uniformity of procedure. He would like to ask those who advanced this point whether they realised that if this clause was carried it would put Ireland in a worse position legally for the assertion of her legal rights than any foreign country. If that could be answered in the negative he admitted that what he was going to advance might be capable of considerable answer; but if, on the other hand, the view he ventured to take—and he ventured to take it without presumption—was correct, there could be no worse precedent than a step of this character, which would be fatal to Imperial unity of feeling and action. What was the law on this subject? The late Attorney General (Sir R. Webster) had put it that if anyone went over to Ireland there could be no objection to his being sued. But this was a question of legal jurisdiction. Many facts might give jurisdiction. Residence was one, but the origin of the cause of action was another one; and that was probably the most important of all, because in the service of writs out of the jurisdiction the main point in the affidavit on which leave must be obtained was whether the cause of action originated within the jurisdiction. If a contract arose in France and was broken in France, the action could be taken in the French Courts; and if Judgment were so given against a domiciled Englishman, execution could be issued by an English Court without even going into the merits at all, by what was called the comity of nations. And now if this clause passed that which could be done daily with France and other countries, which did not divert commerce—a consideration which did not prevent their entering into commercial transactions—could not be done in Ireland. The clause said that—against any British subject not resident in that country. In his opinion, that was not in accordance with the lines of modern jurisprudence—not in accordance with the development of Commercial Law which was becoming daily of a more International character, and which afforded more facilities for the serving of writs. After that, and in vindication of this clause, they were told that rules should be made by which such a Judgment should not be executed. There was one case where our Courts would not issue execution, and that was where it was contrary to natural equity; and if it were attempted to execute a Judgment on process which had never been served, or the like, in such a case, notwithstanding the Judgments Extension Act, they would refuse to take a course not founded on natural equity. If he was right in his view, he could not vote for the clause. He could not place Ireland in a worse position than foreign countries; and if he was wrong, he should regret having taken a view opposed to his Party, but which he believed, in justice to his own conscience and in his independent duty to his constituents, he was bound to take.

*SIR H. JAMES (Bury, Lancashire) said, the speeches of the two learned Gentlemen on that side of the House (Mr. Waddy and Mr. Dodd) had filled him with astonishment, and he thought they must be labouring under forgetfulness of what was the law in this country. Under the law now, as established by the constituted authority, by Rule under the Judicature Act, they had no power to serve a writ upon a resident in Ireland if he were domiciled in Scotland or Ireland. By Rule 3, Order 11, it was provided that—

"Service out of the jurisdiction of a writ of summons or notice of a writ of summons may be allowed by the Court or a Judge whenever the action is founded on any breach or alleged breach within the jurisdiction of any contract which, according to the terms thereof, ought to be performed within the jurisdiction, unless the defendant is domiciled or ordinarily resident in Scotland or Ireland."

That was the Rule which, by statutory authority, our Courts had laid down, so that they could not, if a person was domiciled in Scotland or Ireland, as distinguished from his being a passing visitor, they could not, out of the English Courts, issue a writ in an action of contract against that person, although the contract had been made here and was to be performed here. The Amendment had followed those very words, that it should not issue

"Upon any person domiciled or ordinarily resident in England or Scotland."

Now, might he ask where came in the indignation of his hon. and learned Friend the Member for Lincolnshire (Mr. Waddy), who said it was monstrous to do what the Judges, under their statutory power, had thought it right to do in actions of contract as regarded Scotland and Ireland? This was not a question of one country extending its own jurisdiction and enforcing it upon another; the point of difficulty here was that a person might be resident and domiciled here, but might have chattels and property in Ireland, and the Irish Courts might issue execution against the chattels in Ireland, even though the cause of action did not arise in Ireland. When his hon. and learned Friend expressed such indignation at Amendments such as these, perhaps it would be better if he recollected that they were now about to give to another country power to make laws and to appoint Judges, and we should have no power to control that country so as to rest the community existing between the two parts of the United Kingdom upon this Parliament and not upon the subordinate Parliament which would practically be free from the supremacy of the Imperial Parliament. The proximity of this country to Ireland required safeguards more than was the case with our Colonies. The indignation of the hon. and learned Member for Lincolnshire (Mr. Waddy) was not justified either by the Amendment itself or the very able argument of his hon. and learned Friend the Member for Mid Armagh (Mr. Dunbar Barton).

MR. A. J. BALFOUR (Manchester, E.): I acknowledge some hesitation in intervening in these technical arguments. ["Oh, oh!"] No doubt the hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for Donegal (Mr. Mac Neill), who interrupts me, is eminently fitted to shine in them. I do not profess to have the same depth of learning he so often displays in the Irish Courts ; but I wish to explain why I shall vote for the Amendment of my hon. Friend. I shall vote for it on certain broad principles of equity, which seems to me to be involved in the proposition he has laid before the House. Before coming to the substance of the Amendment, I may say one word on the extraordinary argument submitted by the learned Member for Louth (Mr. T. M. Healy) and entertained by other speakers who have spoken in this Debate. He said—"What harm can it do to bring an action against an Englishman, because he would have no Irish property over which the Irish Judges would have any jurisdiction? What is the use of condemning Lord Salisbury in costs if he has no Irish property on which the costs can be levied." Lord Salisbury may be in the happy position of having no Irish property ; that I do not know ; but it may also be the fact, and I say it will be, that after the passing of the Home Rule Bill everyone domiciled in England and Scotland will, with the utmost expedition and despatch on their part, remove all their property from Ireland ; but for the unfortunate remainder who may not be able to realise some consideration should be extended, even by the hon. and learned Member for Louth. The learned Member for one of the Divisions of Lincolnshire said—"Is it not contrary to common sense to go back to a condition of things that may have been tolerable in the last century, but which is not tolerable now ; is it not absurd to go back to a time when England and Ireland were treated for these purposes as different countries ; is it not necessary to keep up that reciprocity that has existed for many years past?" I agree that common sense demands there should be intercommunication between England and Ireland, and common sense had its own way in 1800 ; but in 1893 common sense has gone to the wall in these matters, and we are only endeavouring to fit details into the general principles of that measure which certainly are not inconsistent with common sense. We have got to face the fact that by this Bill Ireland is for many purposes—and for the most important purpose for which civil government exists—to be made a different country to England ; and what we have got to do is to see that the English subjects of

Her Majesty shall be protected from oppression which may be attempted from Irish Courts and the Irish Executive over which the British Courts and Executive have no control whatever. My hon. Friend the Member for South Islington (Sir A. Rollit) said he could not support this Amendment, because it would put Ireland in a worse position, as against persons domiciled in England, than either France or any other Foreign State. Though that is a legal matter, still I do not think my hon. and learned Friend is rightly advised. There is, at all events, this fundamental distinction : that while, no doubt, the French Court may take what action it pleases with regard to a person domiciled in England when it has taken its action and brought in a verdict, it cannot enforce it upon English subjects.

*SIR A. ROLLIT : I am sure the right hon. Gentleman will allow me to repeat what I said, which was that, if a Judgment was brought over, it could be sued upon in an English Court without any inquiry whatever as to the facts of the case, if the jurisdiction of the foreign Court was established.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR : I will not enter into a conflict in legal matters with my hon. and learned Friend, but I do understand, from those more learned than I, that it is easy to set up a defence which the English Courts would regard. But, at all events, my hon. and learned Friend will admit that, after Judgment, a British subject is not in the same helpless position as regards the Foreign Courts as he undoubtedly is with regard to the Irish Courts. There is a broad distinction between a British subject against whom a verdict is returned in a Foreign Court and that same British subject against whom a verdict is returned in an Irish Court ; therefore, so far from the position of Ireland—if this Amendment be passed—being worse than France or Germany in respect of persons domiciled in England, really the very reverse is the case. The broad fact this House has got to consider is this : We are instituting in Ireland a Legislature and an Executive which will make the law and appoint the Judges without our control and without any effective power of interference on our part. In the course of this Bill we have endeavoured to protect, against what we regard as the injurious operation of that new system, subjects of Her Majesty resident in Ireland. We now want to protect subjects of Her Majesty not resident in Ireland but in England. Surely one of the most obvious and plain duties is for this House to see that if mischief should be done in Ireland by the new system, those mischiefs, at all events, shall not be permitted to extend to the subjects of Her Majesty domiciled in England or Scotland. That appears to me a question of plain justice, and I hope, Sir, through all the mists of technicalities with which inevitably this subject is shrouded and covered, the clear principles of justice and public policy which require an English subject to be safe in England against any oppressive practice in Courts over which we have no control should be maintained; and as no other suggestion than that of my hon. Friend has been brought forward for carrying out that undoubtedly desirable object, I say, unless further argument be urged by gentlemen opposite against the course I am about to pursue, that I shall certainly support the Amendment.

MR. J. CHAMBERLAIN (Birmingham, W.): The Debate, I believe, is to a large extent a technical Debate. Of course, so far as that is the case, I do not feel myself competent to take part in it. There is one practical point, I believe, which has not been touched upon, and which I think ought to be of great interest to politicians in this House, to whatever Party they belong, and especially to their Leaders. I say it ought to be of interest to politicians of both Parties, because although it is possible that one Party now may feel that at present, at all events, they are not likely to be subjected to any hostility on the part of the Irish Members opposite, no one can say that the circumstances may not entirely change in the course of a few years, and those who now are regarded with most friendship by hon. Members opposite may not, in a very short time, find themselves in a totally different situation. We have seen changes quite as remarkable. We could quote the case of very distinguished politicians who at one time, only a few years ago, accused them (the Irish Members) of almost the greatest crimes, and as to whom, a short time afterwards, the same persons—their own accusers—expressed themselves as willing to black their boots. The point which I want to bring to the attention of the House—of the Government—is the position in which we shall be placed, if this Amendment is not carried, in regard to prosecutions for libel. There was, some time ago—I am not quite certain whether it happened between the years 1880 and 1885 or between 1886 and 1892—but in one of those periods there was a statement which appeared in all the Irish papers to the effect that the Nationalist Party had appointed a committee whose business it was to read with care all the English newspapers, and to see whether in these English papers, either in the articles or the reported speeches, there was anything which could by any possibility be construed into a libel upon any of the Irish Party or upon any Irishman, and I believe it was the duty of this committee in such cases to take the necessary proceedings. I remember when that announcement was made I thought it added a new terror to political life. At the same time, it was certainly done under these circumstances. Even if this committee thought that a libel had been uttered, they would have to try the case, whether in Ireland or in England, before Judges who were appointed by the Imperial Parliament, and who probably would act according to precedents and English law. Now that is to be entirely changed, I want to know what would be my position; for instance, suppose after the Home Rule Bill is passed, I go to Birmingham or Leeds and accuse certain Irish Members of marching through rapine to the dismemberment of the Empire? Suppose I were to say they were preaching the gospel of plunder? [Mr. T. M. HEALY: Ransom.] Suppose I were to say they were steeped to the lips in treason? All these are statements I should not hesitate to make at the present time, and I am perfectly willing to stand my chance of an action for libel in case I did say them, and in that case I should certainly justify them, and I should have no hesitation in anticipating a favourable verdict, whether from a Court in Ireland or Great Britain. But under this Bill the circumstances might be entirely changed. You might have a new lot of Judges, new laws, and, above all, new procedure, and it certainly would be rather an uncomfortable reflection in making a speech of that kind—which certainly does not go beyond legitimate criticism, which all politicians allow to themselves in regard to their opponents—if I was to have a libel action entered against me in Ireland and a verdict given against me according to the new views of Irishmen in regard to the Law of Libel, and that then if I had property in Ireland, to have that property attacked, and if I had not to have the Judgment brought over here, and, as the hon. and learned Gentleman opposite (Sir A. Rollit) said, to have the Courts here incapable of entering again into the facts of the case, but obliged only to see whether it is a legal Judgment; and if they hold the Judgment against me was legal, then to enforce that Judgment against my property in this country. I really think I have contributed a practical illustration to the discussion, and I cannot help thinking there are even right hon. Gentlemen on that (the Government) Bench who would find their eloquence very seriously curtailed if they were liable to be brought to book in the way in which they can be brought to book unless an Amendment of this kind is adopted.

MR. JUSTIN MCCARTHY (Longford, N.): I do not intend to occupy the time of the House for more than two or three minutes, and I shall not go at all into the technical question just now under debate. I only want to reply, as far as I can, to one statement made by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Birmingham (Mr. J. Chamberlain), who has brought into this short discussion, into the few sentences he spoke, some of that remarkable imagination and some of that remarkable bitterness which, blended together, made up so many of his contributions to discussions on Irish questions. The right hon. Gentleman told us that there was some committee got up by the Irish Nationalist Party to investigate and discover and follow out actions and causes for libel against opposing Members of Parliament. I think if such a committee had been organised or got up or suggested or talked of at all it might have plenty of work before it. But I think also that the existence of a committee of that kind, or a suggestion of a committee of that kind, would somehow or other have found its way into my knowledge and the knowledge of my hon. Friends around me. I have only to say that so far as I know—so far as my friends around me know—there never was such a committee suggested, there never was such a committee thought about, and that argument must go to the limbo of other arguments for which the right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Birmingham is mainly responsible.

Question put.

*MR. HENEAGE (Great Grimsby) proposed an Amendment to the effect that the Preamble should be omitted. He called attention, first, to the fact that the Preamble had never been discussed; and, secondly, that they were discussing an entirely new Bill. This Bill, when introduced by the Government, was introduced to set up an Irish Legislature, which was to be a subordinate Legislature, and also there was not to be full retention of the Irish Members. It had been alleged against the Unionists that the retention of the Irish Members in that House for all purposes was due to them. He had denied that before, and he denied it again. They had never been in favour of an Irish Legislature, or of Home Rule; but what they had always said was that they were willing to retain the Irish Members in that House and also to give local self-government to Ireland. It had been decided by the House that they were to retain the Irish Members there in full possession of all their powers. He objected, therefore, to their having an Irish Legislature in Ireland in addition, so that they would have power altogether in Ireland, and have power in England also. But that was not his only reason. He objected to the Bill, because it did not carry out the conditions which they were told were to be the conditions in which the Irish Legislature should be created. It was founded on these five conditions—First, that the Imperial unity was to be maintained; second, that there should be equality of all the Kingdoms; third, an equitable re-partition of Imperial charges; four, protection of minorities; and five, a real and a continuing settlement. Those, they were told, were the principles upon which alone the granting to Ireland of a subordinate Legislature should be based. Had these conditions been supplied by this Bill? In the first place, they had not got a subordinate Legislature, and, in the second place, Imperial unity was not maintained. How could Imperial unity be maintained under the Bill as it stood? They had only discussed about one-fourth of the Bill, and of the rest of the Bill probably one-fourth was entirely new, and not only new, but entirely opposed to the clauses in regard to the Irish representation and finance which were in the Bill at the time and during the first part of the Committee stage. This Legislature in Ireland was not to be a subordinate Legislature; words were moved to render it so, but the Government refused to accept them. They now knew the powers which the Government proposed to confer upon it; and they knew that it was the kind of legislation to which the Chancellor of the Exchequer (Sir W. Harcourt) said he would never be a party. [Laughter, and "Hear, hear!"] Yes; for the Chancellor of the Exchequer was at that time in favour, he thought, of a subordinate Legislature, but the hon. Member for Waterford (Mr. J. E. Redmond) told them he would have Parnellite Home Rule; and Parnellite Home Rule and the Fenian Home Rule which the right hon. Gentleman said he would never have, were one and the same thing. Then there was the question of equality between the two countries.

THE CHIEF SECRETARY FOR IRELAND (Mr. J. MORLEY, Newcastle-upon-Tyne): Mr. Speaker, upon a point of Order, I wish to ask you whether, in discussion upon the Preamble, it is competent to go into the subject of the policy of the Bill, and to make a Second Reading speech?

MR. SPEAKER: On Report the whole Bill is open to review. In what I say, I do not want to favour one side more than another; but I am bound to say that a Second Reading discussion upon the Report stage seems to me extending the limits of discussion upon Report to an unusual degree. But I cannot say that it is out of Order, because the whole Bill is open to review. I hope the discussion will be confined to those parts of the Bill which were not discussed in Committee. In what I say I appeal to both sides of the House, without the least desire to interfere with freedom of discussion.

*MR. HENEAGE said, he did not desire to go over the ground that had been covered by the discussion in Committee; but he thought he was entitled to point out on the Preamble the character of the Bill as it now stood. He, of course, accepted the ruling of the Chair, and he would not speak at much length, his desire being merely to show how different the Bill now was, as it was before the House, from the Bill as it had been introduced. He had mentioned one particular in which the difference was apparent. He would deal with others very briefly. In regard to the question of equality between England and Ireland, there was no longer any equality. They were setting up a Legislature in Ireland which would not only give the Irish uncontrolled power over everything in their own country, but would allow them to govern everything in this country also. If that were the equality that they were promised they must have misunderstood the Prime Minister when he introduced his Bill. One of the advantages promised from Home Rule was that the Irish would be given the management of their own affairs, and that they would no longer have those affairs disposed of in this House. That condition had not been complied with. Then there was the question of the equal re-partition of Imperial charges; if they were equal under the Financial Clauses as originally drafted under the undiscussed clauses now withdrawn, there was no such equality now. And if they were bad in one case, they were ten times worse at present. The effect of the clauses would be that extra taxation would be imposed upon Great Britain equal to a rate of 1d. in the £1 on the Income Tax, or 6s. 8d. per head of the British electors, or an average contribution of about £3,500 from each British constituency. He thought the constituencies would not be much in love with Home Rule when they found that they would have to pay this for the pleasure of allowing the Irish to govern their own affairs and those of England, Scotland, and Wales as well. The fourth condition laid down was with regard to the protection of minorities. What had been done? Were minorities protected? They had given power to those who had not shown much tender mercy for the minority in Ireland in the past to suspend the Habeas Corpus Act; to confiscate Dublin and Belfast Universities; to pass ex post facto legislation, to control all Criminal Law, and to administer the Land Laws. Yet they said there was protection for the minority! Where was the promise given on the introduction of the Bill? Then, again, they were told that there was to be finality of the Bill. They were to have that; but instead they had the subjugation of England, Scotland, and Wales to Ireland, and there was the only finality whatever under those circumstances; there was not even a pretence of finality, or of a real or continuing settlement, in regard either to the arrangements for Irish Members, the financial adjustment, the Judicial and Police arrangements, or the Land Question. All these questions were left over to be settled again, and it could not be said, therefore, that there was any finality. He, therefore, said that the promises upon which the Bill had been brought in had not been fulfilled, and on that ground he said the Preamble ought to be rejected. The Bill was practically a new one in all its most essential principles. What did a Radical writer say the other day. He said—

"The Bill which was read a first and second time is not the Bill which is now before the Committee. The abandonment of the Financial Clauses and the sacrifice of the 9th clause confront the House with what is practically a new Bill."

That was the opinion of Mr. Stead. [Laughter.] Well, if hon. Members did not now regard Mr. Stead as a Radical, his opinion was confirmed by the hon. Member for Northampton (Mr. Labouchere) in his farewell letter to his constituents, and perhaps it would be allowed that that gentleman was a Radical. It was too late in the day, now that they had reached August, to commence de novo to break up the Constitution. He asked them, therefore, to reject the Preamble of a Bill which would not, at any rate, become law this Session.

Mr. Heneage

Question proposed, "That the Preamble stand part of the Bill."

THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY (Mr. W. E. GLADSTONE, Edinburgh, Midlothian) was understood to say that his right hon. Friend had undertaken, on the ruling of the Chair, that he would not go further in the discussion of the Bill at this stage.

MR. HENEAGE said, he said that he would not go fully into the questions he wished to raise. If he said "further" it was a slip of the tongue.

MR. W. E. GLADSTONE said, the question before them was a narrow one; but his right hon. Friend had delivered a Third Reading speech on his proposal to exclude the Preamble. Mr. Speaker had declared—and any declaration he made the House was ever ready to accept—that the making of such a speech at that stage could not be pronounced disorderly; but he also proceeded to say that it was unusual, and that it extended the limits of Parliamentary practice. Perhaps he (Mr. W. E. Gladstone) might be allowed to add a supplement to that declaration. He could not go back beyond 1832. He could not undertake to say what occurred before that year; but since that year 1832 no speech like that of the right hon. Gentleman had been delivered in that House in order at this stage of a Bill to continue debate on the lines of a Third Reading Debate. He did not think anyone was bound to follow the right hon. Gentleman's example. They (the Government) were in favour of the Bill, and the right hon. Gentleman opposed it; they thought it fulfilled the objects they had in view; and he (Mr. Gladstone) thought he was precluded by prudence, policy, and precedent—he was sorry he had lost any authority he might have possessed over the right hon. Gentleman—but he was precluded by these considerations from following him into a discussion of the merits of the measure, and he thought they should confine themselves to the simple proposition which was before them.

*MR. GOSCHEN (St. George's, Hanover Square) said, the right hon. Gentleman told them that, so far as he could remember, no such speech as that of the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Heneage) had been made on the Preamble of a Bill since 1832.

MR. W. E. GLADSTONE : On the Report stage of a Bill.

MR. GOSCHEN said, the right hon. Gentleman had an extraordinary memory, and his experience ranged over the time to which he alluded ; but he would ask him whether, during those 60 years, he had ever approached the Report of a Bill under the conditions which now prevailed ? The right hon. Gentleman always remembered the precedents on one side, and closed his eyes to the precedents on the other. He should like to know whether the great statesmen who, in the course of those 60 years, were associated with the right hon. Gentleman, would not be surprised to hear that the "guillotine" had been applied to the Bill ? Notwithstanding the length of the Debates on the Bill, the right hon. Gentleman had never seemed to appreciate the enormous importance of the principle that underlaid the details of the Bill. Twice to-day before had he complained of the months that had been employed upon the Bill, and of the 90 days which might ultimately be employed upon it. But could he not bring himself to see, as the country saw, that this Bill was one introducing more vastly important changes than had ever been submitted—that this was not only a Bill for establishing a Legislature in Ireland, but a Bill which, when that Legislature was established, was to reconstitute the various points in which different interests of the two countries might touch, or clash, or harmonise. The country would say that the time given to such a Bill was none too much, as he did not think it was believed when the question was first approached that they would have to contend with all this machinery, all these changes, difficulties, and impossibilities they had dealt with during the time they had been engaged upon it. The right hon. Gentleman was not, therefore, justified in expressing any surprise that opportunity should be taken to deal at this stage with matters which had not previously been discussed. He said that a Third Reading speech had been made. It was not a Third Reading speech, for they did not know what changes would yet be made before that stage was reached. They remembered the changes that the Government introduced in Committee, and a Third Reading speech might have to assume a different form from that which his right hon. Friend had delivered. Nevertheless, putting aside the question of the fairness of this discussion and the question of precedent, and not wishing to make any Third Reading speech, he (Mr. Goschen) would refer to the wording of the Preamble, and ask whether the authority of Parliament was restricted by this Bill ? Hon. Members below the Gangway (the Irish Members) would not vote for the Bill if it did not restrict that authority. The right hon. Gentleman told them that that authority remained—that the Preamble retained it. But the Preamble did nothing of the kind. It contained the words "without impairing or restricting the authority of Parliament"; but the whole Bill restricted that authority, and the Irish Members asserted an understanding that the authority was only to be exercised on certain occasions. Was that not restriction ? The words of the Preamble were an attempt to throw dust in the eyes of the people. He said that the supremacy of Parliament was impaired and the authority of Parliament restricted, and he said it was wrong to put into the Preamble such statements as were contained in it as long as the Bill proceeded on other lines.

*MR. BARTLEY (Islington, N.) said, he thought it reasonable that a few words should be said upon the Bill at this stage of the Debate. Nothing was more strongly urged by the Prime Minister and the Chief Secretary when the Preamble was last before them than that it was to be the great protecting clause for Great Britain. They were always told—and it was repeatedly impressed upon them—that the Preamble of a Bill expressed in clearer terms the meaning of the measure. There were those who thought that a Preamble was merely a remnant of the past, and that it was not bound to affect the measure when it became a Statute. But in this case they were told that there was no necessity for being alarmed upon this subject. In his opinion, posterity would say that the conduct of the Prime Minister in the Committee stage of the Bill was the greatest slur upon his memory, for they had had discussion closed upon four-fifths of a measure which proposed to alter the whole Constitution.

SIR C. DILKE (Gloucester, Forest of Dean) : Question !

*MR. BARTLEY said, if he was wandering from the Question Mr. Speaker would correct him. The great question now before the House was the Preamble of the Bill, which contained the words, "without impairing or restricting the supreme authority of Parliament," and he might say that that authority was impaired in every clause and section of the Bill. Could they possibly vote for the Preamble affirming so distinctly the supreme authority of Parliament whilst in the Bill almost every line impaired that authority? No one could complain of the length of the speech of the right hon. Gentleman opposite (Mr. Heneage). It was very short, and touched upon a few points in which the Bill affected the supremacy of Parliament. There was the question of the retention of the Irish Members. It was the first time in the history of this country that it was proposed to allow men to come here who had no responsibility from their constituents to legislate upon the questions that would be dealt with by that House. That appeared to him to be undermining in the most serious manner the supremacy of Parliament, because it recognised the right of two distinct classes of Members to come to that House, one of whom, as he said, would have no responsibility. Another vital matter was that this was not a final measure. It did not settle this great question. As they had gone on, from week to week and month to month, they had learnt almost daily that there was some point or other that was not final. A most serious matter was that the Parliamentary balance was placed in the hands of the Irish Members. The Prime Minister said there would be a balance of about 50 Nationalist Members in that House from Ireland, and that, as there would be about 600 from Great Britain, it was impossible to think that those 50 would interfere with the working of the House to the detriment of Great Britain. That, however, seemed to him another way in which Parliament would be affected. In the history of Constitutional Government they always found two sides; and, as the Irish Members would be here, questions would be decided, not upon the strength of what Great Britain felt or upon the merits of British questions, but upon the way in which the Irish balance chose to vote. The proposal struck at the root of the supreme authority of this Parliament; and he ventured to say that, having such a proposal, the Bill could not in fairness be said to be a Bill which carried a Government to Ireland without impairing or restricting the supreme authority of this Parliament. Then there was the question of finance. Would anyone say that, if the Bill became law as it now stood, there would be supremacy in regard to finance? He said there certainly would not be. These were matters of enormous importance to their constituents; and if the Bill should pass, the fact would remain that the whole finance of this country would be decided, not only by those who had to pay the taxation, and by their Representatives, but also by the Members from Ireland, who would not be called upon to pay their fair share. That seemed to him enormously to impair the supreme authority of Parliament. They had always considered that when financial matters were being decided by the House all Members were on a par—all Members had regard to the interests of their constituents and the country at large. But the superiority of Parliament was being undermined in this respect, for there would be a large number of Members present who would have to decide on questions of taxation without themselves being personally interested. Under these circumstances, the Preamble must be, to a great extent, a misnomer and out of place. He did not wish to discuss the various details of the Bill now. He only desired to raise a solemn protest at the supreme authority of this Parliament, which was a tradition of the country, and the backbone and mainstay of the Empire, and which had always been the envy of the whole world, being undermined and destroyed by this measure, and being subjected to an attack from which it could never recover if the present Bill passed. Therefore, though it might seem strange on the Report stage to consider the Preamble, they had a perfect right to do it. Indeed, it was their duty to draw these matters to the attention of the House. Some said that these matters should be left entirely to take their chance; but they who had inherited this great Empire—[Laughter]—was there anything to laugh at in that? Were the Radical and Irish Members, who laughed at that, men who were likely to be anxious to maintain the supreme authority of Parliament? [Cries of "Divide!"] They cried "Divide!" The only notion some hon. Members had was to divide whenever there was any matter in dispute. This Bill might well be called a "Bill of Divisions." It was to divide them all and the Empire up.

MR. SPEAKER: The whole Bill is clearly not now before the House. The hon. Member has been within his right in discussing the Preamble; but if the whole Bill is considered it will be a violation of the Standing Order No. 40, which says that when a Bill is brought up on Report the House do proceed at once to consider the clauses of the Bill without general discussion of the Bill as a whole. The Preamble, is to all intents and purposes, a clause, and should be considered as such, and the discussion upon it should be as much confined to it as discussion on a clause.

*MR. BARTLEY said, he had been led away by interruptions. He had been trying to deal with the supreme authority of Parliament, which was the great point in the Preamble. All he further wished to say on that was that the Bill as it stood, and as it had been modified from time to time in Committee, went in the direction of undermining the authority of Parliament. He hoped they would not put at the beginning of the Bill words which conveyed an absolutely false statement, and which practically threw dust in the eyes of the people, and all who read it superficially as to its real object and scope.

*MR. GIBSON BOWLES (Lynn Regis) said, that the Prime Minister, in introducing the Bill, had said that the most important principle which must inform any measure of this kind was the supremacy of Parliament, and that that supremacy had not been put in what he called the mere enactments of the Bill, but had been placed reverentially in the Preamble, very much as one, after wearing a Court suit, placed it in the cupboard and said, "Thank God, that frippery is done with." The Bill had undergone enormous changes since it was originally introduced. To the measure, as originally proposed, five clauses and two Schedules had been added, making 54 clauses and Schedules in all, and, of these, eight alone had been fully discussed.

MR. SPEAKER: The hon. Member is now proceeding as if it were customary on Report to consider the whole Bill as amended. That stage has been deliberately abolished by Parliament, and the hon. Member is only in Order in discussing the Preamble as if it were a clause of the Bill.

*MR. GIBSON BOWLES said, he would proceed to discuss the question whether it was expedient to set up a Parliament in Ireland. ["Oh, oh!"] Yes; that was the effect of the Preamble. He desired to point out that the experiment of setting up an independent Parliament in Ireland had been tried before. It was tried in 1782, when Poyning's Act was repealed. Grattan, in an address on the opening of the new Irish Parliament, said—

"We have seen the Judges rendered independent of the Crown; the Mutiny Law abridged in duration; the jurisdiction of the hereditary Judges of the land restored; the vicious mode of passing laws in this land reformed; the sole and exclusive right of legislation, external as well as internal, in the Irish Parliament firmly asserted on the part of Ireland, and unequivocally acknowledged on the part of Great Britain. We have seen this great national arrangement established on a basis which secures the tranquillity of Ireland and unites the affections as well as the interests of both Kingdoms."

That was the expectation with which the last Irish Parliament was set up. Well, did it "secure the tranquillity of Ireland" and unite the affections of the two Kingdoms? Its fourth year saw a French invasion; its 15th year saw Grattan and his Party secede from it; its 16th year witnessed one of the greatest rebellions these islands had ever seen; and in its 18th year it committed suicide and passed the Act of Union. What was the opinion of an Irish Nationalist on that Parliament? Wolfe Tone, in his Memoirs, said—

"I have now seen the Parliament of England, the Congress of the United States of America, the Corps Legislatif of France, and the Convention Nationale; I have likewise seen our shabby Volunteer Convention in 1783, and the General Committee of the Catholics in 1793; so that I have seen, in the way of deliberative bodies, as many, I believe, as most men; and of all those I have mentioned, beyond all comparison the most shamelessly profligate and abandoned of all sense of virtue, principle, or even common decency, was the Legislature of my own unfortunate country."

That being the opinion of an eminent Irishman of the last Irish Parliament, it behoved them seriously to consider what kind of Parliament it was they were now asked to set up, and whether or not it was "expedient" to establish it. If it were to be like Grattan's Parliament—coming to such an infamous end, and distinguished by such awful disasters—it would not be expedient to set it up, and the Preamble should be unhesitatingly negatived. The Bill was characterised by distrust of the men who were to be the Legislature and Government of Ireland.

MR. SPEAKER : The observations of the hon. Member are out of Order. He is entering upon a discussion of the whole Bill.

*MR. GIBSON BOWLES said, he believed that if this Parliament were set up it would impair and restrict the authority of the Imperial Parliament. This Preamble was introduced by a statesman who, however much they might revere him, they could not disguise from themselves was acting in the capacity of a latter-day Samson. Beguiled by a latter-day Delilah beside him, he now put his hands to the pillars of the Constitution, careless of whom he involved in the catastrophe. The Preamble was an announcement of the right hon. Gentleman's intention, and seemed to him (Mr. Gibson Bowles) to invite its own rejection. Under the circumstances, and having regard to the fact that eight-tenths of the Bill had not been discussed, he thought they should reject the Preamble.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR : The temptation to deal with this question is one which one cannot blame the hon. Member for yielding to ; but, at the same time, I hope that after the suggestion that has been made by you, Sir, the discussion may be brought to a close, and that the House may take a Division upon this question. I will not add a single word to what has been so powerfully stated by other gentlemen in regard to the Preamble. I may, perhaps, say that I give my entire assent to the view that has been suggested from the Chair that the more important work the House has to do on this Report stage is to deal with the clauses for reasons which it would be out of Order to refer to, which we were not allowed to discuss in Committee, and with regard to the clauses that were considered in Committee to deal only with the more important points it may be desirable to raise upon those clauses.

Question put.

MR. DALZIEL (Kirkcaldy, &c.) said, he asked to move to amend Clause 1 by striking out the words which provide for the creation of a Second Chamber in the Irish Legislature. The Amendment raised an issue which was the subject of an animated Debate in Committee, and which called forth expressions of opinion with regard to the principle of Second Chambers from all parts of the House. But the Division on that occasion took place on an issue as to whether or not a Second Chamber was desirable. A great many Members supported the Government on that occasion in the hope—the vain hope, as it had proved to be—that at a later stage in Committee an important modification would be made in the qualification with regard to that Chamber. The Committee had not had an opportunity of considering the £20 rating qualification, and the result was that what they had to consider on the present occasion was not the question that was considered in Committee, but whether or not there should be a Second Chamber representative of a class elected by only a small section of the Irish community. What was the proposal of the Government? They proposed to confer on the people of Ireland the right to legislate with regard to all matters of purely domestic concern ; and the people of Ireland, so far as this House was concerned, were the Parliamentary electors — 740,000 in number. The additional proposal of the Government was that only £20 holders—162,000 in number—should have the power of electing Members of the Legislative Council. Thus the Second Chamber, which would have the power of reversing the decisions of the popularly-elected Chamber, was to be constituted by a limited class.

MR. SNAPE (Lancashire, S.E., Heywood) rose to Order. He asked if the point the hon. Member was dealing with would not be more properly raised on the 6th clause ?

MR. SPEAKER : I did not observe that the hon. Member was out of Order.

MR. DALZIEL said, there were two questions to be considered—first, whether a Second Chamber was desirable or not; and secondly whether, if it was to be established, it should be elected on a £20 qualification or on a broad democratic franchise? He thought it pertinent to consider whether or not the Second Chamber should be representative of a particular class.

MR. W. E. GLADSTONE : In the interests of discussion and order, I would point out that this question was distinctly raised by a subsequent clause, and I would ask whether it is according to the Order of the House that we should import into Clause 1 the contents of another clause?

MR. SPEAKER : As I understand the hon. Member, he only alludes to the 162,000 electors as a very small number to elect the Second Chamber; but the only point before the House is the question of a Second Chamber, and the hon. Gentleman will not be in Order in discussing the qualification of the electors, or the sufficiency of their number.

MR. DALZIEL said, he recognised the distinction, and he certainly should not dwell upon the absurd claim made by the Government, providing that particular classes of persons alone should have the power of electing the Second Chamber. He would pass to the question of the desirability of establishing a Second Chamber. The question was one of great magnitude, and one on which men of all political Parties—and, indeed, the most advanced men—entertained very different opinions. He knew it was contended that it was possible to be a believer in ideal democratic government, and yet to support the establishment of a Second Chamber. He did not, he was bound to say, take that view himself. He thought that if they admitted the principle that the Parliamentary electors of this country were to have supreme power in sending Representatives to Parliament, they were departing from the real principle of democratic government in appointing any additional tribunal to sit in judgment upon the legislation that duly-elected Members might see fit to pass. He, therefore, would ask the Government whether they intended that this Second Chamber should oppose the legislation which would be passed by the popularly-elected Chamber? If the intention was that the Legislative Council should act in opposition to the Legislative Assembly, it would be an intolerable nuisance, while if it was to approve of everything that passed the Lower Chamber, and not oppose at all, the Legislative Council would be entirely unnecessary. He could quite understand that the argument that would be used would be that this Chamber might act as a safeguard for the loyal minority, and he believed that was the real reason why it was originally put forward. But, whatever was in the mind of the Government when this proposal was put in the Bill, they had no longer any reason for believing that it was accepted by the minority in Ireland as a safeguard. One could only judge of the feelings of the minority in Ireland by the statements of their Representatives in the House of Commons. At an earlier stage of the Bill the hon. Member for South Tyrone (Mr. T. W. Russell) said the Government were deceiving the English people when they held this out as a safeguard. Another hon. Member associated with the Irish minority appealed to the House to

The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Dublin University (Mr. D. Plunket) said—

“Of all the delusive, misleading provisions with which the Bill is stuffed this is the most delusive.”

The hon. and gallant Member for North Armagh (Colonel Saunderson) said of the Second Chamber—

“It was an aristocracy of squalor elected and created by a Senate of the gutter.”

He (Mr. Dalziel) did not concur in this opinion, but he contended that the original reason for bringing the proposal forward—namely, that it would be accepted by the minority as a safeguard—no longer held good. He, therefore, appealed to the Government to consider whether it was wise to pursue a policy which he believed, if they had a fair and square vote on the subject, would certainly not be supported by a majority on the Ministerial side of the House. He objected to the Second Chamber, because, in his opinion, it was bound to be a class Assembly, because it would be elected by men who would have additional political power, not because of their superior ability to discharge the duties of citizenship, not because they had any special claim upon the State, but because, forsooth, they lived in large houses or possessed a little land. If the House adopted this proposal, it would be setting itself against the whole tendency of modern democratic law. The whole reform agitation throughout the present century had been directed towards the breaking down of class ascendancy. He urged upon the Government the desirability of giving the House some promise that if the Second Chamber were supported on the present occasion they would attempt, as far as possible, when the time arrived, to insert in the clause a rating qualification which would not carry with it additional political power, but would place all the electors of Ireland on the same footing.

Amendment proposed, in page 1, line 11, after the word "Queen," to leave out the words "and of two Houses, the Legislative Council."—(Mr. Dalziel.)

MR. W. E. GLADSTONE: I would draw the attention of the House to the exact nature of the question that is now before us. We are not discussing the particular conditions on which the Second Chamber should be constituted, but the question whether we shall have a Second Chamber at all. I may say with respect to that question that, even as to the existence of a Second Chamber, and especially as to the particular conditions of its existence—namely, with respect to its being chosen by a limited constituency, and the particular nature of that constituency as we propose it, although we think these important provisions from the nature of their subject-matter, we have never treated them as vital portions of the Bill. On the contrary, our desire has always been that those questions should be fully considered with serious impartiality by the House at large. Now, I am not going to make a polemical charge against gentlemen opposite; but it is manifest that the course taken by them, which was rather an extreme course on the question, very much tended to prevent fair and impartial discussion. Those of my hon. Friends who object to a Second Chamber find themselves in strange company on this question, and may find themselves in a similar predicament again. It was a strong assertion, to say the least, for gentlemen opposite to make, that the Second Chamber was worse than no Second Chamber at all. I understand that to have been the ground taken. It was hardly to have been expected from the powerful Party that are in opposition, and I think it placed all of us on this side of the House in a position in which we had only a choice of difficulties. Certainly we could not attain the end we desired to attain, namely—fair, open, unprejudiced discussion of the question whether there should be a Second Chamber or not. We came to the question in the Cabinet with open minds. We were sensible there was a great deal to be said on both sides, and we took the view we conceived to be, under all the circumstances, our duty to take; but we did not attempt to incorporate that view into the vital conditions of the Bill, even under all the difficulties with which the question has since been surrounded. We have not now before us the question whether the Second Chamber should be elected by the same constituency as that which elects the other Chamber, but which differs from it in other conditions, which is, I think, a system not wholly without example. The simple question at this moment is—"Is it, on the whole, convenient that a Second Chamber should exist?" We have not seen any reason to depart from the resolution at which we have arrived. That resolution has been confirmed by a majority, although a small majority of the House, and it would require strong reasons to warrant our altering the position we have taken on this important provision of the Bill. I hope I shall not be regarded as discourteous to the minority if I say that I think many of them were induced to vote a Second Chamber much more as a part of what they thought it their duty to do—to offer a root-and-branch opposition to the scheme in all its provisions—rather than because they did not consider two Chambers preferable to one. We have to consider our duty to the public at large and to the public of Ireland on this subject. The Representatives of

Ireland in general I do not say desire this scheme, but have consented to make it part of the arrangement to which they look for the establishment of the future Government of their country. It is very difficult, Sir, not to be governed in some degree upon this question of having a Second Chamber by the nearly absolute universality of the practice of the civilised world. That certainly cannot be shut out from the impartial consideration of the question, and I think there is something to be said for the proposition that there is a prospective and probable advantage in having exactly the same subject, if you can secure it, handled by Bodies that will in a certain respect have distinctions and differences of view. Let us recollect how hard it is for any man with the most comprehensive and impartial mind to be sure that he has weighed and probed an important legislative proposal in all the lights and from all the points of view from which it ought to be considered so as to make it beneficial in the highest possible degree to the public interest. I do not say under what conditions the distinctions between the two Bodies are to be established, but I say that the presentation of difficult matters to two Chambers where they will not be approached from precisely the same point of view is probably more advantageous than their presentation to a single Chamber. If there is anything in these suppositions I do not deny that they have a somewhat special relation to Ireland. I am not disposed to follow the example set us on the opposite side, whereby the masses of the people in Ireland, instead of being treated as a nation, are treated as part of one, and I think it is too hastily assumed that they will certainly act as one Party. I will give no scope for varieties of opinion and sentiment and class. But then I do admit that the extraordinary, not altogether fortunate, and I hope to be hereafter considered and modified uniformity of view in Ireland must have some tendency to throw the choice of representatives into a groove narrower than would be desirable in the abstract; and if it be possible, without doing violence to the principles of liberty, to secure an examination of these questions with a greater variety of view than a single Chamber could possess, it might be somewhat advantageous. We have proposed a Second Chamber under the belief that for the purpose of conducting Ireland out of the difficult and painful circumstances in which she has been involved for so many generations and so many centuries and of which difficulties large remainders have still unfortunately to be dealt with, wherever it was possible for us to find a provision unexceptional in itself and favourable in its character to the cause of reasonable and just protection against hasty acts—against rash and passionate acts which are committed in every Legislative Assembly, and from which we therefore cannot hope that the Irish Legislature will be specially and absolutely exempt—it was worth while availing ourselves of it. The hon. Member for Armagh (Colonel Saunderson) and others on that side of the House disclaim altogether the wish for a Second Chamber in connection with this Bill, and even go the length of saying that the provision we have inserted in the Bill, though we have never finally pledged ourselves to particulars, is worse than no Second Chamber at all. Therefore, my hon. Friend (Mr. Dalziel) is justified to a great extent in saying that the Opposition repudiate the whole of our proposals as far as it depends on the supposition that it is a proposal honestly intended to embrace the question of the interests of the Irish minority. I am entitled to say that we might fairly have expected the Members of the Opposition to say—"However shadowy your guarantee may be, we will vote for its principle, and try to make it as good as we can." But that course has not been adopted. I recognise the fact that we are not able to appeal to one single hon. Gentleman opposite in favour of the Second Chamber which we propose. Hon. Gentlemen opposite seem, one and all, disposed at the present time to make themselves responsible for the total out-and-out rejection of the Second Chamber.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: Not of any Second Chamber.

MR. W. E. GLADSTONE: But of the Second Chamber proposed in the clause—we deal subsequently with the details of the Second Chamber. I do not put that forward as an accusation, though I do consider it a heavy responsibility for the Opposition to assume. Our Parliamentary position has, therefore, not been strengthened in dealing with some of our friends as it would have been if gentleman opposite had been disposed to regard this provision as some security against rash and hasty legislation, which is to be more or less apprehended in all Legislative Assemblies. I should have thought that the Opposition would have been disposed to say that, though they consider the Second Chamber proposed by the Government, especially as it is an elective Chamber, a very questionable proposal, yet they deem that it in some degree, however small, mitigates what they consider to be the defects of the Bill. We, however, have not only to consider gentlemen opposite, but those whom they represent; and we should not be justified in the face of the loyal minority, whose rights within limits we have never denied or questioned, in saying—"You choose to send Members to Parliament who disapprove of the Second Chamber. We take them at their word, and we consider you and your interests as entirely bound up in their Parliamentary existence, and consequently we throw over the Second Chamber, too." There is no escaping from the disadvantages which the Opposition have imposed upon us by their line of action on this question, and I am not sure that we should be justified in abandoning the proposal for the Second Chamber if we believed it would establish some diversity of view upon public questions without disparagement to just national interests. While, therefore, pitching my argument in favour of a Second Chamber in a modest and moderate strain, and asserting no strong or rigid doctrine about it, I have endeavoured to set out the reasons which have led us to adhere to the decision of the House. Therefore, without the smallest imputation upon anyone, or the smallest disposition to lay down any doctrine, and looking merely to those considerations which approximate to the case, we do not feel ourselves justified in receding from the decision of the House, and, regretting to differ from my hon. Friend, we are, therefore, compelled to oppose his Amendment.

*MR. SAUNDERS (Newington, Walworth) said, he was glad the Prime Minister deprecated discussing now the constitution of the Second Chamber. That question had not been discussed by the House, and he sincerely trusted it never would be discussed by the House.

He hoped it never would be necessary to form a Second Chamber for Ireland. He hoped they would not impose upon Ireland the difficulty which had been such a burden to themselves, and to every country where a Second Chamber existed. It was scarcely possible that the Second Chamber as it now stood in the Bill could be created, because it would involve the disfranchisement of three-fourths of the Irish people. With two Chambers, the slowest Chamber governed to stand the pace, and consequently the conditions of the franchise as regarded the Second Chamber would regulate the degree of popular power in Ireland. No such retrogressive measure as that proposed in the Bill had ever before been proposed to the House, for it disfranchised three-fourths of the population of Ireland. He was quite willing to discuss the question in the form in which it had been put by the Prime Minister. The right hon. Gentleman asked the question—"Is it, upon the whole, convenient that a Second Chamber should exist?" That depended entirely upon the point on which they viewed the Second Chamber. If they belonged to the privileged classes and benefited by abuses, it was extremely convenient that a Second Chamber should exist. But if they did not happen to belong to the privileged classes and suffered from abuses, then it was extremely inconvenient that a Second Chamber should exist. Therefore, the point of view would regulate the answer that would be given to that question. That the Second Chamber was an obstruction to legislation was admitted on all hands. The Prime Minister himself had given the most conclusive evidence on that point. Speaking of the Government of the Colonies, the right hon. Gentleman said—

"The Second Chamber operated as a very serious check upon the immediate action of the Representative Chamber."

There stand a very great difference between deferring legislation, or, perhaps, altogether preventing legislation, and preventing haste in legislation. They all deprecated undue haste in legislation; but a Second Chamber, instead of preventing hasty legislation, actually created it. In how many instances had their Second Chamber been the cause of haste? They spent weeks in the discussion of matters which were hastily dealt with in the Upper Chamber. The Second Chamber must of necessity lessen the time they had to do their legislation in. Nature did not pay any respect to Second Chambers. She only allowed 365 days in the year, whether there was a Second Chamber or not. They had to get through a certain amount of legislation in the year; and if they had a Second Chamber to do the same thing, they must get through their business in less time than would otherwise be available. The Second Chamber, therefore, was obviously the cause of hasty legislation. The hon. Member for Aberdeen, speaking on this proposed Legislative Council, said it would take away half the power which had been conferred on the people by the other portions of the Bill. That was an extremely moderate view. What the Second Chamber took away was three-fourths of the power of the people of Ireland. There was no country in the world that could afford to have its political privileges curtailed so badly as Ireland. No country in the world had suffered so much from unjust legislation as Ireland had suffered. It was quite true that the large farmers of Ireland had been relieved to a very considerable extent by the magnificent legislation introduced by the present Prime Minister. But the same thing could not be said of the small farmers of Ireland. They were still paying enormous rents, or, at least, rents altogether beyond their value, for almost worthless farms—farms which, in many cases, were nothing but bog and boulders, and which merely afforded a place for the houses the tenants themselves put up. They talked about judicial rents in the cases of these men. Why, if ever a man might be said to be between his Satanic Majesty and the deep sea it was these small farmers, who were between the lawyer and the landlord. Some hon. Members opposite smiled at the statement of the sufferings of the small farmers in Ireland. The very last man he had visited as a tenant in Ireland was in this condition: He was paying £5 a year—

MR. SPEAKER: The hon. Gentleman will be good enough to remember that the constitution of the Second Chamber is what is before the House.

*MR. SAUNDERS said, he would not refer further to the condition of the small tenant farmers in Ireland. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Bodmin (Mr. Courtney) had spoken of the irritating bar that the Second Chamber had imposed to rapid legislation according to the wishes of the majority of the voters. Then why should they create a Second Chamber for the express purpose of producing such results as these? for these results were inevitably the effect of a Second Chamber. The hon. Member for Sheffield put it that those who were in favour of a Second Chamber avowed that their object was that the minority should rule, while those who were against a Second Chamber desired that the majority should rule. That really was the position of affairs. If they wanted the majority to rule, they must give them simple and effective means for doing it. What would have happened in London had London been supplied with two Chambers instead of one; and supposing that one of those Councils had been elected, in the manner proposed in this Bill, by one-fourth of the existing constituencies in London? The whole condition of things as they now existed would have been reversed. The electors of London would have been prevented from expressing the wishes of the people of London; and the two Councils, even if desirous of doing something, would have so hampered each other that little or nothing would have been done. One would think that Governments were created for the express purpose of doing mischief. The Bill as it stood was one of the most remarkable pieces of legislation ever presented to the House. They had a First Chamber limited by a Second Chamber, and then the Second Chamber limited so that it should not over-much limit the First Chamber. Talk about five wheels to a coach! It was nothing to the complication introduced into this measure. He disliked the idea of fear in connection with legislation. And yet this proposal was based upon apprehension—was based upon unjust and mistaken apprehension; safeguards introduced under the influence of fear invariably increased danger, as they would increase the danger in this instance. During the present century they had had many proposals for increasing the facilities for legislation—for giving additional power to the people, and the result of advancing in that direction had been so beneficial that it would be repeated again and again. But the proposal that was now made was a proposal in the opposite direction. Why should they create a Second Chamber to bother the First Chamber—a Second Chamber which would be infinitely more powerful for mischief than the Second Chamber which gave them so much trouble in connection with legislation in this country? He did not think there ever was a contrivance more complete and effective for paralysing the will of a people than the contrivance proposed as a Second Chamber for Ireland. What would that Chamber be? It would be a combination of landlords, capitalists, and large farmers. What hope had the working classes of Ireland from that Chamber?—how would the grievances of the labourer be removed? As the matter stood in the Bill, not a single labourer or artizan or small farmer would have a vote for the Second Chamber. The slowest Chamber practically controlled the other Chamber, but what would happen with the operations for checking the Second Chamber in checking the First Chamber it was impossible to say. He did not think there was any value in the checks proposed except to show the extreme unadvisability of having a Second Chamber at all. Let them give the greatest possible liberty to the Irish people, and he had no fear of the result. If dangers and difficulties arose under Home Rule, they would arise because the people were not allowed to give effect to their own wishes. No people under the sun desired disorder if they could obtain justice without it; and there would not be the slightest danger of disorder in Ireland if they gave the people the control of their own affairs. But to introduce a Second Chamber, and such a restricted Second Chamber, was very much like as if a farmer introduced a fox into the hen-roost. To place such a restriction on the expression of the popular will was destructive of Home Rule. He was extremely sorry for those who were in fear of the people, for they must be in a very unhappy and a very miserable condition. He had entire confidence in the people, and his desire was that the people should have full and free opportunity of expressing their will, and giving effect to it both in legislation and in administration. He therefore sincerely hoped that the House would divide upon this question and would support the Amendment now before it.

*MR. BUCKNILL (Surrey, Epsom) said, he thought that the anecdote of the fox in the hen-roost might be applied, not inappropriately, to the hon. Gentleman who had just spoken. It was a great pity that the speech of the hon. Gentleman had not been delivered on the Second Reading of the Bill, because he would then have felt bound to walk into the Lobby into which he did not walk on that occasion. He (Mr. Bucknill) could now understand why the Prime Minister had thought fit to rise to reply before the Seconder of the Amendment had been heard, for the difficulties of the right hon. Gentleman would have been considerably increased by the speech just uttered. The question before the House was an extremely simple one. It was whether or not there was to be a Second Chamber in Ireland? The question of the composition of the Second Chamber was not before them. But that would be discussed, if at all, at another time. They were now discussing the principle of a Second Chamber, and he ventured to say that that principle should be upheld, not only for the reasons given by the Prime Minister, but because, as a matter of fact, nearly the whole civilised world had acted upon it. When this matter was discussed on a prior occasion, the Prime Minister stated that a Second Chamber was especially necessary in the peculiar circumstances of Ireland. He (Mr. Bucknill) was prepared to argue this matter from the Irish point of view. The hon. Member for Waterford had on a previous occasion stated that in his opinion a Second Chamber would be an effective check on rash and ill-considered legislation. The Prime Minister had said that the Cabinet went into the question with open minds. The Home Secretary, however, on the 14th of April last, told the House that in his opinion, as a modern Democrat, Second Chambers were not successful or safe; and that he with reluctance consented to the introduction of a Second Chamber into this Bill as a concession to those who said it was not safe to leave the Ulster people to the uncontrolled dominion of one Chamber. The Prime Minister had said that the principle of a Second Chamber was, in his opinion, one which could not be rejected; and he (Mr. Bucknill) trusted that if there were a Division it would show there were in the House very few superlative modern Democrats who would vote in that Lobby into which it was known the Prime Minister would not go.

MR. R. WALLACE (Edinburgh, E.) said, he had Amendments in this connection on the Paper which, from the uncompromising attitude adopted by the Government in reference to the Amendment of his hon. Friend the Member for Kirkcaldy (Mr. Dalziel), he clearly saw would have no opportunity of being considered. He was not at liberty, therefore, to argue this Amendment out; but perhaps he might be allowed simply to state his own attitude upon the question. If the Amendments he had on the Paper had had a chance, which they would not have, of being considered, his proposal would have run as follows:—

"That on and after the appointed day there shall be in Ireland a Legislature consisting of Her Majesty the Queen and the Legislative Assembly, with such Legislative Council, if any, as may be created by Irish Act."

He would have started in Ireland with a Legislature, consisting simply of the Sovereign and a Legislative Assembly, but he would have endowed that initial Legislature with a limited prolific faculty of producing a supplement to itself in the form of such Legislative Council as it might create by legislation. In that way he would have desired to throw upon Ireland itself the responsibility and the duty, if it were a duty, of providing a Second Chamber for itself, and a Second Chamber of any kind that it chose to select for itself. Such an Amendment would not have required his arguing the abstract question of a Second Chamber at all. He would have desired to get rid of the abstract discussion; it would have been enough for him to say that on that article of their political faith he did not belong to the school of the Prime Minister, who, so far as he could learn, desired a Second Chamber, partly because experience appeared to have taught him that legislation proceeded too rapidly without one, and partly because the right hon. Gentleman was attached to the hereditary principle for reasons which he had never been able to follow. He himself belonged rather to the school of the Chief Secretary for Ireland and the Home Secretary, who were avowed enemies rather than menders of the House of Lords and similar Institutions. Such being his position, he, for one, had the greatest aversion to having anything to do with the construction of a Second Chamber, and especially in connection with new Institutions which were to be given to a newly-started country. But by his Amendment, if it had had a chance of being considered, he would have been able to get out of this difficulty. He admitted that Ireland had a perfect right to be governed as it chose; and as there was no accounting for tastes, if she desired to have a Second Chamber in addition to the primary Legislature, he, for one, was not in a position to deny that she had a right to her choice. But he thought he was in a position to deny that she had a right to compel him to take any personal concern or responsibility in creating such a Chamber. He said that if Ireland wanted this Institution, and especially in the peculiarly distasteful form offered in this Bill, by all means let her please herself; all he begged was that he should not be asked to put his hand to the unclean thing. He would not, and could not do it. His Amendment, if he could have moved it, would have enabled them to get rid entirely of the 6th clause, which was a distasteful provision, reserving as it did the iniquitous principle of property qualification, and conferring on a small body of landlords the power of vetoing the evident will of the people. He would have gone a considerable way further than his hon. Friends the Members for Kirkcaldy (Mr. Dalziel) and Walworth (Mr. Saunders), but only in the direction of making concessions to the will of the Irish people. As it was, he would have pleasure in going into the Lobby with them.

MR. RENTOUL (Down, E.) said, the peculiarity of the clause was that it was brought forward by a Party the majority of whom did not believe in the principle of a Second Chamber at all. On every occasion on which this question had been before the House not one word had been said in favour of this Second Chamber as a power of revision of legislation. The very purpose for which the House of Lords existed was entirely left out of sight. The whole tenour of the speeches made on the other side of the House was that this Second Chamber was a protection to the loyal minority in Ireland, while the constant argument of the Unionists was that it was a sham and delusion as a safeguard, and would be of no value to them. It was a strange thing that this principle was not embodied in the Bill of 1886. The Second Chamber provided in that Bill was something real; but the Second Chamber now under discussion could not, from any point of view, act as a safeguard. The Unionists wanted to see this Second Chamber negatived by the House simply because it had been presented to them as a safeguard, when it could not by any possibility act as such. The hon. Gentleman who moved the Amendment did so because he opposed a Second Chamber altogether; but the Unionists opposed it because it was a sham and a caricature, and would be of no value to them. It would tend to make them ridiculous, and to damage them, and they hoped the Government would see their way to doing without the sham altogether. If they were to have any Second Chamber at all they should go back to the principle of 1886, which was a higher and better one from every possible point of view.

Mr. J. Morley rose in his place, and claimed to move, "That the Question be now put"; but Mr. Speaker withheld his assent, and declined then to put that Question.

Debate resumed.

MR. H. HOBHOUSE (Somerset, E.) said, that when this question was before the House on a previous occasion he gave a silent vote in favour of the Government; he intended to vote in their favour now, and he thought those who separated themselves from their Party on this question were entitled to give their reasons for doing so. On the previous occasion he voted in favour of these two Chambers, because he had always felt it to be desirable there should be a second House, and because he entertained a substantial hope that when they came to discuss the composition of the Second House they should find that the Government had an open mind on the matter, and that they should be able to make this Chamber what they were told it was really intended to be—namely, a real safeguard for the minority in Ireland. His political friends had mostly voted against the Second Chamber because they entertained the hope that they would be able to reduce the proposed Parliament to a Body of an inferior kind—some local Governing Body with more restricted powers than those which were given to the Irish Legislature by the original Bill. Now they came to discuss the question again, they were in rather a different position, because they had endeavoured, on the whole without success, to introduce Amendments to restrict and reduce the legislative powers of the Irish Body; therefore those powers would be substantially what they were in the Bill as it stood; and those powers, he ventured to think, were powers which entitled it to be regarded as a Legislative Body, and not merely as a local Governing Body. But with regard to the constitution of the Second Chamber, they stood in a different position. They had had no opportunity yet of discussing the constitution of that Body and the nature of its duties; and, therefore, they might still continue in the hope which animated them on the last occasion, that when they proceeded to discuss its composition they should be able to improve that Body considerably, even from the point of view of the hon. Gentleman who last spoke. There was no doubt the House was placed in a somewhat awkward position in this matter, because he was afraid they should not have an opportunity, after they had discussed the actual composition of the Second Chamber, of then recording their final judgment as to whether they should have a Second Chamber. That was the unfortunate result of the action of the Government on the Committee stage of the Bill, and for which the Government alone were responsible. The Prime Minister had spoken of the nearly absolute universality of the practice of the civilised world in having a Second Chamber in all their Legislatures. In the United States, both in Congress and in the great majority of States, they had recognised the need of a Second Chamber. In our Colonies again, as a rule, they had a Second Chamber, though there were one or two exceptions. In the Dominion of Canada, he believed the Province of Ontario, and he thought one other Province, had only one Chamber. But there not only was the population smaller than in Ireland, but the matters committed to these Provincial Legislatures were considerably more restricted in character. Instead of having general powers in the Province of Ontario to preserve peace, order, and good government, they had only certain specifically enumerated matters entrusted to their care. If these specific matters on which they could legislate in Ontario were compared with the exceptions in this Bill, it would be found that in many important respects they were investing the Irish Legislature with far greater powers than the Legislature of Ontario had at the present time. The Irish Legislature, no doubt, would be restricted in certain respects, but within its own limits he was afraid it could not be said in any practical way to be a subordinate Legislature. He thought, therefore, they might well claim, in the circumstances of the case, that there should be two Houses. The desirability of a Second Chamber had been fully recognised by the Prime Minister. All who had sat in this House for some years would recognise that, however ably they might deliberate on public affairs, yet they sometimes owed something in their legislation to the other House. Even those who had most reason to complain of the composition of the other branch of the Legislature would surely recognise that on non-Party matters they owed a good deal of the soundness of their legislation to the other House; and he did not think anyone could deny there were advantages in having important matters of legislation carefully deliberated upon by two Bodies. The special application of this principle to Ireland must be recognised by everybody who had pursued the Debates on this Bill, and seen the strong divergences of opinion arising between the different Members and Parties in that country. On these general principles he wished to support the proposal of the Government. He was glad that, on this occasion at any rate, they had stuck to their guns, and he wished they had taken this line on yet more important matters.

SIR E. CLARKE (Plymouth): I should have been very sorry to have been obliged to go into the Division Lobby on the question now before the House without explaining the reasons for which I intend to support the proposal of the hon. Member for Kirkcaldy, and I trust that the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary for Ireland may presently give us a more reasonable contribution to the proceedings of the evening than the suggestion which was made lately by him. The question is one of undoubted seriousness and gravity. It is one upon which different views are taken by gentlemen sitting on different sides of the House, and I am not speaking at this moment either as representing the Front Bench here or as representing hon. Members on this side of the House. The question that has been now submitted to the House is a difficult one to solve, if it be discussed subject to the narrow limitations which were suggested by the Prime Minister. We are not at liberty to discuss—and that is quite reasonable and right—the provisions of the 5th clause of the Bill, or to express our opinion as to the arrangements which are there provided for the election of the Second Chamber in Ireland; but I take it that we are entitled to discuss this matter upon the hypothesis that the plan which is now in the Bill is the plan which is to be submitted to the House. This Bill has gone through Committee. It emerges from Committee, as amended in that Committee, with, upon the back of it, the names of the Prime Minister, the Chief Secretary, and of two of their more important Colleagues. In that Bill Clause 6 defines the constitution of this Upper Chamber, and there is no Amendment to that clause put down upon the Paper now by any Member of the Government, nor any Amendment which we have reason to believe the Government will support, so that I think the Prime Minister is not entitled to say he claims from the House that they should discuss simply the abstract question of a Second Chamber. He is bound by his own Bill—which he has, in methods I do not stop to criticise, forced through Committee—and which stands now in the shape by which we are entitled to assume the Government will be bound throughout the further discussions on this Bill. The Prime Minister made in this regard a very significant distinction. He said the Government did not look upon the details of the Bill as vital, and by that phrase he conveyed to us that the Government do look upon the establishment of a Second Chamber as a vital point of the Bill. And he asked the House to come to a decision on this matter, simply upon its general ideas as to whether Second Chambers were or were not reasonable and useful political Institutions. Now, of course, if we were discussing the question of the establishment of a Legislative Body which represented a self-contained country and of the whole of the interests of the people of that country, I should not have the slightest hesitation in saying that I should think a Second Chamber would be a most useful, admirable, and, indeed, necessary part of the political machine; and if we were dealing here with any such problem as that, of course I could not give a vote against the theory and idea of a Second Chamber. But that is by no means the case with which we are dealing. We are not dealing with the establishment of a Legislature which is intended to represent in all their fulness and in all their force the interests of the people of a particular country. We are providing here for what is to be—although it is not in terms confessed—a subordinate Assembly, and when you are dealing with a subordinate Assembly, it appears to me that very different considerations come into play. I do not want to pass from any general declaration about Second Chambers without saying a word upon a matter which has been mentioned by the hon. Member for Edinburgh, as if no one would challenge or controvert his idea that the hereditary principle is a foolish and ridiculous principle. This is not the time for discussing it, but in my judgment the hereditary principle is the only safe and useful principle upon which a Second Chamber can be founded; and it is my belief that if wisdom came to the construction of a Constitution for a great country like ours at the present time, it would find its best groundwork and foundation for a Second Chamber in that feeling of hereditary influence—hereditary authority, and I will go on to add hereditary capacity for public service which is recognised by everybody in all classes of the community, and which, I believe, is the best groundwork and foundation for a Second Assembly. So I am prepared on the proper occasion and at the proper time to defend the hereditary principle, subject, of course, to qualifications and additions which I have never denied the importance of. I say this by way of parenthesis, as I do not wish to be misunderstood. In the first place, in regard to this Second Chamber for Ireland, I propose to vote against the establishment of this Second Chamber for several very distinct and definite reasons. One reason for which I object to the establishment of this Second Chamber as proposed in the Bill is that, taking the Bill as it stands, with its definition and description of that Second Chamber, I believe that Second Chamber would be worse than useless. When the Prime Minister said that the idea on this side of the House which had prompted our opposition to the Second Chamber on the previous occasion was simply that the Second Chamber constructed in this Bill was a sham and was worse than useless, I do not think he measured entirely the full meaning of the opposition which we gave to the proposal. My view is this: not only is the Second Chamber, as now described in the 6th clause of the Bill, a sham, and a mischievous sham, but my belief is that if we can get rid of this Second Chamber we should do a great deal to destroy the Legislative Assembly altogether. All our people in this country understand a Parliament to consist of two Chambers, and it will be a very long time before you can make the people of any part of this country understand a Parliament which has not two Houses—an Upper House and a Lower House. If you set up in Ireland your two Chambers with the appearance of a Parliament—an Upper and a Lower House—you give it the appearance, and not only the appearance, but you give it something of the authority and prestige of a Parliamentary Body. On the other hand, our people quite understand a single Body—like a County Council—which is dealing with the affairs of a locality, and they are used to have local affairs dealt with by a single Local Body; and I believe if we can strike out of this Bill the provision relating to the establishment of a Second Chamber, we should do more than we could by any other single change in the structure of the Bill to destroy the idea of an Irish Parliament and to reduce it to the condition and authority of a Local or County or Provincial Council. But I have a further comment to make, and it is this : I believe that the establishment of a Second Chamber, unsatisfactory and inefficient as it would be, would also be mischievous in this way : it would prevent the prompt intervention of this House in controlling the action of the Legislative Body in Ireland. I should like just to illustrate that. Suppose the Home Rule Bill had passed. Suppose this experiment had been set on foot and the whole machinery established. Some Bill might then pass through the Lower House in Ireland, and that Bill might be so immediately directed to injure a particular class of people in Ireland that the whole feeling of this House would be in revolt against the proposal. It is perfectly well known to everyone that legislation does mischief whilst it is passing. You do not have to wait until an Act is put upon the Statute Book ; and whilst it was passing through the Lower House a particular scheme of legislation might have a very mischievous effect upon the rights and interests of a large class of people in Ireland. Now, suppose such a measure were proposed in the Assembly in Ireland, and were carried by a majority of that Assembly, and then suppose that a legitimate and strong appeal were made by the Representatives of Ireland in this House speaking in the name of the class which that legislation might injure—an appeal to this House to interfere and correct what was being done. What would the answer be ? “Wait until you see whether the Second House throws it out.” And then you must wait—I think it is two years—for the two Houses to sit together on the Bill we passed again through the Lower House. Really, these things were passed in silence, so that one cannot be supposed to be familiar with the details of them, and I confess that for the moment I have lost recollection as to the details of many parts of the Bill. I hope right hon. Gentlemen opposite are more fortunate, and have better memories. But in that case there would be objection, and you must wait until the whole Parliamentary machine has been put in force in Ireland before this House could interfere. I believe that would be a mischievous thing, and I believe it would be much more useful for the purpose of local government in Ireland and immeasurably more useful for the purpose of preserving the authority of that House that there should be but one Body in Ireland, and that that one Body should be subject to the immediate control and supervision of the Parliament in this country. There is another reason which I venture to put before the House with regard to this matter. Supposing this Home Rule Bill to pass and this machinery to be set on foot, of course it is a matter of interest and anxiety for all as to how these two Houses in Ireland would be constituted. Now, it is pretty clear that those who have been the active Parliamentarians in this House, so far as they take part in Irish politics at all or choose to enter into either House, would probably desire to take their places in the larger Assembly in Ireland, although the Lower House would undoubtedly have the distribution and determination of all official matters and the entire rule with regard to Irish finance. I think that if that were so, and if hon. Members who usually sit below the Gangway on this side found their places in the lower House, representing one element of Irish national life, you would find those who represent other parts of Irish national life—men stronger, perhaps, in local influence than many of those who come and sit in this House on those (the Irish) Benches—might be probably tempted to try and find their place in the Upper House of Parliament in Ireland, where they would have, perhaps, an easier task, but where the influence of their weight and strength would be to a great extent wasted, because they would not come into immediate contact and relation with those who have been leading the Irish cause in this House; and I confess it does seem to me, if you are to set up any Assembly in Ireland at all, which is to deal with matters so large as are given by this Bill, you had better, for the sake of Ireland itself, secure that those who are desirous to take part in her Parliamentary or local affairs shall meet in the same House. On these different grounds, I am in favour of doing away with this prospect for a Second Chamber in Ireland. I believe the effect of striking that out of the Bill would be to make the machinery simpler, more distinctly a Local Government, and not a Parliament, and would be to secure the representation in one House in Ireland of the different influences and different forces of their national and popular life, and I believe it would have, above all, this immense advantage—that it would enable this House immediately, without hesitation and without delay, to interfere with, control, and correct what we fear may be the exuberance or vagaries of the Irish Parliament.

Mr. PARKER SMITH (Lanark, Partick) said, the first advantage derived from this Bill was that it had won Hereford to the Unionist cause. He hoped they would have many chances like it. On this question of a Second Chamber the House stood in a position different from that in which it stood when the Bill was in Committee. At that time he voted against a Second Chamber, because his object was so to reduce the functions of the Irish Legislature that a Second Chamber would be as unnecessary as it was for the London County Council. But they had gone further since then; they now knew what the powers of the Irish Legislature were to be—they knew that they would be extensive, more extensive than they had supposed they would be—and, under those circumstances, it was open to those who had opposed a Second Chamber before to reconsider their position and determine whether there should not be one. It seemed to him if they were to have a Legislature of the size of that proposed by the Bill as it now stood, they should have a Second Chamber—it should be an essential part of it. Universal experience showed that wherever, abroad or in the Colonies, they had a Legislature of this kind, it had been found expedient to have two Chambers, and they must have that if they wished the new system they were setting up to work satisfactorily and successfully, and to correspond with the real strength of the nation which it governed. If they had a system that did not correspond to the strength of the nation they had always the danger before them of outbreaks of revolutionary violence. There were classes of men who wished to establish all sorts of institutions and all kinds of social conditions. He had a great admiration for the principle of representative government; but it never worked successfully unless it embraced people who were the mainstay of the nation. What had been the history of the British Government? It had changed its form from time to time; but it was because it embodied all the strongest forces in the nation that revolutionary reformers had not been tempted to assail it; and at present, being a democratic Government, it was only exposed to attack from the childish impatience of a certain number of Radicals, who were angry that there should be any delay in giving effect to their views. He differed entirely from those who said they should not have this Second Chamber at all. There would, of course, be some class in a majority in every part of Ireland. It was one of the difficulties in establishing a representative Government that there was the same class in a majority in almost every part of the country. No doubt, it ought to have predominance in legislative power; but, at the same time, there were other classes who ought to be represented, and who could exercise their due influence only through a Second Chamber. Nothing could be more dangerous than to exclude those classes from representation—from putting forward their views, arguing their case fairly. He believed that the scheme which he had sketched was essential in all schemes of Government that were to be satisfactory. He considered the circumstances had so entirely changed since that question was before them in Committee that he felt himself at liberty to support the Government.

Mr. MACARTNEY (Antrim, S.) said, this was one of the organic details in which the present proposals of the Government differed from those of 1886, and it was one of the proposals of the Government for the protection of the loyal minority in fulfilment of the pledges made during the course of this agitation. But there was another feature that rendered it worthy of consideration. The hon. Member who moved the Amendment told them that a great many of those who supported the Government generally would on this occasion vote for them against their own convictions.

Mr. DALZIEL said, what he did say was that a majority on that side of the House would be against a Second Chamber.

MR. MACARTNEY said, he did not think that differed from what he had given as his account of the hon. Member's statement. The hon. Member and his friends were prepared to vote against their convictions. He would like to remind the House of the charge that had been made by the Prime Minister against the Opposition. He told them, in a former Debate, that their arguments were formulated with an ingenuity which made out some case against a Second Chamber. He stated that the Cabinet had come to the question with an open mind. This proposal of a Second Chamber, having been agreed to by the Cabinet, was submitted to them with the object of conciliating the loyal minority; and the hon. Member for Longford (Mr. Blake) spoke of it as a marked and distinct protection for them. He did not know how far the right hon. Gentleman might be justified in saying it was his intention to conciliate them; but almost immediately afterwards the Chancellor of the Duchy (Mr. Bryce) said that was not the object with which the provision had been brought forward.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE DUCHY OF LANCASTER (MR. BRYCE, Aberdeen, S.) was understood to express dissent.

MR. MACARTNEY said, he thought what he had said was to be found in The Times report of the right hon. Gentleman's speech. There was another report in The Parliamentary Debates, which certainly carried out the sense of the words he had used, though the words differed. He would refer the right hon. Gentleman to The Debates. But what was their position upon this clause? The Prime Minister, on May 10th, acknowledged that they had a right to endeavour to alter the provisions of the clause, if they objected to it, when it had been reached. The Chancellor of the Duchy also agreed that that was a proper course. They were told that the Government were willing to meet all reasonable apprehensions which might be felt with regard to the question. That was the position at that time. Well, Amendments were put on the Paper on various points from the point of view of the minority. Such Amendments had been invited, and they were anxious to discuss them, but they were precluded by the Closure on the 6th July, so that, having invited them to put down Amendments, the Prime Minister deliberately precluded them from discussing them. That being so, they were perfectly justified, now that an opportunity offered itself, of following the Prime Minister's advice. In considering the subject he had to consider what they were considering to-night—whether what the Government offered was anything but what the Loyalists in Ireland said it was, a vain and shadowy pretence and not a reality. They must have some meaning in the provisions building up a Constitution. He presumed the Prime Minister meant by a Second Chamber an Assembly which would either arrest, delay, or, if necessary, avert, the proposals of the First Chamber. The Chancellor of the Duchy had given them the history of the development—

MR. J. MORLEY: I rise to Order. I beg to ask, Mr. Speaker, whether the hon. Gentleman is in Order in continuing the Debate which took place upon this question, and in now replying, step by step, to the speech made on that occasion by my right hon. Friend?

MR. SPEAKER: The discussion is on Report; and I have no cognisance of the Debate which took place in Committee. The only restriction I can lay down for the hon. Member is that he should confine himself to the erection of a Second Chamber, showing the necessity in the present circumstances of Ireland of having a Second Chamber as a counterfoil to the other.

MR. MACARTNEY said, he did not think he was going beyond the bounds of Order. The Prime Minister himself had already that evening referred to a speech made by an hon. Friend in Committee; and there were many important subjects which he and his hon. Friends had been precluded from discussing in consequence of the application of the Closure. The Chancellor of the Duchy told him that having looked all round the world he found that the reason of a Second Chamber in all countries, with the exception of two, was found in assent to the bicameral principle. The case of the Colonies had been brought in as an example; but the proposal of the Government had only a superficial and not a real resemblance in the existing facts connected with the institution of Second Chambers in Australasia or in Canada.

This clause had been drafted on a different basis from that of any clause relating to any other Constitution. They might be told that in voting against the proposal of the Government they were voting against the principle of a Second Chamber. For his part he was doing nothing of the kind. If the clause was framed in the form of that in the Act of 1852 or that in the British North America Act, then there would be some justification for saying he was voting against the principle of a Second Chamber. He was only going to vote against the proposal in this Bill. At a further stage, they would be entitled to discuss the composition of the Second Chamber. He would not go further to-night, but would content himself by entering his protest against the Government proposal for setting up a Chamber which was inadequate to the carrying out of the duties which they sought to impose upon it.

*MR. WHITTAKER (York, W.R., Spen Valley) said, he should vote for the Amendment, because he disapproved of having specially-selected persons or bodies to supervise popularly elected Assemblies. Experience was against the idea that specially selected persons possessed superior judgment. The history of the Second Chamber in this country sustained that view. He considered that the action of the Aldermen in connection with our Municipal Corporations had not been satisfactory, and only recently the Government had reduced the qualification for members of Local Boards. Then, on our Boards of Guardians we had had some experience of ex officio members and a feeling was growing in the country that that kind of thing should be done away with. In connection with Ireland, would the Second Chamber endorse the opinion of the Assembly elected by the people? If it would, they did not need it; but if it was going to thwart the will of the people he and his friends were opposed to it, because they believed in government of the people by the people. It had been suggested by the hon. Member for the Partick Division (Mr. Parker Smith) that our Second Chamber had sometimes saved the country from revolution. That seemed to him to be a most extraordinary doctrine, for he was under the impression that in recent times that Chamber had brought us nearly to the verge of revolution. Then it was said that a Second Chamber was required as a check on hasty legislation. He confessed he did not think that we needed any check on legislation. Our difficulty was that legislation was far too slow at present, and after there had been years of work in bringing questions to such a conclusion that they could command a majority in that House it was most objectionable that the will of the people should be thwarted in another place. The danger to the country was not in legislating too hastily, but in doing so too slowly, for delay dammed up public opinion until it became a flood which swept all before it. What had been their experience of a Second Chamber in this country in connection with Irish legislation? Was it not an acknowledged fact that some of the best Bills which had been passed through that House had been doctored by the superior wisdom of noble Lords elsewhere? Was it that property required protection? He was one of those who were not deeply concerned about the protection of property. It was quite capable of taking care of itself; but it was the poor, weak, and helpless that required to be protected in this country. If they looked at the condition of the landlords and noblemen of the country it would be seen that they were able to protect themselves; but if they went into the streets and saw there the crowds of poor, weak, and helpless people it would be admitted that it was they who wanted protection, and not the well-to-do. He did not believe in giving a man extra votes because he had more property than others. There was an old saying—"Take care of the pence, and the pounds will take care of themselves." If they took care of the people who only had pence, the people who had pounds would take care of themselves. Did the minority in Ireland want protection? He was more concerned about the majority. The object of this Bill was to protect the majority in that country. The minority there had been specially protected far too long. Who were they? They were the cause of all the trouble which this Bill was intended to remedy. It was at their instigation and on their behalf that we had perpetrated the injustice and sustained the tyranny and class rule which had brought about the condition of things we now had to deal with. Those who were anxious for protection had uneasy consciences. They feared that the majority in Ireland in the future would do as they themselves had done in the past, and would be as unjust as they had been; but he hoped and believed the Irish people would act fairly. It was said that there was a consensus of feeling throughout the civilised world in favour of Second Chambers. That was because, when they were establishing a new form of Government in a country, they mostly had to conciliate those who were possessed of property, privileges, and power, and the Second Chambers were the price that had been paid. Some Radical Members would have been willing to support a Second Chamber in Ireland if that concession would have conciliated the Opposition; but as they were not to be conciliated he would vote for the Amendment. He did not wish to see the Irish Legislature marred. He did not want to give a man two votes because he lived in a house of more than £20 rateable value. There were many who wished to see the principle of this Bill extended to England, Scotland, and Wales. Were they to have Second Chambers in those countries? He sincerely hoped not. They had tried class legislation long enough in Ireland. What was wanted was freedom and equality, to which the restrictions in the Bill were the greatest danger, and he would, therefore, prefer to see this particular restriction removed.

COLONEL SAUNDERSON (Armagh, N.) said, he thought the position taken up by the hon. Member who had just sat down and by the hon. Member for Kirkcaldy (Mr. Dalziel), who had moved the Amendment, was perfectly logical. He could quite understand and appreciate their arguments and motives; but what he could not possibly conceive was any Member of the House who was opposed to the principle of Second Chambers under any conditions voting with the Government at the present moment. The hon. Member who had just sat down and the hon. Member who had moved the Amendment would both vote for the principle that they objected to a Second Chamber. Their position was perfectly logical. He should vote with them on this occasion, not because he was opposed on principle to Second Chambers, but because he was opposed to the creation of a Second Chamber in Ireland. The Prime Minister had given a thoroughly free hand to his followers in a speech he made the other night which they all remembered with pleasure and admiration, and which, although he did not agree with it at all, he could not refrain from admiring. The right hon. Gentleman had moved the House to laughter by saying that it was the universal habit of Unionists who moved and spoke on Amendments which were proposed in Committee always to begin in the same way. They always began, he said, by saying—"This is the most important Amendment that has yet come under the notice of the House of Commons." Well, the Prime Minister invariably began his speeches in the same way. He always said—"This is not a vital question." But they had no vitals. The Opposition had been searching for them for the last three months. It was an eviscerated Government. The Opposition had imagined that, at any rate, the question of the Second Chamber would constitute a vital question. But no; although the Prime Minister informed them that in the civilised world he could not find an instance of a successful Constitutional Government without a Second Chamber, he said that in the case of Ireland the establishment of a Second Chamber was not a vital question. Therefore, the Radical Party who were opposed to a Second Chamber had got practically a free hand from the right hon. Gentleman to vote against him on the present occasion. But why should he and his hon. Friends vote against a Second Chamber? The House was apt to forget that they were now discussing a practically dead Bill. Everybody knew that it would never become law. If a Home Rule Bill ever did become law, the final decision would rest, not with the House of Commons, but with the electors of Great Britain, and from indications they had received to-night they were led to believe—

MR. SPEAKER: The hon. Member must not stray from the Amendment.

COLONEL SAUNDERSON said, he at once bowed to Mr. Speaker's ruling. He had been about to say why he should vote against a Second Chamber for Ireland. He should vote against that Second Chamber, because it was decking out a political monstrosity in the garish garb of Constitutional methods. A Second Chamber in Ireland was an absolute absurdity. Every one of the loyal minority regarded the Second Chamber as a sham and a delusion which would protect nobody. The First Chamber he could understand. It would be a Land League Parliament. The Prime Minister had informed them that in the civilised world he had not discovered any instance where a Second Chamber had not been adopted in framing a Constitution. But where, in the civilised world, was there an instance of a sane man proposing to settle a great question by placing the criminal population in supreme authority? [Cries of "Stale!"] Hon. Members said that was stale; but it was also true. That being so, it was proposed to modify the First Chamber by a second, which would, undoubtedly, harmonise in its general aspirations. The only thing would be that provision would be made for occasional differences, and he believed that on those occasions the two Chambers were to meet together. He would only say that on those occasions the 48 gentlemen who constituted the Second Chamber ought to be armour-plated, if they proposed seriously to resist the will of the Lower Chamber. So far as the minority in Ireland were concerned, they would reject this Second Chamber as anything like a protection to them, and in saying this he was speaking the opinion of every Ulster Unionist. The hon. Member for Kirkcaldy opposed the Second Chamber on purely Radical grounds. The hon. Member imagined that it would be a class Assembly—an assembly of £20 aristocrats. [Laughter.] He had heard the hon. Member make use of that argument. He was very glad that any argument could induce the hon. Member to vote in the direction that he (Colonel Sanderson) was going to vote. He had come to the conclusion that the hon. Member had never been in Ireland.

MR. DALZIEL: I have been in Ireland.

COLONEL SAUNDERSON: Then he ought to know better. He opposed this Second Chamber because it was intended to make the English people believe that some security was provided against hasty and possibly criminal legislation. The Opposition proposed, if possible, to tear away from this measure all the shams by which it was surrounded, and which the Government would wish the country to swallow at the next Election. Already there were signs, however, that the people were becoming educated in this matter. They had learnt about these shams in Scotland. They were now learning about them in England—they were finding out that the measure would not give that security which every one of the subjects of the Crown had a right to expect. If a Second Chamber would give such security to the loyal minority he should certainly not feel justified in getting up in the House of Commons and opposing it. He was in favour of Second Chambers, but he was not in favour of a Second Chamber which was a delusion and which would simply be used as a bait to secure votes at the next Election—votes which never ought to be given to the Government by any man who desired that there should be fair play in dealing with the Irish people.

MR. J. CHAMBERLAIN: The question before us really divides itself into branches. We have to consider, in the first place, the principle of a Second Chamber; and, in the second place, we have to consider the Second Chamber proposed as a safeguard to the interests of the loyal minority in Ireland. As regards the principle of a Second Chamber, I confess I find myself unable to sympathise with the view of the hon. Member below me who thinks it a part of democratic doctrine to be opposed to all Second Chambers. That is one of the most wonderful observations that I have ever heard from an hon. Member who professes to be a democrat, because by such an observation as that he would condemn even the Senate of the United States, which certainly is one of the greatest of Democratic Institutions. The question of a Second Chamber depends entirely on the constitution of the Second Chamber. It is not a part of democratic, or of Liberal, or of Conservative policy either to support or to object to Second Chambers as such, and, for my own part, I do not hesitate to say that if a Second Chamber is properly constituted it will give a great strength to any Constitution. So far as this point is concerned, I regard the discussion as a purely domestic quarrel between the Government and some of their supporters, and I have ceased to take any interest in such quarrels, because I know that they are carried on only as long as it is safe to do so. Hon. Members are perfectly prepared in private or even in public, in dealing with their constituents, to express objection to many portions of the Bill itself; but when any Amendment of the Government scheme is moved these bold and courageous partisans always inquire of the Government Whips whether the Government is in any danger, and, if they find that they are in any danger, they vote for them, or they go out of the House by the back way. Therefore, as far as the Government and their supporters are concerned, I think that it is best to let them fight out the matter among themselves. On a previous occasion I voted against the Second Chamber proposed by the Government, because I thought that it had almost every vice that a Second Chamber could have, and that it had nothing whatever to recommend it. On the present occasion I do not think it will be worth while to take part in the Division; consequently, the supporters of the Government can safely assert their independence without fear of the consequences. Turning to the second branch of the subject, I would say that the Government are pledged to propound in this Bill some safeguard for the minority in Ireland. They put forward this provision for a Second Chamber in the front rank as being such a safeguard. The Government profess to have a mandate from the country to carry Home Rule into effect. I cannot help thinking that the position of the Government in that respect has been slightly altered since they first asserted that they had received that mandate. I can imagine if I sat on the Front Ministerial Bench that I should be thinking how it would be possible to gag the country. The writing is upon the wall, and the Government is beginning to be found out.

MR. SPEAKER: The right hon. Gentleman must confine himself to the Amendment before the House.

MR. J. CHAMBERLAIN: I bow to your ruling, Sir. The Government say that their mandate was coupled with the condition that they provide adequate safeguards for the minority; and looking at this proposal from that point of view, I find that every Member of the minority in Ireland repudiates the provision that is made. Under the circumstances, I am inclined to give the advice to the Government which I gave to the hon. Gentleman below me. Let them take back the boon for which nobody is going to thank them. In any case, however, I regard the little incident which has arisen as a purely domestic squabble between the Government and some of their own supporters, and, for my own part, I do not intend to take any part in the Division.

MR. ADDISON (Ashton-under-Lyne) desired to give his reasons for the vote he intended to give in support of the Amendment. The speech of the hon. and learned Member for Plymouth (Sir E. Clarke) was a convincing answer to those who regarded it as inconsistent for Members who believed in the principle of Second Chambers to support the Amendment. He (Mr. Addison), it was true, was a strong supporter of the principle of a Second Chamber in England, seeing that the veto of the Crown rested with the Ministry. There was no check on the Party in power, not even that of a two-thirds majority, outside the House of Lords, and a Second Chamber after the fashion of the American Senate could not be devised which would not come into conflict with this House. A check upon this House was necessary, and that they possessed. But was the check of a Second House necessary in the case of Ireland? He held that the proper check for the proposed Irish Legislature would be the Imperial Parliament. There would be 80 Irish Representatives in that House; and if there was any hasty and ill-considered legislation in the Irish Legislature, that House, which would retain a hold upon some important Irish affairs, would be the proper place to correct it. Then, it must be remembered that Ireland was a very poor country. It ought not to be disturbed by too many elections. They all knew that friction and disturbance of trade resulted from General Elections in this country, and these evils would be intensified in Ireland if it were necessary to hold three sets of Parliamentary Elections there—to say nothing of the probability of elections being ignored in the future for county government purposes. He denied that hon. Gentlemen on the Ministerial side of the House were more deeply interested in the welfare of the poor and helpless than were the Conservative Party. In the interest of these people who would suffer by disturbance of trade they should avoid having too many elections in Ireland.

MR. WYNDHAM (Dover) could not content himself with an absolutely silent vote. His difficulty was that neither the Prime Minister nor the right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Birmingham (Mr. J. Chamberlain) had stated the problem before the House in terms to which he could yield assent. In his opinion, differing from the right hon. Member for West Birmingham, the question did not depend so much on the composition of the Second Chamber as on the authority and the status of the Legislature in which it was to play a part. Under the Bill they were asked to constitute a subordinate Parliament for Ireland. Under the 3rd section of the 5th clause of the Bill there was power given to the Lord Lieutenant to act as the instrument in this House of order to check hasty and ill-considered legislation. His (Mr. Wyndham's) wish was to build up and buttress that provision, and to do nothing to impair or blunt the important functions it had to perform in the eyes of the electorate of this country. They knew well that unnecessary complication of machinery only led to a dissipation of force; and if the Lord Lieutenant, acting as the mouthpiece of the House of Commons, could adequately perform the duties, imperative in any Constitution, of checking hasty and ill-considered legislation, they would do well not to countenance any proposition that was likely to draw public attention from his acts or weaken his responsibility in this matter.

MR. COURTNEY (Cornwall, Bodmin) said, he had taken part in the discussion of this question in Committee, and though he must differ from the Chief Secretary that that constituted any disability to review the arguments then brought forward, he did not intend to go as fully into the matter as he had done on the previous occasion. The hon. Member for Armagh and the hon. Member for Tyrone had repudiated the Second Chamber contained in the Bill. The hon. Member for Tyrone certainly guarded himself against being supposed to vote against Second Chambers in the abstract, and said that all he was voting against was the Second Chamber proposed in the Bill. Of course, it was impossible to fathom the motives which induced hon. Members to come to a special conclusion; but they could say, at any rate, in reference to the action of these hon. Gentlemen, that they were voting in direct violation of the principle laid down by Mr. Speaker as a guide to the House. They were not now asked to vote for the Special Chamber proposed in the Bill, but on the question whether, having regard to the condition of Ireland, the Legislature to be set up should consist of two Chambers. He must express his strong opinion as to the very perilous game which was being played by Members who, while thinking that a double Chamber was a judicious Institution generally, and would be an advisable thing to introduce into Ireland, were going to vote against the institution of a Second Chamber by this Bill. They were proposing to vote in that way because of the imperfections of the composition of the Second Chamber proposed. That, he conceived, was a policy fraught with extreme danger. But they appeared to distinguish between votes given and what might be the real meaning of the Members who took part in the Division. He had often had to criticise the right hon. Gentleman the Prime Minister for giving, as he thought, greater attention to form than to fact; but on the present occasion he felt bound to express his cordial admiration of the distinction he had drawn, and of his refusal to be led by the action taken on this subject in Committee into assuming that the votes there given expressed the deliberate and consistent opinion of the majority on the question of a Second Chamber. It was evident that hon. Members might now indulge in a line of action which at some future time might justify the Government in dropping this particular proposal. Therefore, he urged them to pause before voting against, or even abstaining from voting upon, the proposal to establish in Ireland a Second Chamber. The hon. Member for the Spen Valley (Mr. Whitaker), in supporting the Amendment, had repeated many phrases more or less familiar—more rather than less—with great fluency and considerable force ; but what, after all, did his speech amount to ? The whole scope of his argument was prejudice against the House of Lords and against ex officio Guardians. It did not appear that the hon. Member had paid any attention to the general subject of Second Chambers, whether in the United States or in other Colonies ; he had not evidently studied the results of their action upon legislation. He did warn hon. and right hon. Gentlemen opposite against the peril they were running into in adopting a course which in the future might prove most injurious to their own desires and their own aims. They had to consider whether, under the special circumstances of Ireland, they could set up a single Chamber which would so represent the power, the interests, and the ideas of all classes in that island as to command implicit confidence. Those who knew how society was constituted in Ireland, and were aware how a Representative Chamber would necessarily be constructed, would know that their single Chamber would be a most imperfect Chamber. It must not represent all classes ; it would be pre-eminently the Chamber of Representatives of the tenant farmer class, and it would leave out from its composition all those other classes which they hoped would, in the future, increase in numbers and in power. A single Chamber by itself could not be trusted. How it was to be supplemented they were not prepared to say, but it was enough to know that the position in Ireland forbade the hope that a single Chamber would command confidence. It was well to take their minds away from the immediate circumstances in which they were living, and see whether they could not get light from other countries and other communities to guide them. If they looked across the Atlantic and observed what was going on in the United States, could anyone doubt as to the lesson they there learnt ? Bearing in mind the problems of extreme delicacy and perplexity now undergoing solution in the House of Representatives there, could any one doubt that that Body, by itself, would be a most imperfect body had it to deal with those problems. They saw in the American Senate what was there regarded as the complement of the House of Representatives by the judgment and the opinion of the people of the United States. It was vain to refuse the introduction of a Second Chamber in Ireland on the plea that they would be able to deal more effectively with a single Chamber, for they would not have that power. In the course of the Debates on that question they had been told there would be constant supervision by the Imperial Parliament, followed by continual interruption, suppression, and nullification. But let them not be led astray by that. The idea reminded him of the child who, having taken a dose of nauseous medicine, thought it the best way to improve matters by bringing it up again. If the House accepted the noxious dose of that Bill they would be free to rejoice in their freedom, and certainly they would not wish to indulge in a repetition of Irish Debates. For these reasons he intended to repeat the vote he had given in Committee, and he would cordially support the Government in this proposal.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR : My right hon. Friend who has just sat down and the Prime Minister have both alluded to the proceedings in Committee, and they have suggested that a large number of gentlemen on this side and some on the other side voted against the institution of a Second Chamber not so much on account of their own personal convictions as that they hoped by that vote to embarrass, if not to defeat, the Government. I am one of those who both spoke and voted against the Government on that occasion, and though I had not the slightest objection either to defeat or embarrass Her Majesty's Government—[Cheers]—certainly I and my hon. Friends were not animated at the time by either of the amiable motives attributed to us. The fact is that when the subject came before the Committee it was discussed, not as an abstract question between a Second Chamber and no Second Chamber, but as to the efficiency of that particular Second Chamber which the Government proposed to institute, and we held then, as we hold now—at least, I hold—that the Second Chamber proposed in Clause 6 is a ludicrous sham, and is absolutely incapable of carrying out the most elementary of the important duties which we think ought to be handed over to a Second Chamber. We never thought, and we do not now think, that Second Chambers are useless in general, or that in Ireland in particular they ought to be avoided. It is quite true that the argument has been advanced by my learned Friend the Member for Plymouth (Sir E. Clarke) and by other gentlemen that the proper check upon the rash and extravagant performances of a Chamber elected on a large suffrage is to be found in the case of Ireland not so much in a Second Chamber in that country as in the House of Commons. I think there was great force in that argument. If we could count upon acting as a constant check on every act of the Irish Legislature; if we could suppose that all the legislative measures of the Irish Legislature could be adequately supervised by the House of Commons, that check would be far more effectually exercised than could possibly be done by such a Second Chamber as is likely to be set up in Ireland. But if we have in Ireland a really effective Second Chamber, a Chamber which will not act as an occasional arbiter in great Irish controversies, but as a constant censor upon the measures of the other Chamber that will be far more effective than anything Parliament could hope to do, burdened as it is and as it must remain by great Imperial legislation. But when the time comes I will demonstrate that the Second Chamber, so far from being a check upon the tenant-farmer proclivities in the First Chamber, will entirely represent the tenant farmers to the total exclusion of the labourers and other classes in Ireland. We are precluded, however, by the ruling you, Sir, have given from the Chair, from treating the question in that broad spirit in which we were able to deal with it in Committee, for you have decided—and if I may presume so, rightly decided—that we must postpone until we come to Clause 6 the discussion on the character and functions of the proposed Second Chamber. Clause 6 is one of the 30 or 35 clauses on which we have not yet been allowed to say a word. The actual question now before us is very much of an academical character. It is not a question as to whether there should be the particular Second Chamber in Ireland proposed by the Bill, but whether Ireland is a country in which the check of a Second Chamber is or is not desirable. I think the particular check proposed by the Government is an absurd one, and when we come to examine it we shall be able to show that it is a mere blind, barren worship of a principle, good in itself properly applied, but absolutely empty and vague as the Government propose to apply it. We shall be able to show when we deal with Clause 6 that the application of the principle of a Second Chamber as proposed in the Bill will do more harm than good to those whom the Government desires to protect. On the present occasion, however, I certainly shall not tie my own hands for the future, or the hands of any of those with whom I have to work, by committing myself to a proposition which appears to imply that Ireland is a country so incapable of any rash action through its Representatives, so steeped to the lips in a wise Conservatism, that in that country above all others we should abstain from a check which, in other circumstances, I myself might desire to impose.

ADMIRAL FIELD (Sussex, Eastbourne) said, he desired to explain in a few sentences the vote he proposed to give. They had got into a fog. It was quite easy to steer a straight course if they were sure of their soundings, and he was sure of his in spite of the philosophic speech of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Bodmin (Mr. Courtney), who had done a great deal to get them into that fog. He himself had had a straightforward training, and he refused to have his eyes blinded by abstract propositions. He had no hesitation as to the vote he should give. He approved the principle of a Second Chamber, but the proposal of the Government was a sham, a fraud, and an hypocrisy. As an honest sailor he was opposed to all shams, and, therefore, he should vote against this fraud and against the Government.

MR. TOMLINSON (Preston) said, he intended to vote for the Amendment, and for two reasons: In the first place, he would vote against anything which set up, or attempted to set up, an independent Parliament in Ireland; and the Amendment, if carried, would deprive that Parliament of one attribute of a Legislative Assembly. In the second place, the Government had shown that they did not intend to make this Second Chamber an effective Body. It was a pure and perfect sham, and he could not vote for any such thing.

In Clause 2, page 1, line 15, to leave out from "laws," to "Provided," in line 17, and insert "in respect of all matters as applied to Ireland now dealt with in England by the following authorities respectively—namely,

- (a) the Board of Trade for England ;
- (b) the Education Department for England ;
- (c) the Local Government Board for England ;
- (d) any County Council for England ;
- (e) any Local Board of Health for England ;
- (f) any Rural Sanitary Authority for England ;

together with full power to constitute Local Authorities and to delegate all or any of the above matters to any Local Authority to be so constituted, and also full power to authorise the making, maintaining, and improving of railways, tramways, canals, waterworks, reservoirs, gas and lighting works, fisheries, and all other things which are the subject-matter of Bills known in either House of Parliament as local Bills."

The hon. and learned Member said, his proposal was to give the Irish people what he regarded as a complete system of Local Government, and one which avoided the difficulties surrounding the scheme now before the House. The proposal made by the Government broke both their pledges—namely, that they would enable the Irish people to manage their own affairs, and that they would not interfere with the supremacy of the Imperial Parliament. He contended that if his Amendment were carried the Irish people would have complete power and authority to manage their own affairs, and, at the same time, the supremacy of the Imperial Parliament would not be interfered with. The House had now decided that the Irish Members should remain in the Imperial Parliament.

It being Midnight, Further Proceeding on Consideration, as amended, stood adjourned.

Bill, as amended, to be further considered To-morrow.

SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read a second time."

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL (Sir J. RIGBY, Forfar) said, that no alteration of the law whatsoever was proposed by the Bill. The Joint Committee had given it the most attentive consideration, and it would be a great convenience and give an opportunity for amending the law if it were allowed to pass.

SIR R. WEBSTER (Isle of Wight) : If the hon. and learned Gentleman gives us the assurance that the Bill—which is rather a heavy one, and not easily glanced through to grasp its purport—does not alter the Law of Copyhold, I have no objection that it should pass.

SIR J. RIGBY : We avoided with the greatest care making any alteration whatever.

MR. HALSEY (Hertfordshire, Watford) said, that on the assurance which had been given by the Solicitor General, he would withdraw his objection to the Bill.

MR. STUART-WORTLEY (Sheffield, Hallam) : It is necessary to have that assurance, because I know there are those on the Treasury Bench who have expressed the opinion that this opportunity might always be seized for altering the law.

Motion agreed to.

Bill read a second time, and committed for Thursday.

SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read a second time."

SIR R. WEBSTER (Isle of Wight) asked the Solicitor General whether the Bill involved any alteration of the existing law ?

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL (Sir J. RIGBY, Forfar) : The Joint Committee carefully struck out even the slightest alteration of the law, in order to be able to assure the House that there was absolutely no alteration made.

Motion agreed to.

Bill read a second time, and committed for Thursday.

Motion made, and Question proposed
"That the Bill be now read a second time."

THE PRESIDENT OF THE BOARD OF TRADE (Mr. MUNDELLA, Sheffield, Brightside): I ask the House to agree to the Second Reading of this Bill, which I believe would be of immense service at the present moment. Communications have reached me from persons connected with the present colliery dispute that if we could only refer it to some Court it would do an immense service. I hope, therefore, that hon. Members opposite will allow the Bill to be read a second time. I am prepared to send it with other measures on the same subject to the Grand Committee, and I believe that in one day the whole subject can be threshed out.

MR. WOLFF (Belfast, E.) asked that a day should be given for the discussion of the measure, as it was of so much importance to the working classes.

MR. MUNDELLA: It is impossible at this period of the Session that a day could be given to the Bill.

Objection taken.

Second Reading deferred till To-morrow.

SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

Motion made, and Question proposed,
"That the Bill be now read a second time."

*THE PRESIDENT OF THE LOCAL GOVERNMENT BOARD (Mr. H. H. FOWLER, Wolverhampton, E.) said that this Bill was simply to cure an error in the present sanitary law in London. They ought to be very much indebted to the London County Council for introducing it, and he hoped the House would allow it to pass.

VISCOUNT CRANBORNE (Rochester): Does the right hon. Gentleman give us an assurance that the Bill does nothing more than to remedy a defect in the law?

*MR. H. H. FOWLER: It merely restores the law to what the law was before.

MR. J. STUART (Shoreditch, Hoxton): Speaking for the London County Council, I can assure hon. Members that that is so.

THE MARQUESS OF CARMARTHEN (Lambeth, Brixton) said, he objected to this Bill. He had been asked to put his name on the back of the Bill, but on consulting some of his friends he was strongly advised not to endorse it. However, having been assured that it made no alteration in the law, he would withdraw his objection.

Motion agreed to.

Bill read a second time, and committed for Thursday, 24th August.

ORDERS OF THE DAY.

(No. 428.)

CONSIDERATION. [EIGHTH NIGHT.]

Bill, as amended, further considered.

MR. AMBROSE (Middlesex, Harrow.) said, he was endeavouring last night to put before the House his views upon the propositions which they were told would be found in the Bill. Those propositions were—First, the supremacy of the Imperial Parliament, which appeared in the Preamble; and, secondly, that the Bill was to be a Bill in relation to the peace, order, and good government of Ireland—that was to say, that the Bill was to relate to the affairs of Ireland exclusively. What he had ventured to point out was that these words “peace, order, and good government” were inconsistent with pledges of the Members of the Government, and involved in the Preamble. The words were inconsistent with the supremacy of Parliament. In the Bill of 1886 there was a clause dealing with the absence of the Irish Members, and, of course, the proposal that they should be excluded was objected to by the Unionists, and by others, upon the ground that it would be a badge of servitude. But, coming to the point—by excluding the Irish Members, Ireland became subservient to the Imperial Parliament, but, by retaining them, they merely transferred the servitude to Great Britain. It was impossible for them to suppose that they could have Ireland in command of these prerogatives, competing with England, without having servitude. They would have 80 Irish Members to come to the rescue. Great Britain would be subject to Ireland. [“Hear, hear!”] An hon. Member below the Gangway (on the Irish Benches) said—“Hear, hear!” If it was the Irish view that England was to become a subject Province of Ireland, let the British people understand that—let it be perfectly plain to them, as he trusted it would be. He did not want to argue points that had been argued over and over again in Committee; it would be outside his purpose to do so, even if it were in Order for him to go into these details. He merely wanted to place these points before them, to show the absolute inconsistency of the Government. They had decided that the Irish Members were to be retained in the Imperial Parliament; and, having decided that, it was impossible for them to retain the words “peace, order, and good government of Ireland”—that was, if they maintained their pledges to the country, and if they allowed the Preamble to remain stating that the supremacy of the Imperial Parliament would not be interfered with. This was not consistent with the obligations imposed by the 5th clause. They were, it seemed to him, not only destroying the supremacy of the Imperial Parliament, but doing it with a vengeance, by establishing the supremacy of the Irish Members and the Irish Parliament. He asked what was all this for? He had considered the matter very carefully, and he could not see the necessity for handing over to the Irish Members and the Irish Legislature the command of the Executive Government—the command of the prerogatives, the administration of justice—criminal and civil. He thought he would be able to show that some such words as he proposed were demanded. For his part, he would not give the Irish Parliament the administration of justice and law, and the control of the various criminal jurisdictions throughout the country. Nobody would seriously argue—he hoped the Chief Secretary (Mr. J. Morley), whom he saw in his place, would not—that these were matters exclusively Irish. If the right hon. Gentleman did argue that, he feared he would not carry conviction to any part of the House or of Great Britain. He would illustrate what he meant. His point was that they did not want, for the purpose of a Home Rule scheme, the command of these matters to be handed over. If a London merchant sold to a Dublin trader in the ordinary course of business, let them suppose a dispute arising between the parties—the Dublin trader, say, adopting the methods of the tenant farmer, who said he would pay no rent, and refusing to pay. In that case the London trader had to enforce his claim. For that purpose he must resort to the course of the law in Ireland. Would anyone contend that the procedure in that case was a purely Irish affair? It was not so, more than it was a British affair. The enforcement of legal obligations arising between people in the two countries was, it seemed to him, an Imperial affair. There was no more ground for calling it an Irish affair exclusively—

MR. SPEAKER: I must point out that this point cannot be raised on the Amendment before the House. It is not relevant.

MR. AMBROSE said, he was merely putting the case to show that the Preamble was inconsistent with the terms, "peace, order, and good government of Ireland." He would be sorry if he was out of Order. He would put his proposition without illustrating it further. He had intended to show that these were matters not exclusively relating to Ireland, but he would now pass on to the words he proposed to substitute, his observations so far having been in support of the leaving out of words on the ground that one part of the clause was inconsistent with another part. In the first place, he proposed to give to the Irish Parliament power to deal with all the matters now dealt with by the Board of Trade, including statistics, railways, canals, gas and water undertakings, merchant shipping, and a variety of other matters. He considered that he was more liberal in this matter than Her Majesty's Government, who exempted the Board of Trade altogether. He, however, did not see why, within certain limits, the Irish Legislature should not have power to manage trade regulations. He came next to powers as to Local Government. Those who remembered the Local Government Bill for England and Wales would remember that these powers in the Schedules of that Bill occupied 20 or 30 pages. The powers of the Local Government Board were enormous, comprising almost everything that could be imagined. He added the powers of Local Boards of Health and of Rural Sanitary Authorities, and also the conduct of Private Bill inquiries, believing it hard that Irishmen should be compelled to come to London for the settlement of such matters. He hoped that any right hon. Gentleman who did him the honour to reply to him would point out any matter which was a purely Irish affair which would not be comprised in the scheme he had ventured to put on the Paper. If that could be done, and if anything was omitted, he should be only too pleased to add it to his scheme. His intention was to give to the Irish people the fullest possible control over purely Irish affairs, whilst denying to them the control of Imperial affairs in competition with the Imperial Parliament. The scheme would not in any way impede the Bill. The presence of the Irish Members in the Imperial Parliament, which was really needful, would no longer be objectionable; there would be no unwarrantable interference with taxation, and if any grant were required to meet expenses he was confident that it would not be grudged.

Amendment proposed,

In page 1, line 15. to leave out from the word "laws," to the word "Provided," in line 17, in order to insert the words "in respect of all matters as applied to Ireland now dealt with in England by the following authorities respectively, namely,—

- (a) the Board of Trade for England;
- (b) the Education Department for England;
- (c) the Local Government Board for England;
- (d) any County Council for England;
- (e) any local Board of Health for England;
- (f) any Rural Sanitary Authority for England;

together with full power to constitute Local Authorities and to delegate all or any of the above matters to any Local Authority to be so constituted, and also full power to authorise the making, maintaining, and improving of railways, tramways, canals, waterworks, reservoirs, gas and lighting works, fisheries, and all other things which are the subject-matter of Bills known in either House of Parliament as local Bills."—(Mr. Ambrose.)

Question proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Bill."

THE CHIEF SECRETARY FOR IRELAND (MR. J. MORLEY, Newcastle-upon-Tyne): I must compliment the hon. and learned Member on the modesty of his appearance on the present occasion. This is now, I am sorry to say, the 70th day—I am not sure that it is not the 71st day.

MR. W. E. GLADSTONE: The 71st.

MR. J. MORLEY: Yes; the 71st day of the discussion of this Bill in one form or another. On this day the hon. and learned Member rises and makes a speech of more than half-an-hour in duration—including that portion with which he favoured us last night—in support of a proposal which, he says, would not impede the Bill, but which would turn it topsy-turvy, and would reduce to a complete farce the 1st clause, which is now entirely disposed of. I consider—and I think the House will consider—the hon. Member's conduct in this matter rather extraordinary.

MR. AMBROSE: The right hon. Gentleman charges me with want of modesty in bringing forward this Amendment at this stage. He ought to remember that at an early period of the proceedings in Committee I tried to move it, but was ruled out of Order.

MR. J. MORLEY: I remember the episode to which the hon. Member alludes; but I am not sure that it is in his favour. We have had a discussion upon a proposal in substance identical with the proposal of the hon. and learned Member. His proposal is to leave out "peace, order, and good government," and to substitute the words on the Paper. Well, that was the identical proposal which the Committee discussed at great length on the Amendment of another hon. Member; and it was exactly for the reason that the Amendment now moved covered the same ground as one which had already been before the Committee that the Chairman ruled it out of Order. In conformity with the spirit of the suggestion which Mr. Speaker was good enough to make to the House yesterday, and which was cordially accepted by the Leader of the Opposition, who recommended the same course to hon. Gentlemen who act with him, I do not propose to enter again into a question which has been adequately discussed on previous occasions. There is nothing more to be said of the Amendment, except that it is in flat contradiction, not only to the principle affirmed by the Second Reading of the Bill, but to the 1st clause. It is a proposal to substitute for the control by the Irish Legislature of peace, order, and good government certain specific and narrow powers. He proposes to confer on the Irish Legislature the powers of the Board of Trade, which would include powers over merchant shipping and trade, and many other things which no one desires to confer on it. The House having affirmed that it is expedient there should be a Legislature in Ireland composed of the Queen and two Houses, to propose now that that Legislature so composed should have nothing to do but with local affairs and local purposes is, as the Prime Minister said in regard to a former Amendment, nothing more than a bad joke.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR (Manchester, E.): I would remind the Chief Secretary, who is so angry with my hon. and learned Friend for bringing forward a proposal to frame the Bill on lines of local purposes, that whenever it suits the purpose of the Government and their supporters to say that the Bill only gives to Ireland the control of her own local affairs they never hesitate to make that statement. Hon. Members sitting behind the Chief Secretary, in large numbers—I will not say in what numbers—have gone to their constituents and been elected as Representatives of Home Rule, because, as they have assured those long-suffering individuals, they have no intention whatever of allowing any Bill to pass which is more than a Bill giving Ireland the control of its own local affairs. The particular enumeration of the duties which my hon. and learned Friend seeks to impose upon the Irish Legislature may not be the best that can be conceived; but, at any rate, he is justified in putting down an Amendment which obliges the Government, and even more their followers, to say whether they do or do not adhere to the statements on this subject which they have constantly made in the country, and sometimes in the House of Commons, and in regard to which I have no doubt the House will hear more when the details of the measure have been forgotten. The Chief Secretary has been good enough to quote some words I said yesterday, as to the course that ought now to be adopted with regard to the very small percentage of clauses which so far we have been allowed to discuss in Committee. I made those observations deliberately, and I adhere to them; and they are to the effect that, in my judgment, it is only advisable to bring up those subjects that are of first-rate importance. Let me remind the House that the fact that a question has been discussed in Committee is not in itself any reason for not discussing it on Report. The whole theory of our Debate is that the House reviews on the Report stage what has been done in Committee. Although I fully agree that anyone who desires to prevent an undue waste of time would not advise that every point raised in Committee should be surveyed and re-surveyed, on the other hand, there is no one in the House who would think of laying down the proposition that because a point has been discussed in Committee therefore there shall be no discussion of the same matter on Report. With regard to the Amendment of my hon. and learned Friend, I agree that it is one which, if carried, would entirely destroy the Government Bill; but the reason is simply this—that the Bill is not in conformity with the professions of its supporters and the pledges of the Government. Therefore, I think my hon. and learned Friend is perfectly justified in asking the Government and their supporters to come clearly out into the open, and say that by Home Rule they emphatically do not mean a Bill which simply means to give to Ireland the power of managing their own local affairs.

MR. ROSS (Londonderry) said, he could have wished that the subject of the Amendment had been treated in a more serious manner by the Chief Secretary, and that in answer to the hon. and learned Member they might have heard a statement from the Prime Minister. He knew the Prime Minister was in the habit of ridiculing every one of these Amendments; but he certainly thought that this was one which required the fullest consideration of the House; and, although he did not agree with the hon. and learned Member, believing that the proposal really went too far and made enormous concessions to Ireland, he would be willing to end the tremendous struggle that had been going on in this country on the terms suggested in the Amendment. To his mind, it was necessary that there should be some compromise, and in that spirit he was willing to assent to the hon. and learned Member's proposal. No one could say that the concessions made in the Amendment were small ones. To give Ireland control over all local affairs, save those which would constitute her into a Sovereign State, seemed to him to be going very far indeed. The Government claimed that they had a mandate from the country for the purpose of granting Home Rule to Ireland; but there was no shadow of a pretence for saying that that mandate went any further than what was contemplated in the Amendment. The Government said they had a mandate to give Ireland autonomy; but a glance at the election addresses of their supporters would show that all they had proposed at the General Election was an enlarged scheme of Local Government, and nothing in the nature of the proposals embodied in this Bill, and the voters who gave the Government a majority at the last Election accepted that view of Home Rule, and never dreamt that the enormous powers contained in the Bill with respect to the Judges and police and the lives and liberties of the minority in Ireland would be conferred upon the majority. This Amendment contained the alternative policy of the Unionists pushed to an extreme—going as far as they could possibly go, and further than they thought they ought to go. The difficulties that already existed in connection with elected Boards of Guardians in Ireland were not an encouragement to them to enlarge the principle of local self-government in that country; but they were willing to accept it by way of compromise. He did not admit that any one of the grievances of the minority would be met by the proposal. As far as Private Bill legislation was concerned, he had always held the opinion that Ireland had a monstrous grievance, and that it was absurd that in the case of a Railway or Gas Bill it was necessary to spend in legal charges and in dealing with those matters in London almost as much money as was to be spent upon the works themselves. It was by reason of grievances such as these that the Government had acquired the majority which enabled them to force their Bill upon the House. He had frequently heard complaints made of jobs being perpetrated in Ireland in connection with the Grand Juries; but he had of late years had opportunities of investigating the conduct of the Grand Juries. He found that they acted fairly to all parties, and he had never heard on his Circuit of anything in the nature of a job. He admitted that these juries, not being elective Bodies, must cease to exist; but he was sorry for it, for the new Bodies would not, in his opinion, do their work nearly so well, and there would be more jobs. That would, however, right itself as time went on. Therefore he cordially supported the Amendment so far as it dealt with this matter. With regard to the other proposals of the Amendment, he agreed with them, but only by way of compromise. He did not wish to see the present situation prolonged. Heaven knew they did not wish the present embittered relations to continue. He and his friends had always entertained warm feelings towards their fellow-countrymen in Ireland, and he must say that the prolongation of this exceedingly bitter situation was most painful to them. They wished for the prosperity of Ireland and of every Irishman just as much as hon. Members below the Gangway, and they were prepared to accept the Amendment as a compromise, in order to put an end to the present embittered relations between the two Parties, which threatened to drift them into actual war. He knew a good deal of his countrymen in the North of Ireland, and he was certain they would never submit to the oppression of the Separatists. They knew by what had passed that the majority in Ireland had fatal memories, and would remember things they should forget. It was difficult to believe that the House would insist upon holding them to a Bill which would give the majority full control over one-third of their fellow-countrymen, who, after all, it would be admitted, had done a great deal of good for Ireland.

SIR J. KENNAWAY (Devon, Honiton) said, he had no desire to unduly prolong the Debate; but, as he had hitherto taken no part in the discussions, he desired to make one or two observations. When the Chief Secretary brought forward as a reason for refusing to discuss the Amendment that they had already had the subject under discussion some time, he left out of sight the very exceptional character of the measure, and forgot that it had never been before the country, and that its provisions had been studiously concealed from the constituencies by the right hon. Gentleman and his colleagues. The country, therefore, had not had an opportunity of considering the alternative now presented to the House. He was happy to think that the country was now beginning to understand, as the result of the election at Hereford showed—[Cries of "Order, order!"]

MR. SPEAKER: I must remind the hon. Baronet that he is not at liberty to make a Second Reading speech on the Bill.

SIR J. KENNAWAY said, the question was, were they to give Ireland the power to deal with its own local affairs simply, or to satisfy the aspirations of the Irish Nationalists? They were all agreed to meet the views of the Irish Members as far as they could in regard to the government of their own local affairs, but they had not yet come to an understanding as to what those local affairs were. The Amendment of the hon. and learned Gentleman would help to bring them to an understanding as to what those local affairs were. He thought that the hon. and learned Gentleman who had brought forward the Amendment had served a useful purpose in defining the powers which the Irish Government should exercise. If there was not to be continual strife and contention between Ireland and England, it should be clearly laid down what were the powers the Irish Government should exercise. The Amendment went rather too far, but it indicated the right lines on which Parliament ought to proceed. There could be no doubt as to the question of industrial undertakings. Then, again, many on the Opposition side of the House had always felt that Ireland had been badly dealt with in regard to the great question of education; they also knew that the interests of Irish trade had been largely sacrificed to English interests, and they would be glad that, within certain restrictions, the Irish Legislature should be at liberty to deal with those questions. There was a time when even hon. Gentlemen opposite were afraid to give to Ireland any Local Government except of the most restricted kind. The Irish Local Government Bill introduced by the Leader of the Opposition, however, had shown the urgent necessity for entrusting the Sister Country with the management of many of her local concerns. The Opposition, therefore, were prepared to go to considerable lengths in that direction. He earnestly joined in the appeal of the last speaker, that they might be allowed to arrive at a fair and reasonable compromise without doing anything to impair the integrity of the Empire.

COMMANDER BETHELL (York, E.R., Holderness) said, that though it was true that the Amendment would ruin the Bill reasonable-minded men amongst the Irish Nationalists would see that it indicated the direction in which a compromise must eventually be sought. He knew that many Members of the Opposition would scout the idea of in any degree climbing down from the pedestal on which they had placed themselves; but, to his mind, compromise was essential, and the proposal before the House seemed to him to form a very good ladder for descent. He held that the hon. and learned Member had a perfect moral right to move the Amendment, as it would be remembered that he was ruled out of Order in Committee in consequence of a discussion having taken place upon a Motion in relation to the words "peace, order, and good government." The hon. and learned Gentleman was ruled out of Order on a mere technicality.

Question put, and agreed to.

MR. HANBURY (Preston) said, the next Amendment which stood in his name was purely a verbal one. He considered, however, that any misinterpretation of the words of the clause would involve large consequences; therefore, he asked for a declaration from the Government as to the precise effect of the words. He did not doubt for a moment that the intention of the Government was that the word "make" should also cover the words "repeal or alter;" but that was not the impression that the words conveyed to a lay mind. The word "make" did not necessarily cover "unmake." He should, however, be satisfied if he got some distinct statement from the Government that this was their intention, and that the words would carry out that intention. He wished to point out, however, that in Clause 20, when the Government were conferring powers on the Irish Legislature, they were not content with the word "make," but added the words "repeal or alter."

Sir J. Kennaway

Amendment proposed, in page 1, line 22, after the word "make," to insert the words "repeal or alter."—(Mr. Hanbury.)

Question proposed, "That the words 'repeal or alter' be there inserted."

MR. W. E. GLADSTONE: The words "repeal or alter" are, I believe, convenient and necessary words in Clause 20; but here it is quite clear that their introduction would not improve the clause. There is no doubt whatever about the effect of the clause. The hon. Member wants to shut out the power of repealing laws relating to certain subjects. The supposition is that the Irish Legislature will do this. How can they do it except by making laws? Can he point out to me any possible way by which the Irish Legislature can repeal or alter a law except by making a law?

Question put, and negatived.

MR. J. MORLEY: I beg to move the Amendment which stands in my name, with the object of carrying out a pledge I gave to the Committee on the 2nd of June.

Amendment proposed,

Clause 3, page 2, line 7, after sub-section (3), insert.—"(4) Authorising the carrying or using of arms for military purposes, or the formation of associations for drill or practice in the use of arms for military purposes; or."—Mr. J. Morley.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I am obliged to my right hon. Friend for having put these words down, and I only rise to ask him a question in regard to the last three words of the Amendment, "for military purposes." I should have thought that these were words which would introduce great doubt into the provision, and would render it very difficult to interpret the clause. If there were any intention of evading the spirit of the provision, these words would, it appears to me, render it extremely easy to do so. I should, therefore, suggest that the words be omitted. It may, perhaps, be replied that such omission would unduly restrict the liberty of practising at rifle ranges, and so on, in Ireland, which nobody would desire to put a stop to; but it must be recollected that even if these words were omitted every freedom that now exists in Ireland will remain unimpaired; and if any great extension of liberty in this matter is required—which I can hardly imagine, there being so much liberty in the subject now—the change could be carried out by the Imperial Parliament, in which Irish interests are to be represented. I think, therefore, it would be better to leave out these ambiguous words.

MR. SEXTON (Kerry, N.) said, he could not admit that the words “for military purposes” were in the least ambiguous. He was greatly surprised at the right hon. Gentleman’s speech, because in Committee the pledge given by the Prime Minister appeared to be accepted, and the words now proposed by the Government completely carried out the pledge. If the words “for military purposes” were excluded the result would be to deny to the people of Ireland that which was the ordinary right of free people all over the world. He could only say if those words were left out he could not regard it as otherwise than a stigma and an insult.

MR. J. MORLEY: If the right hon. Gentleman had consulted the Debates that took place in Committee on this question, he would have found that what I said was that the Government would bring up words limiting the prohibition contained in the Bill exclusively to armed associations, and for the use of arms for military purposes. The right hon. Gentleman then got up and said—

“I am sure we are very grateful for the concession the Government has made to us.” My hon. and learned Friend the Solicitor General, in a preceding speech, had expressly said—

“All that could be reasonably asked for is the insertion of appropriate words for the purpose of preventing the establishment of armed associations—associations for drill or practice in the use of arms for military purposes.”

I think, therefore, the right hon. Gentleman cannot deny that we have carried out our assurance, and that, at the time, he found no fault with our statement.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: There is no difference, as I understand it, between us as to the object it is desired to carry out. The only question is as to the particular phraseology which best effects that common purpose. I do not think that the words I used in thanking the Government for their pledge can be considered to affect the question of drafting. I am of opinion that the object would be better obtained by leaving out the words; but I do not press the point.

MR. BYRNE (Essex, Walthamstow) asked whether the Government would accept the words “for military or quasi-military purposes”?

MR. J. MORLEY: No.

Question put, and agreed to.

Amendment proposed, in Clause 3, page 2, line 8, to leave out the words “and other,” and insert the words “or any.”—(Mr. J. Morley.)

Amendment agreed to.

MR. DUNBAR BARTON (Armagh, Mid) moved, in page 2, line 14, after “treason felony,” to insert “criminal procedure.” He said, this Amendment was not open to the criticism the Chief Secretary had applied to a similar Amendment moved in Committee, because two important things had happened since that Amendment was discussed in Committee. The House had now decided that the Irish Members were to remain at Westminster for all purposes; and, what was far more important, the explanation which the Government had given of the words “due process of law” had made the subject of criminal procedure one of vital importance. He would not repeat what was said in Committee; but he would remind lay Members of that House what were the main headings which were covered by the subject of criminal procedure. That subject included arrest of prisoners, examination of witnesses, committal of offenders, the provision of bail, the subject of recognisances, the conduct of trials, the way in which a man might be committed, whether by indictment, criminal information, or Coroner’s inquisitions, the question of cross-examination, the mode in which a prisoner’s defence might be conducted, the question of Crown Cases Reserved—in fact, every question which protected or restricted the liability of any person charged with an offence, whether regarded from the point of view of his right, or from the point of view of the general interests. These matters were really more important than the substance of the law itself, as the particular stages of the trial of a prisoner were really links in the chain of the liberty of every subject of the Crown. Under the Bill criminal procedure in England and Scotland could be regulated and affected by the votes, speeches, and arguments of Irish Members; but criminal procedure with reference to Irish citizens could not be in any similar way affected by English or Scotch Members. This was an inequality of a most glaring kind. It was evident that the only way of putting an end to it was to leave the criminal procedure for all parts of the Kingdom to the Imperial Parliament. He did not see how anybody could complain of having criminal procedure regulated by a Parliament in which he was represented. It seemed to him that the adoption of the omnia scheme enormously weakened the opposition of the Government to this Amendment, and very much strengthened the reasonableness of the cause of those who supported it. When they were discussing Clause 3 in Committee they were in darkness as to the meaning of that wonderful phrase "due process of law." Many of them, he believed, were still in a fog in regard to it; but they did know, at any rate, that the nearest definition that could be given of it was that given in the Michigan case—namely, that "due process of law" was intended to secure the right of trial according to form of law; that no man should be tried for his life, liberty, or property, except according to the form of law. But what was the use of giving the minority in Ireland the protection of "due process of law," if that due process was liable to be altered by the Irish Legislature? Certainly, the words, according to precedent and principle, had been added; but surely there were many bad precedents and principles which it would not be desirable to follow, and which, to say the least, were of doubtful value. The Judges and the Members of the Legislature would disagree as to whether certain principles were proper and right to be acted upon, and the fact was that the Government were leaving the whole thing in a state of uncertainty. They would have done well to have excluded criminal procedure from the purview of the Irish Legislature, and to have left the control of it to the Imperial Parliament. Would there be anything unjust in that?

MR. MAC NEILL (Donegal, S.): Yes.

MR. DUNBAR BARTON said, that no doubt the hon. Member would develop that argument, and show where the injustice would come in—where criminal procedure would be betrayed by the Imperial Parliament, in which, be it remembered, Irish Members would sit. He would ask—Would it not be more satisfactory to all parties to have the process of Criminal Law fixed by Imperial Statute? Why did the hon. Member for South Donegal distrust the English and Scotch Representatives in this matter, joined, as they would be, with Irish Members? The hon. Member and his Colleagues claimed unlimited confidence from this House in the Irish Members, why should the confidence not be reciprocal? Similar restriction on matters of Criminal Law procedure were imposed on every State in the American Union; and if this Amendment were carried, could it be said that the Irish people would be placed at a disadvantage compared with the American people? Canada afforded them some light and some assistance in that matter, for their criminal procedure was reserved to the Central Dominion Parliament, and that afforded an additional argument in favour of the application of the same principle to Ireland. He submitted that this was a reasonable proposition, and that it was a step in the direction of making one of the so-called safeguards in the Bill really effective.

Amendment proposed,

In page 2, line 14, after the words "treason felony," to insert the words "criminal procedure."—(Mr. Dunbar Barton.)

Question proposed, "That the words 'criminal procedure' be there inserted."

THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY (Mr. W. E. GLADSTONE, Edinburgh, Midlothian): As the hon. and learned Gentleman is aware, this subject was largely discussed upon a former occasion, the report of the Debate occupying 14 pages of Hansard, in four of which the hon. and learned Gentleman fully laid his views before Parliament. I cannot agree with the argument that this is not a fit subject to be delegated to the exclusive consideration of the Irish Legislature; and the fact that words of explanation have, at the wish of hon.

Gentlemen opposite, been added to the phrase "due process of law" goes against and not in favour of the present argument of the Mover of the Amendment. The words "due process of law" are now limited by a reference to precedents and principles, and therefore a considerable change in regard to procedure has been made by the House. Yet the House is now invited to reconsider its decision, arrived at after a long Debate, when something has been done which has been accepted on the other side as being distinctly, so far as it goes, in favour of the minority. This matter has already been amply debated. The Government are not prepared to travel over again the Debate covered by the 14 & 20 pages in Hansard, and I, myself, believe the Amendment is totally unnecessary.

MR. CARSON (Dublin University) said, the right hon. Gentleman had complained that the subject had been again brought forward, although it was previously discussed in Committee.

MR. W. E. GLADSTONE: I did not complain; I merely observed the fact.

MR. CARSON, continuing, said, the right hon. Gentleman pointed out that 14 pages of Hansard were taken up with the Debate, and then remarked that the hon. and learned Member who proposed the Amendment had done so with a lengthy explanation instead of in a brief speech. If that was not complaining, what was it? It was noticeable that whereas the right hon. Gentleman was always quite willing to discuss at considerable length, as in the case of the Second Chamber on the previous day, those safeguards which the Irish minority knew well to be no safeguards, and which were only put forward with a view to capturing constituencies at the General Election, he did not like any discussion upon those which were real safeguards. Now, he had no wish unnecessarily to protract the Debate; but he was bound to say they felt this was a matter they ought once more to press on the Government. The right hon. Gentleman had said that the Amendment would destroy the Bill; but surely it was logical that if the Irish Members were to vote upon matters relating to the liberties of Scotch and English subjects, a fortiori English and Scotch Members ought to have a similar voice in relation to Irish subjects. The matter of criminal procedure stood on a different footing to that of the great majority of subjects which should be conceded to an Irish local Legislature. It was a quasi-Imperial matter which might vitally affect subjects of the Queen in England and in Scotland as well as in Ireland, and it was entirely different from the local matters which might be transferred to the Irish Legislature. True, no person was to be deprived of life, liberty, or property, save by due process of law, in accordance with settled principles and precedents; but those principles and precedents could not be properly maintained save by reserving criminal procedure to the Imperial Parliament. He hoped the House would reconsider its decision, and make effective, at least, one of the safeguards contained in the Bill with which it was now dealing.

MR. BODKIN (Roscommon, S.) said, that remembering the action of the hon. and learned Gentleman in connection with the Coercion Act of 1887, it was certainly very interesting to hear him advocate uniformity of criminal procedure for the Three Kingdoms. It was equally interesting to hear him speak on behalf of that great safeguard of personal liberty—namely, trial by jury, which, in the cases in which it was most needed, was abolished by the right hon. Gentleman the Leader of the Opposition, and refused by the hon. and learned Member himself in certain prosecutions. The Irish people were not likely to forget the manner in which the Coercion Act was administered by the hon. Gentleman, who now, forsooth, insisted on uniformity of criminal procedure! He could assure the hon. and learned Member that no such outrage on the liberty, even of political opponents, was at all likely to be exercised by an Irish Parliament as had been practised by the Tory Party in relation to Ireland. They might with perfect safety leave the Irish Parliament to deal with the question of criminal procedure, assured that it would never be abused as it had been abused by the Tory Party.

Notice taken, that 40 Members were not present; House counted, and 40 Members being found present,

*VISCOUNT CRANBORNE (Rochester) said, he thought that the Government had no reason to complain of this matter having been brought forward now, because in Committee very urgent appeals had been made to them to allow this clause and the next clause to be postponed until they had been able to discuss Clause 9. He had ventured to point out at the time that it was almost impossible to expect the Committee to discuss adequately the excepted subjects in Clause 3 until they knew whether the Irish Members were going to be retained at Westminster or not. At the time the Government had not made up their minds on that subject, and it was quite possible that the Irish Members would have been excluded altogether. If the Irish Members had been excluded it would have very much changed the opinions of the Opposition on the question now before the House, because then there would be very much weight in the argument that it would be most unfair for Parliament to reserve complete control over Irish criminal procedure when there would not be one single Irish Member at Westminster. Therefore, if the matter had not been discussed in Committee with sufficient light it was altogether the fault of the Government. The House must now discuss the question with the knowledge that 80 Irish Members—all that Ireland was entitled to—were to be retained at Westminster for all purposes. The Opposition were, therefore, entitled to say that criminal procedure which might otherwise be necessarily referred to the Irish Parliament should be retained to the Imperial Parliament. That was no reason why no apology was needed for the introduction of the question now. Another reason would be found in the speech of the hon. Member for North Roscommon (Mr. Bodkin). That speech had thrown a lurid light on the subject-matter which the House was discussing. The hon. Member had said that criminal procedure was much safer in Irish hands than it was in the hands of the Imperial Parliament; because, as the hon. Member had said, the Leader of the Opposition had misused the powers of the Imperial Parliament in the matter of criminal procedure during the last Parliament. That was a most significant observation. The hon. Member had spoken with some heat. It was quite evident that, in his mind, those crimes against which the action of this Parliament was directed a few years ago in Ireland would remain unpunished if the Irish Parliament had control of criminal procedure. The hon. Member had said that the Leader of the Opposition had abolished trial by jury for years. That was not true. If his right hon. Friend had modified trial by jury, had allowed summary jurisdiction in certain cases, and had changed the venue in others, he did it in order to control certain gentlemen in Ireland with whom he could not but suspect the hon. Member for Roscommon had no inconsiderable sympathy. He thought that if anything was needed to convince them that the Irish Parliament were not fit to be trusted with criminal procedure, it would be found in the spirit of the hon. Member's remarks. The hon. Member evidently desired to have control of the criminal procedure, in order to save those whom in England they called criminals.

MR. BODKIN : I rise to Order. I do not think it is in Order for the noble Lord to attribute to me a desire to save criminals from being punished ; and there was nothing in my observations—in which I engaged that the Irish Parliament would not deal unjustly with its political opponents—to justify such a remark.

MR. SPEAKER : I think the hon. Gentleman has reason to complain of the noble Lord.

*VISCOUNT CRANBORNE said, he was afraid that he had expressed himself stupidly. He did not think that the hon. Member thought the persons to whom he had alluded were criminals ; but he said that the people whom the hon. Member desired to shield were, in England, criminals. But he would pass from the speech of the hon. Gentleman. It was particularly important that this Amendment should be insisted upon, because the Debate in Committee showed that the Government were not only unwilling to give control of criminal procedure to the Imperial Parliament, but were not even ready to protect the criminal procedure in the cases of those charges which had to do with the excepted subjects under Clause 4. In fact, there were an enormous number of charges which might be able to be made in the future against the Irish Government under Clause 4; and though he had moved an Amendment to protect the procedure of the Judges under Clause 4, the Government took no notice of it. It was the same with regard to the highest Court of all, the Exchequer Court. The Irish Parliament might control the criminal procedure of that Court, as the Bill stood, and therefore the Amendment was necessary in order to protect the power of the Exchequer Judges to see that justice was done in respect to the high matters committed to them. The Prime Minister had said that, at any rate, the Opposition had gained a point in regard to "due process of law." It was gained only after infinite trouble, and was a very small point after all. The Opposition had not gained anything like what justice entitled them to, or anything like what the American law gave to American subjects. So long as the Irish Parliament retained control over criminal procedure there were no protections or safeguards which the House could pass to limit that power which would be worth the paper written on. Their power over criminal procedure would enable the Irish Parliament, if they were so disposed—and there was every reason to believe they would be so disposed—to evade the restrictions in the Bill, and relieve from all penalties those who might violate the Act.

MR. RENTOUL (Down, E.) said, that the Prime Minister had called attention to the space taken up in The Parliamentary Debates by the discussion of this subject on the Committee stage of the Bill. But if the right hon. Gentleman had looked carefully through those pages of The Parliamentary Debates he would have found that about half of the entire report was taken up by the speeches of two Members of the Government—the Solicitor General and the Home Secretary. Therefore, the bulk of that Debate had been taken up by the right hon. Gentleman's own supporters. But the Opposition would have no right or desire to complain of that if the merits of the question had been dealt with by the two gentlemen who had spoken on behalf of the Government. The entire speech of the Solicitor General was on the text, which he had given out himself, that the criminal procedure of this country was wrong, and that they ought to be ashamed of it. There was not in that speech a single argument of any sort in favour of keeping this subject in the hands of the Irish Parliament. Then, again, the speech of the Home Secretary was based on trust of the Irish people. "You are trusting the Irish people in some things," said the right hon. Gentleman, "and why not trust them in this?" But the Opposition were not trusting anything at all to the Irish people; and, therefore, that argument fell to the ground. In fact, on the Committee stage they had had no real discussion of the matter, and it was now being treated by the Government in exactly the same way. It was said to be the object of the Government to give the loyal minority in Ireland some safeguards. But the Opposition had told them that the safeguards which they had given the loyal minority were, in their opinion, whether rightly or wrongly, absolutely useless. Now, when the Opposition proposed what they believed to be a real safeguard, the Government would not accept it. When the matter was discussed in Committee it was distinctly stated by the Government that the Irish Members would not be in the Imperial Parliament to vote on all subjects, and that, therefore, it would be unfair for English and Scotch Members to have the controlling power with regard to criminal procedure in Ireland. That argument, which the Opposition felt to be the strongest argument put forward by the Government, was now turned the other way. It cut exactly in the opposite direction. As matters now stood, the Irish would have the governing voice even in the criminal procedure in England and Scotland. The hon. Member for Mid Armagh had laid before the House 30 or 40 matters of the most vital importance which could not be covered by the Bill except the Amendment were accepted. If the hon. Member had referred only to one of those matters—the Law of Evidence—he would have made a sufficiently strong case. It would be very easy for the Irish Legislature to make certain changes with regard to the Law of Evidence—say that no one should be convicted in certain cases without corroborative evidence—which would allow all the untried criminals of the Land League to escape scot-free. The citizens of the Three Countries were closely interested in this matter. If there was any one thing that was an Imperial question, it was clearly this question of the liberty of the subject. The subject was not to be deprived of life, liberty, or property without due process of law. But the Irish Legislature might render that protection worthless by changing the process of law. While the hon. Member for Mid Armagh (Mr. Dunbar Barton) was speaking, the hon. Member for South Donegal (Mr. Mac Neill) interrupted and said it would be an insult and a gross injustice to the Irish people, but the hon. Member for Roscommon (Mr. Bodkin) also rose and said—"You are clamouring for uniformity of criminal procedure throughout the Three Kingdoms, and yet your Act of 1887 took away that uniformity of procedure." As he understood it, the Act of 1887 was simply applying to Ireland the procedure that existed in Scotland, and there was no reason for referring to it except that it gave the hon. and learned Member for Roscommon (Mr. Bodkin) a chance of referring to what he was pleased to call the Coercion Act. What they asked in this matter was that the criminal procedure of the United Kingdom should continue to exist in Ireland as it was at the present time. With the exception of the Whiteboy Acts and one or two minor matters the criminal procedure of the two countries was identical, and was a procedure that had secured the admiration of the bulk of the jurists of the civilised world. Nearly the whole of the works on procedure and law which were used in Ireland were written by English lawyers. When they were told by hon. Gentlemen opposite they were dealing with a purely imaginary question, he would ask them to look back to Irish history, and they would find that in 1689 an Irish Parliament changed the criminal procedure for political purposes alone. The Irish Members, with hardly an exception, had threatened their political opponents, and that being so it was natural they should desire the House to take it out of the power of these gentlemen to carry out their threats. Criminal procedure had been withheld before from subordinate Parliaments. For instance, in the British North America Act they the maximal procedure was withheld the last local Legislature; and as a significant observation, one deliberately, the civil procedure was distinctly committed to the local Legislature, whilst the criminal procedure was withheld. The United States had done exactly the same thing; therefore, there seemed to him in this clause which had been put forth a great deal to recommend it in declaring that the criminal procedure of Ireland should be in the hands of the Imperial Parliament. This Parliament had reserved to itself certain matters, as, for instance, the Foreign Enlistment Act; but it was perfectly possible for the Irish Parliament, by manipulation of its criminal procedure, to render that Act entirely useless and nugatory. The Prime Minister declined to argue the question on the ground that it had been fully dealt with on the Committee stage, and he (Mr. Rentoul) would appeal to the Home Secretary or the Solicitor General to say if he could point them to one shadow of argument in any of the speeches during that stage that dealt with the question?

*SIR E. CLARKE (Plymouth) said, he had no desire to argue upon the Report stage matters that had been discussed in Committee, and in respect to which they were now in the same position as they then were, but it appeared to him that the answer of the Prime Minister was insufficient and unsatisfactory. The right hon. Gentleman said that this matter had been fully discussed on the Committee stage of the Bill, but he omitted to notice that the answer then given was one which it was no longer possible to put forward owing to the great changes which the Government had themselves introduced into the Bill since this subject was under discussion in Committee. The Solicitor General then said that as the Irish Members would not be entitled to speak or vote upon any proposals for amending the Criminal Law of England, it would be unjust and unreasonable that this Parliament should retain the power to interfere with the Criminal Law of Ireland. The force of that answer had now entirely disappeared, and, as matters now stood, a grave alteration in the Criminal Law of Ireland might be made by the Irish Parliament without the knowledge or consent of this House; while, on the other hand, if we desired to effect in this country an improvement in our Criminal Law, the Irish Members, who would be entirely unaffected by that proposal, might come and object and even prevent the alteration. As an illustration, he might point to an alteration which, in the opinion of this House and of the House of Lords, was, above all others, the most desirable. The barbarous rule of our Criminal Law—that a person indicted for an offence was not allowed to give evidence in defence or explanation of his conduct—was, and always would remain until altered, a blot upon our law and a disgrace to our Legislature. For 22 years majorities in both Houses of this Parliament had been trying to pass Bills to remedy that defect. Why had they not been passed? Because the Irish Members had refused to allow them to pass; and even when the proposed alteration was confined to this country, the Irish Members still opposed it, on the ground that, if passed for England, a short Act of one clause might hereafter extend the alteration to Ireland. Suppose the Bill passed, what would be the position of the Irish Members? They might come and prevent the alteration of the law in this country, while they might make any change they wished in the Criminal Law in Ireland. That was an illogical position. He hoped there would be a frank willingness on the part of the Government to meet the case. He did not protest against this handing over of the Criminal Law to the exclusive control of the Irish Parliament on the ground that it would diminish the safeguards for the loyal minority, although he believed it would do so. He could not conceive how Members who had proclaimed the doctrines and avowed the sentiments that had been proclaimed and avowed by Members from Ireland would be justified in abstaining from altering the Criminal Law in Ireland and endeavouring to put that law in uniformity with their sentiments. They had said over and over again that the Criminal Law of that country ought to be in harmony with the sentiments of the people. There could be no doubt that if those who had led the Nationalist Party in this House had the control of the Irish Parliament, they would feel bound, as a matter of duty, and in consistency with the declarations they had already made, to endeavour to alter the Criminal Law in Ireland in a way a majority in this House might disapprove.

Then it was said that if the majority of the House disapproved, the House might, under Section 33 of this Bill, pass an Act setting aside the law so passed by the Irish Parliament; and, having set it aside, the Irish Parliament would have no longer authority to deal with the matter. That was true; but the remedy of passing an Act through this Parliament was a slow, difficult, and costly remedy. They knew the difficulties, and, of course, if they did, he was quite sure that the Members of the Government appreciated the difficulty at this moment of passing Bills through the House of Commons; so that it would be a slow remedy. But the ground on which he put his advocacy of this Amendment was not the ground of apprehension as to particular Acts being passed by the Irish Parliament, but was that if they were to have an Imperial Government at all which was to have effective authority in the different parts of the United Kingdom, they must have uniform criminal procedure, which should be in the hands of the Imperial Government. He did not say at this moment the Criminal Law was absolutely uniform in its procedure in all parts of the country. He conceded at once to every Scotchman or to every Englishman who had the honour to be a Scotch Member, the Scottish procedure had been put into a much better form, in many respects, than in this country; but during the time he had been in Parliament their labours had been, as far as possible, to assimilate the Criminal Law of the different countries. It had been said and made a matter of reproach to-day by the hon. and learned Member for Roscommon (Mr. Bodkin) that the law of 1887 set up a practice with regard to inquiries, where nobody was charged with an actual offence, which was not to be found in the law of England.

MR. SEXTON (Kerry, N.): It took away trial by jury.

*SIR E. CLARKE said, he would come to that in a moment; but in regard to the point he was now on, it was pointed out that it was not found in the law of this country. Why was that? Ten years ago, to a year, in the Grand Committee of this House he supported the proposal of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Bury (Sir H. James) that that rule with regard to preliminary inquiries should be incorporated in the law of this country ; they tried to put that clause into the Criminal Law Consolidation Act, for the reason that they believed it would be of enormous advantage to the Criminal Law in the prevention of crime. The hon. Member for North Kerry (Mr. Sexton) had referred to the Act of 1887, which he said enabled questions to be dealt with by Magistrates and not by juries in the trial of offences. He (Sir E. Clarke) would like to say that the Act of 1887 was never declared to be an alteration or permanent alteration of the Criminal Law.

MR. SEXTON : It was a perpetual Act.

*SIR E. CLARKE said, that was so ; but it was a perpetual Act that could be put in force from time to time when necessary ; it was putting on the Statute Book a machinery which might be used at a particular time for the purpose of dealing with a particular emergency. There was nothing in the Act that conflicted with the policy they had been acting upon for years—namely, the endeavour to make the Criminal Law alike in all countries. The administration of the Criminal Law was a matter of Imperial concern, and it was a mischievous and separating thing to have an offence criminal in one country and not in another. On those grounds he supported the Amendment that had been put forward, and he urged on the Government that this Amendment, which they were justified in resisting before, ought to be accepted now on the principle that, having submitted to the necessity of keeping the Irish Members here for all purposes, they ought to say the Criminal Law was a matter of Imperial concern and should be continued in the Imperial Parliament, which alone should deal with this important matter.

*THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE HOME DEPARTMENT (Mr. ASQUITH, Fife, E.) : My hon. and learned Friend has travelled at considerable length, and with his usual ability, over ground that was completely covered when this matter came before the Committee on this Bill. My hon. and learned Friend has sought to establish a justification for going over and over again matters that were then decided, by the suggestion that a change has since been introduced in the structure of the Bill that qualifies or mitigates the force of the arguments then used by the Government and the Opposition. What is the change ? My hon. and learned Friend says at that time the proposal of the Bill was that the Irish Members should only come and vote on matters of Imperial concern, whereas the modifications subsequently assented to in the 9th clause would enable Irish Members to come here to vote on British as well as Imperial affairs. I have looked carefully through the speeches made in Committee, and I do not find an allusion to anything of the kind. We did not base our objection to this grotesque proposal in the least degree on the fact that we were taking away from the Irish Members the power of debating criminal procedure so far as it relates to England and Scotland. The ground which we took, and which I take again now, can be stated in two or three sentences. It is absurd to give to an Irish Legislature, as you are doing by this Bill, the power of enacting a Criminal Law for Ireland and in the same breath to take away the power of enforcing that law by appropriate procedure. As to the uniformity in the law, perhaps it would be sufficient to say as between England and Scotland the greatest disparity exists, and no one will venture to get rid of it. It might, further, be sufficient to say the late Government, by the enactment to which my hon. Friend has referred, enacted a permanent and perpetual distinction between the laws of England and Ireland in relation to matters that vitally affected the liberty of the subject. But I will not take that ground, because it is not relevant to the Amendment before the House. If my hon. and learned Friend is such a strong advocate of uniformity why not propose to take away the power of legislating in respect of Criminal Law ? What would be the effect of carrying this Amendment ? You would allow the Irish Legislature to determine by Act whether a particular Act should be an offence, whether an offence should be a felony or only a misdemeanour ; you would allow them to determine whether it shall be punished by penal servitude, by imprisonment, or by death ; but you would take away the power of determining the manner in which the offence should be tried, the power of saying whether petty offences should be tried by jury or summarily before a Magistrate, the power of saying whether such-and-such persons should be competent witnesses. In other words, while you would give the Irish Legislature the principal power of legislating in relation to Criminal Law, you would take away and destroy that which is necessary to put the law in force. That is the proposition that is now seriously put before the House of Commons! It was discussed at length in Committee and rejected, and not a single argument has been adduced in the course of the Debate which should induce the House to go back on the decision of the Committee.

Question put, and negatived.

SIR J. GORST (Cambridge University) proposed the following Amendment:—

Page 2, line 15, after the word "or," to insert as a new sub-section the words "(7.) The hours and conditions of labour in factories, workshops, and mines; or."

He said: The conclusion to which I invite the House by this Amendment is that legislation relating to factories, workshops, and mines had much better be left to the Parliament of this United Kingdom, and this conclusion I base upon these premises: first, that legislation of this kind has become, or is on the point of becoming, an International matter; and, secondly, that under these circumstances it is for the advantage of the people of the United Kingdom that such legislation should be regulated by a single Parliament and not by two separate Legislatures—one for Great Britain and the other for Ireland. As regards my first premise, I suppose everybody who reads the newspapers and who is acquainted with the history of his times knows that the working classes in all the civilised countries of Europe are now taking part in a great and powerful movement, which is a movement in favour of the better conditions of labour, and more protection for the labourer, and that the direction which this movement is taking at the present moment is a demand for uniform legislation in the various civilised countries of the world, so as to make the hours and the conditions of labour generally as much alike as possible in these various countries; and it is also taking the direction of putting pressure—which sooner or later will become irresistible—upon the Governments of the various civilised countries to come together and enter into common agreement for the regulations under which machine labour and mining labour should be carried on in the various civilised countries of the world. I believe the Conference which took place at Berlin a few years ago was a mere rudimentary Conference which, hereafter, will develop into Conferences of very much more importance and of a very much wider-reaching kind. You have got the Government of Switzerland, which is entirely dominated by the interests of the labouring classes, using every possible opportunity of pushing on Conferences of this kind; and you have got the Governments of the great European countries—Germany, France, and Great Britain—every day more and more influenced by the sentiments and opinions of the working classes, and, therefore, every day driven more irresistibly into these sort of Conferences. I do not think I am indulging in the spirit of prophecy, or making any extravagant forecast of what will happen in the time to come, when I say I do not believe many years will pass over our heads before we shall have a Conference of the Governments of the great European States which will then be called upon to pledge the Legislatures of their respective countries to enter into certain broad legislative enactments with regard to the conditions under which labour should be carried on. Now, that is my first premise—that these questions of labour legislation, if they have not already become, are very rapidly becoming, matters of International concern. If I am right in that position, is it the interest of the people of the United Kingdom that they should be represented in matters of this kind by one Legislature or by two? I suppose it is not the idea of the present Home Rule scheme that Ireland should have any separate diplomatic representation, and that, therefore, in any Conference of the future you will not see Great Britain and Ireland ranged one against the other in the same way as at the Berlin Conference you saw Austria and Hungary, Sweden and Norway, Holland and Luxemburg, represented by different Delegates, taking different lines, and advocating different principles.

I suppose it is the scheme of the Home Rule Bill, as far as diplomatic representation is concerned—though very possibly some gentleman representing Ireland might be united with any British Delegate as a Representative to a foreign country, yet the representation of the United Kingdom would be still one and indivisible. But the probable result of such a Conference will be that the Delegate from the United Kingdom, of whatever elements it may consist, will have to pledge the Government of the United Kingdom to certain definite steps in the direction of legislation much more than the Berlin Conference did. The Berlin Conference did not pledge the Governments to any definite step of legislation, but merely laid down certain principles which were generally pronounced to be desirable. But this Conference will be of very little use if the Governments of the countries who are represented there do not enter into some kind of understanding or engagement that the Legislatures of the countries they represent will, on certain broad lines, conform to the general uniformity of European legislation in these subjects. I ask anybody, either an English or Irish Member, to consider what an embarrassment it would be if the Representative of Great Britain has to speak for two independent Bodies—the Legislature of Great Britain and the Legislature of Ireland? It is bad enough to pledge one Legislature in these democratic days, and any Government which enters into an undertaking that its Parliament should pass certain measures has to do so with great caution and circumspection. It is an extremely delicate matter, but how much more delicate it would be if the Representatives of the United Kingdom had to enter into any kind of undertaking as to what the Irish Legislature would do! How could they possibly carry it out? How could they speak in the Councils of Europe with the voice with which the Representatives of the United Kingdom—the greatest manufacturing and industrial country in the world—should speak if they have the knowledge and consciousness all through that there is a Legislature within the limits of their own country over which they have absolutely no control whatever. The Government know—I have no doubt hon. Members who sit on both sides of the House know —that even in such a rudimentary Conference as the Berlin Conference our own Government of India, which was not separately represented there, resisted to the utmost, and resists to the present day, the carrying out of the opinions of the Berlin Conference, and neither the late Government nor the present Government has been able to get our own Indian Government even up to line with the Resolutions of that Conference. I will just give the House one single instance which will show what I mean. There was nothing upon which the Representatives of the several industrial countries in Europe were more enthusiastically unanimous than in the prohibition of the underground labour of women in mines. There was not a single dissentient voice on the part of any Representative of any country in Europe against that proposition, which was the first of all the propositions laid down by the Berlin Conference three years ago, and yet to this day women are working regularly in the underground workings of the Indian mines. I am not quite sure that in some Government mines they have been stopped; but certainly in the Indian mines generally women are to this day working in the underground mines, and the Government of India are resisting with the utmost force they can any Indian law which will interfere with labour of that kind. That will give you an idea of the difficulty which the Government has in pledging any Legislature over which it has no absolute control. That is my second proposition—that it is much more for the interests of the United Kingdom—for the people of Ireland as well as the people of Great Britain, that in International matters of this kind the Parliament which has to deal with such matters should be a common and not separate Parliament. Let me ask the House to consider for a moment the position we shall be in in reference to legislation of this kind, because since this matter was discussed—very insufficiently, I think—in Committee, a very great and perfectly fundamental change has taken place in the Bill. It is this: that while the people of Ireland will exercise full influence in regulating the conditions of labour in factories, workshops, and mines in Great Britain, the people of Great Britain will have nothing whatever to say to regulating the conditions of labour in factories, workshops, and mines in Ireland. Without being at all offensive to Ireland, I may say that as a manufacturing people she occupies a very inferior position to that of Great Britain. It is not only that the manufactures of Ireland are much smaller and less important than those of Great Britain, but the manufacturing population of Ireland bears a much less ratio to the whole population of Ireland than the manufacturing population of Great Britain bears to the whole population of Great Britain. Therefore, you have this extraordinary anomaly: that the labour legislation of the great manufacturing country of Great Britain is to be controlled by the, comparatively speaking, agricultural population of Ireland, whereas the small and insignificant labour legislation of Ireland is not to be touched by the great manufacturing people of Great Britain. I hope this matter will be understood in Lancashire, Yorkshire, Lanarkshire, and the great centres of British industries, and that the people of these countries will be indoctrinated in the course of the controversy on this matter into the knowledge that it is no part of the scheme of the Government that their labour is to be regulated by Ireland, and that they are not to have any voice in the regulation of Irish labour. But, at any rate, I am right in saying there is one curious anomaly which exists in the case of labour legislation—that whereas the people of this country—who are so greatly interested in these labour questions—or the Representatives of the United Kingdom will settle what their conditions of labour are, that will not extend to that part of the United Kingdom—Ireland—which, not being specially a manufacturing country, is at liberty to have a peculiar law to itself. I know in times past these Labour Laws have been regulated by different countries under the idea that by a Labour Law of a particular character they would gain some economical advantage. I am a great disbeliever myself in the advantages of bad labour. Though the laws of this country are more stringent than those of most countries, I do not think our industries suffer by proper attention to women and children, and to the conditions of labour. I do not think the country suffers by it, but a great many people do. There is a great feeling on the part of many nations on the Continent that if people work long hours they will gain an economical advantage by it, and that heresy prevails in England and Ireland. A great many people think that by relaxing the attention given to women and children, by relaxing the stringent conditions under which mining and manufacturing labour is carried on in Great Britain, some economical advantages will result. How are we to feel certain that heresies of this kind may not induce the Irish Legislature, as a concession to manufacturing interests, to make some relaxation of labour legislation, some differences in the amount of protection afforded by labour legislation, which not only would be very disadvantageous to the people of Ireland, but would interfere with our acceding to that uniformity of law which the nations of Europe are likely in the coming period to demand? Again, what a disadvantage it would be to the United Kingdom if, owing to economical heresies of this kind, the law which prevails in the United Kingdom, instead of being the one general law, should become two! I have, I think, adduced reasons which ought to commend themselves to the minds both of the Government and of Members who represent Irish constituencies in this House. I confess I have put down this Amendment more as a protest upon an important matter of International interest than with any idea that practical good will come out of it. I am afraid the Government will not accept the Amendment, because they have apparently got to a period when they will only pass the Bill as it stands, and will not apply their minds to a new consideration of this character. But even if they were to accept the Amendment, I have very grave doubts as to whether it would really preserve the unity of the United Kingdom for this purpose, because if you create in two parts of the United Kingdom two separate Legislatures and two separate Executives it would be possible to help diversities of legislation and of government springing up, diversities which must inevitably lead to separate Institutions and separate laws in these great subjects. Of all the subjects outside the domain of purely Imperial subjects, there are none upon which it is more for the interest of the people of England and of Ireland that there should be one uniform law, and one Legislature which could alter that law in accordance with the requirements and sentiments of civilised peoples than this subject of factory legislation, and it is in the interests not of the people of Great Britain alone, but of the people of Ireland also, that I propose this Amendment.

Amendment proposed,

In page 2, line 15, after the word "or," to insert as a new sub-section, the words "(7.) The hours and conditions of labour in factories, workshops, and mines; or."—(Sir J. Gorst.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

MR. J. MORLEY: The right hon. Gentleman who has just sat down has made, as he always does, an extremely ingenious and interesting speech. He began by saying, and he ended by saying, that he thought uniformity of these Industrial Laws between Great Britain and Ireland was greatly to be desired, and he has urged various considerations in support of that view. But then, very shortly before he closed his speech, with that touch of cynicism which always imparts a particular flavour to all his utterances, the right hon. Gentleman said he had no hope whatever that the insertion of this, or any provision of the kind which he or his friends endeavoured to get inserted, would not have any effect in producing the very end which he has in view. I think, that being the case, he really owes some explanation to the House for having once more made over again the interesting speech which he made on the 6th June? It was the very same speech, and the very same arguments. For myself, I like what is familiar and what I have heard before; and certainly, every argument used by the right hon. Gentleman we were familiar with, for we heard them on the 6th June. We then answered his speech to the best of our ability. A good many Members of the Committee spoke upon the proposal, and the Committee divided upon it. As the right hon. Gentleman says, he hopes for nothing even from the acceptance by the Government and the House of this proposal. Why he should have taken up time, even in this interesting way, I cannot for the life of me conceive. I cannot consent to go over the grounds which were covered by the right hon. Gentleman, and to which we replied on the former occasion. The right hon. Gentleman says that there is one change which has taken place in the position since we last discussed this proposal. He says now he and his friends, or anybody who is so minded, will go down to the English and Scottish constituencies and will point out to them that the Irish Members will be able in their own country to make their own Factory and Mining Laws, and so forth, and that they will also be able, perhaps, to have a casting vote in making the Industrial Laws for Great Britain. For my part, I am not the least afraid of any demonstration of that kind when we remember what the right hon. Gentleman appears to have forgotten, that in the discussions in Committee it was precisely the Representatives of English and Scottish labour in this House who were most decided in opposition to the proposal which the right hon. Gentleman then made, and which he now makes again. The English labouring class have never found the Irish Members or the Irish National Party hostile or even cold to their claims or their interests; therefore, that new point which the right hon. Gentleman made—and the only new point, I think—we are not at all afraid of. I am in accord with very much the right hon. Gentleman has said upon the desirableness of our Empire, as a whole, if it were possible, being represented at one of these great International Conferences which I quite agree with him in thinking likely to become more and more frequent. It would be a great advantage we should represent as great a force and consensus of opinion and purpose as possible; but then I must remind him that we have not been able to secure identity of action and purpose in our own Colonial Governments—the Indian Government, for example—and there is no reason to hope we shall be more successful in obtaining that identity of action in the future than we have been in the past. The position of the right hon. Gentleman is this: that for the sake of some speculative, remote, and contingent advantage to be derived from a single representation at one of these Conferences you are to commit the absurdity of requiring the Irish Legislature to make laws for good government in its own country, and yet they are to make no laws as to public health, workshops, mines, and so forth. Surely the right hon. Gentleman is far too acute not to see that the position is an absurd one, and I would point out to hon. Gentlemen opposite that if they support the Amendment of the right hon. Gentleman they will have to do it upon grounds the exact opposite or absolutely different from those which they took up in supporting the Amendment of the hon. and learned Member for Harrow (Mr. Ambrose). The point urged by the hon. and learned Member for Deptford (Mr. Darling) and others in support of that Amendment was that you were willing to concede to Ireland full power of carrying out her own purpose and her own interest in all these purely local matters, and yet almost the next vote you are asked to give is to take away from Ireland the power of making laws in those very matters which have any special concern for her interests.

MR. HANBURY (Preston) said, very few Amendments to the Bill had been moved which were more important, and in which a keener interest was felt in the Lancashire constituencies than in this particular Amendment. He could quite understand the right hon. Gentleman did not attach very much importance to it, because they knew that in those constituencies Gladstonian candidates had great difficulty in reaching any position near the head of the poll. What his constituents, amongst others, complained of was the uncertainty in which this question was left by the Government. The Government contended that there was no possibility of the Irish Legislature making any new laws on this subject. If so, why did not the Government boldly stand by their opinions and put a clause into the Bill forbidding the Irish Parliament to interfere in these matters? The Government next asked—“What was the necessity for doing anything of the sort? Ulster had been able to compete with England under the same Factory Laws that existed for all the United Kingdom; and if Ulster had been able to do so, why should not other portions of Ireland, which have at least equal advantages with Ulster?” As regarded Ulster, he was not sure that the power to increase the hours and alter the conditions of labour would not have a bad effect; but, at any rate, it would unsettle the whole conditions under which labour in the Ulster factories was carried on. The Chief Secretary seemed to think that the right hon. Member for the Cambridge University (Sir J. Gorst) had taken up a very illogical position in proposing this Amendment, and, at the same time, admitting that if introduced into the Bill it would not have much practical effect. But that was because they looked on the whole Bill as so ridiculous that they believed that whatever safeguards were inserted they would have no effect. The Government, however, took the opposite view, and that was all the more reason they should accept this Amendment, which was designed to protect English manufacturers and traders. The right hon. Gentleman said that the Labour Members spoke strongly on this subject before; but he did not think the hon. Member for Battersea (Mr. J. Burns), who spoke upon it, could be regarded as one who was able to speak on behalf of the people of Lancashire. They had no reason to suppose that Ireland would follow the example of England in this matter than the operatives of the Continent, and it was to be remembered that the suggestions which had been made by the hon. Member for Battersea applied to the old trades, but would not be so applicable to the new industries that would spring up in Ireland. The hon. Member said, in opposition to his statement, that they should organise to meet any difficulties that might arise; that Ireland had a right to make up leeway for the loss which had been caused by the policy of England. That looked as if the hon. Member thought that Ireland would do something to improve her industries. He (Mr. Hanbury) would venture to point out the natural way under this Bill for improving local industry was by an extension of the hours of labour. That appeared to him to be the only equitable course, and it was one that was likely to be adopted in Ireland. When the Amendment was previously before the House, the Prime Minister said that it was of vital importance that there should be a uniformity of Commercial Law throughout the Three Kingdoms. It would, perhaps, be uniform for the higher classes of commerce; but for the working classes there was to be no protection. It was not to be the same for them, and that was a grievance which they in Lancashire felt very keenly indeed. The inequality was one which should not exist, and he hoped it would be removed. The right hon. Gentleman argued the matter as if it were purely a local one. They said it was not purely local; so far from that, it were very largely an International matter. Surely, then, it was a matter that affected the United Kingdom! He was not going to touch upon the representation of this country at any International Conference of Labour; but he could say that a very strong feeling existed among the operatives of Lancashire at this moment. Those operatives had two objects before them—(1) to get higher wages; (2) to get shorter hours. As long as long hours of labour existed on the Continent it would be difficult for English trade to increase, and, therefore, difficult for the operatives to obtain the objects they had in view. What, then, would they say at having rivals in Ireland able to use those long hours of labour in the same way as they were being used in Continental countries? Not only would they have a rivalry set up in Ireland, but they would have a bad example shown to the Continent in respect of the shortening of hours of labour. He repeated, it was a local matter; it was a matter affecting English operatives, and they were not now likely to consider the proposal favourably when they reflected upon the circumstances under which it was foisted upon them. They would suffer very keenly, because they would have to contribute a vast sum to Ireland, while the legislation in regard to the Customs would affect them materially; and, again, they would have no voice whatever in regard to Irish factory hours, although 80 Irish Members would be sent to Westminster with a voice in the making of Labour Laws for England. A system of this character was an injustice to the British operatives, and yet the right hon. Gentleman would tell them that it was entirely a local matter! That being so, he thought the question was worthy of re-consideration. It was one, as he had said, upon which they felt very keenly, and, although the right hon. Gentleman might not feel any interest in it, it was their duty as the Representatives of these operatives to see that justice was done to them.

SIR F. S. POWELL (Wigan) said, he might be allowed as a native of Lancashire to say a few words upon this question. He would deprecate, in the most respectful language, the claim set up by certain hon. Members to represent the operatives and the labouring classes. They were all returned to Parliament by the same suffrage, and, therefore, they all represented, to a greater or less degree, the operatives and workpeople in their respective districts. As regarded the general question of factory labour, public opinion, as a whole, was, undoubtedly, sound; but he did not look upon public opinion as to factory hours as unanimous. On the contrary, he found that in Lancashire and in the industrial districts of Yorkshire there was a stronger feeling against the present restriction of hours than was in accord either with his sentiments or his wishes. He was not going back to the Berlin Conference to draw any inferences from what then took place. But he would point out that the Lancashire operatives, looking across the water, found that longer hours existed on the Continent, and they regarded with great jealousy the manufacturers who took their capital from England and invested it in Saxony, France, or Germany. The operatives could not see without jealousy that those who competed with them worked longer hours, and that their powers of production were superior. He was speaking now from the point of view of the operative. At the Berlin Conference England was greatly in advance of foreign nations. Since that time a Factory Act had been passed of a wholesome character, and the right hon. Member for Bury (Sir H. James) had a Bill in hand on the subject. But, although there might have been some advance on the Continent the disparity still continued, and he did not, himself, believe that the time was near when there would be equality of conditions of labour in this country as distinguished from the Continent. In India the workpeople were employed for longer hours, and he could tell them that there was a strong feeling upon that point in Lancashire. He found from documents and from inquiry that relaxation did a great deal to weaken and impair factory legislation. That was principally the case in Switzerland, as could be ascertained from the documents connected with the Berlin Conference. This was a point that affected them. The English operatives felt alarmed lest the Irish Legislature should fall back upon what was done in these other countries. A question arose in the mind of the English operative that this was as likely to occur in Ireland as in any other country. Then there was the question of the sanitary condition of factories. He would not object to this question being entrusted to an Irish Legislature; but that he felt great doubt that, even if the Irish Legislature maintained the law as it was in this country, there would be a laxity of administration, and the sanitary condition of factories in Ireland would become greatly inferior to the condition of the Yorkshire and Lancashire factories. He feared that if the framing and administration of the law on this subject were left to the Irish Parliament and Executive, there would be a falling off in the condition of the Irish operatives, and that the less prosperous of them might take refuge in England. This might lead to great jealousy and a recurrence of the severe, painful, and demoralising conflicts which took place years ago. He remembered those conflicts which took place in his earlier days in the Counties of Lancashire and Yorkshire, and he hoped that they would do nothing which would bring about the return of such feelings as were then excited.

*MR. MICHAEL AUSTIN (Limerick, W.) said, the right hon. Gentleman (Sir J. Gorst) seemed to have a great distrust of the Irish Legislature; he was not willing that it should have any power at all. In that he carried out the view of his colleagues. But if they looked at this question as affecting the interests of this country, surely they would see that no Party had been more ardent supporters of legislation relating to the interests of the English working classes than the Irish Party. No one would venture to deny that they had spoken and voted in favour of every Act of the kind that had been proposed. Therefore, the suggestion that the Irish Legislature would pass laws to extend the hours of labour was absurd and ridiculous. It was said that Ulster was contented with the present system. Why, there was no part of Ireland to which it was more necessary to have some attention paid in regard to this question. In Belfast the state of things was not satisfactory. As a Member of the Royal Commission on Labour, he was aware of the facts that had been laid before that Commission on the question of wages and the hours of work in Belfast. The wages there, as a result of the system that was adopted, were lower than in England and Scotland. It was said by the Member for Preston (Mr. Hanbury) that a crushing blow would be dealt to English industry if this question were handed over to an Irish Legislature. He could say, as an Irish Representative of labour, that he was intimately acquainted with the cotton factory operatives of Lancashire, and in every district with which he was acquainted they hoped that this question would be left to the Irish Legislature. ["Oh, oh!"] The Member for Preston said, "Oh, oh!" but he had not come into contact with the operatives as closely as he (Mr. Austin) had. The Secretary of the Cotton Operatives Organisation (Mr. Mawdsley) would testify to the truth of what he had said. English workers need have no fear that their fellow-workers would be crushed by the Irish Legislature. As he had said, the Irish Members had in this House always spoken and voted in favour of any action or movement that tended to lift the English workers up, and they would act in a similar way towards the workers in their own country. The same laws that prevailed in England would prevail in Ireland. There would be no attempt to reverse those laws; on the contrary, the Irish Legislature would co-operate with them in promoting the interests, which were identical, of the workers of Ireland and Great Britain.

*SIR H. JAMES (Bury, Lancashire): As a Member for a Lancashire constituency, I should be content to leave the statement of the case by hon. Gentlemen opposite where it is; but my attention is attracted to the words addressed to the House by the hon. Member for Limerick (Mr. M. Austin). In the last four years I have been in pretty constant communication with the Textile Factory operatives, especially within my own constituency. I also am intimately acquainted with Mr. Mawdsley, and I do not believe that either the operatives of Lancashire or Mr. Mawdsley would be willing to leave to the Irish Legislature the power of giving preferential hours of labour. Well, Sir, I do not much fear giving power to the Irish Legislature to deal with the machinery or the sanitary condition of factories. I think they should have that power. But I object to power being given to impose preferential conditions—I object to that being given to one part of the United Kingdom, irrespective of other parts. The operatives themselves have cheerfully accepted a limitation of their hours of labour, but they have never accepted the view that that limitation should exist in one factory and not in another. And what is the difference where the line of limitation is to be between England and Ireland or between Lancashire and Yorkshire? The capital employed in one or other of the counties, if you take Lancashire and Yorkshire, would have a great and predominant power of competition, so that the labourer might be paid higher wages than in the other county, where the operative would be placed at an undue disadvantage. If that is what would be the case as between Lancashire and Yorkshire, what would be the effect upon competition between England and Ireland? I should like to hear what hon. Members from these counties who sit behind the Government have to say upon this question. Meanwhile, I would ask the Chief Secretary whether, if the Amendment were modified, and if it were simply stated in the Bill that there should be no interference with the hours of labour affecting competition with the United Kingdom, would the Government consent to that? Or is it to be taken as the intention of the Government that the Irish Government should have the power of maintaining free trade in hours of labour, whilst restrictions are maintained in England? This is not a matter of prejudice. It is a matter of fair practical business. Do the Government intend to give the Irish Legislature the power of making Ireland a favoured nation and a place of favoured competition, or do they wish that the hours of labour, which means competition, to be on terms of equality? This is an Imperial question—a general question, at any rate. Working men throughout the United Kingdom ought to be on terms of equality. That is all we ask. It cannot be an insult to the Irish people to say that they shall not compete unfairly with English operatives. If I cannot induce the Government to accept this Amendment I will try and barter with them. I should be willing to give up the exclusion of the Irish Legislature to deal with trade marks and merchandise marks in exchange for the acceptance of this Amendment. I think I know what the Lancashire people will feel upon this subject, and I believe that the views I have expressed to the House are those entertained by the Lancashire operatives, who will, I fancy, strongly object to any unfair competition that may be invoked. As the matter seems to interest the hon. Member for Shipley, I would say that there is not likely to be any competition between Bradford and Ireland such as there will be between Lancashire and Ireland.

*MR. BYLES (York, W.R., Shipley) said, he rose in response to the right hon. Gentleman (Sir H. James), who, speaking on behalf of the Lancashire operatives, told the House that if the Yorkshire operatives were permitted to work for 74 hours per week, while the operatives in Lancashire were restricted to 54 hours, the latter would feel that they had a great grievance. Speaking for the Yorkshire end of the stick, he (Mr. Byles) replied that if the Yorkshiremen did manage to gain a limitation of their hours to 54 per week they would not envy their neighbours in Lancashire who were to work 74 hours. He listened with some attention to the speeches of the hon. Member for Preston (Mr. Hanbury) and the hon. Baronet (Sir F. Powell), in the hope of discovering whether they were really speaking for the operatives in the manufacturing part of Lancashire, or in the interests of the manufacturers themselves, and he was unable to believe that they really had the interests of the operatives at heart. Throughout the whole of the Debate there had been an assumption that if the question of hours in factories was left to an Irish Parliament, in all probability the hours would be extended. He did not see why such an assumption should be made, and he suggested that it was equally fair, and far more reasonable, to assume that an Irish Parliament would shorten the hours of labour. If an Irish Parliament were to differentiate in the matter of hours as regarded this country and Ireland, the difference was likely to be more beneficial to workmen in Ireland, in respect both of hours and conditions of labour. One of the advantages which he was looking for from the formation of an Irish Parliament was that they would have what Lord Rosebery called "experimental legislation." He had no doubt that there would be some valuable experimental legislation in regard to landlords, and he was looking forward to some valuable experiments in regard to factories. In this country there was a strong agitation going on in favour of an eight hours' day; but he supposed that no one who had any experience of the slow growth of social questions in this country before they ripened into legislation would look forward to the attainment of that Utopia to working men without believing that a long time must elapse before it was attained. But in Ireland it was perfectly possible that, with a small country, a small population, and a small Parliament, an experiment of the kind might be tried in a very short time, and it would be a valuable experience for Great Britain to watch and see if it would be wise or unwise to adopt a similar policy here. He would make only one other general observation. They had been engaged for many months in trying to pass this Home Rule Bill, and they had decided to give certain powers to the proposed Irish Parliament. Every Amendment—and this like the rest—was directed to take away piecemeal those powers. For that reason, as well as for those which he had previously stated, he intended to oppose the Amendment. The Home Rule that they were to give to Ireland was of a restricted and moderate kind, and they ought not to begin to whittle away by Amendments of this kind every power which they had entrusted to an Irish Parliament.

MR. WOLFF (Belfast, E.) said, that as one connected with the manufacturers in the North of Ireland, he desired to say a few words on the Amendment. A great deal had been said as to the tendency of an Irish Parliament to lengthen the hours of labour, so as to put English manufacturers at a disadvantage in the competition. If he thought that would be the case, and that the result would be to make goods cheaper, he should be the last man to oppose such an Amendment. But he did not think that anything of the sort was likely to take place. So far as the skilled trades of the country were concerned, such as engineers, joiners, and all men connected with the shipbuilding trade, all the men who were worth having belonged to Trade Unions, which embraced all parts of the United Kingdom, and were too powerful to be overridden by an Irish Legislature. Of course, there remained a large number of operatives engaged in the textile trades: but he did not think that even they were at all likely to come into competition with those of England. There was little linen manufacture in Scotland, and none in England. The competitors with Ireland were on the Continent; and the Irish Legislature was not likely to try to compete with them, at all events, by increasing the hours of labour. The Irish Legislature would be largely returned by agriculturists, who would have little to do with manufactures, and who would be likely to favour short hours and high wages irrespective of the interests of manufacturers. An hon. Member opposite said that if the Irish Legislature did interfere with the conditions of labour, it would prove a valuable experiment for England. Well, England was going to do a great deal for Ireland by granting Home Rule; but Ireland was not likely to return the compliment by making experiments at her own cost for the benefit of England. The hon. Member for Limerick (Mr. M. Austin) had spoken of the condition of the working classes in Belfast, declaring that they received low wages. But the condition of the working classes should not be gauged by the amount of money paid to them at the end of the week. The cost of living, the cost of land, and the general condition of the community had to be considered; and, taking these circumstances into view, he believed the people in the North of Ireland were as well off as they were in Lancashire. Wages, after all, were merely a question of supply and demand for the manufactured goods. But in spite of all this he intended to vote for the Amendment. There ought to be no difference in any legislation relating either to manufacturing or commercial matters generally between Great Britain and Ireland. The United Kingdom was not so very large that it could be divided into districts with different laws for each district. There were differences, no doubt, between England and Ireland; but that was a matter to be regretted, and they should try to avoid increasing the evil in this Bill. It was proposed that the Irish people should have 80 Representatives in that House, and they would, therefore, have a voice in any legislation on those subjects. As he was afraid that legislation on questions affecting manufactures by people who were not familiar with such legislation would be more likely to do harm than good, and as he was most anxious that the laws of the Three Kingdoms in reference to those matters should be as far as possible uniform, he would support the Amendment.

MR. OLDROYD (Dewsbury) said, that the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Bury (Sir H. James) had spoken on this matter as representing the operatives of Lancashire. It seemed rather strange that in this matter the cotton operatives of Lancashire should have such extreme fears of competition on the part of Irishmen, for the cotton trade was one in regard to which Ireland, at the present moment, did not compete with England at all. That trade did not exist in Ireland, and it would have to undergo all the vicissitudes and expense of establishing itself before it could compete with the operatives of Lancashire. He now desired to say a few words with reference to the woollen industry. As regarded that industry, there was considerable competition between the North of England and Ireland, and though it was increasing he did not say it was very formidable. During the last few years very considerable advances had been made, both in respect of the amount of woollen fabrics produced in Ireland and the quality of the workmanship. But he did not entertain any fears from a limitation of the hours in Ireland. He and those interested in the woollen industry believed that the present hours were long enough, not only for the operatives personally, but for the real and effective power of the industry concerned. As regarded the cotton industry, and the opinion expressed on behalf of the operatives of Bury, he might say that, although this matter had been before the House in Committee, he had not received any communication from a single member of his constituency expressing any fear on the subject whatever; and he did not believe there was the slightest apprehension that any evil could possibly arise from legislation as to the hours of labour which might be enacted by an Irish Parliament.

SIR A. ROLLIT (Islington, S.) said, the right hon. Member for Bury (Sir H. James) had made a generous offer on behalf of his constituents which he (Sir A. Rollit) did not think he would find many other Members ready to make. As a Yorkshireman, and as also representing a Metropolitan constituency—London being the great distributing centre—he should be very sorry, and the London Chamber of Commerce also would be indisposed, to sacrifice our trade-mark arrangements and merchandise marks for any advantage that might accrue from the present or any other proposal. He did not know anything which more tended to illustrate the advantage of uniformity than our legislation with regard to trade-marks. They had the effect of binding all parts of the Empire together, and of inducing a very large amount of that national action and protection which otherwise would be hardly possible, and he ventured to say that that very example should be one of the chief inducements to hon. Members to support the Amendment. The whole tendency of the times in commercial matters was towards more uniformity than had existed in the past. For his own part, he thought that uniformity in reference to the Labour Laws should, from a commercial point of view, have the approval of the House. Of course, he spoke of uniformity in countries where the conditions were similar. He granted that in the case of India there might be room for difference of opinion; but that did not exist in regard to England and Ireland, there being no variations in practice. He had been surprised to hear from the hon. Member for Wigan (Sir F. S. Powell) some aspersions on Irish manufacturers; but he was able to say from his own experience that there were in Donegal factories which, as regarded the health of their inmates, the methods and processes employed, and the general conduct of their business, would compare favourably with many institutions of a similar character in this country. He did not distrust the Irish Legislature in dealing with those matters; but he was bound to remember when Ireland had a Legislature of her own an attempt was made by bounties and rebates and the like to attack the industries of this country in order to support those of Ireland. He could conceive nothing more fatal to the commercial future of Ireland than the repetition of anything of that kind. It was most important that in economical matters regulating trades and industries the action of the Legislature should be as far as possible uniform, and that that uniformity should be maintained. It was said that if the Amendment were carried the operatives of this country and of Ireland would be liable to suffer; but he did not think that the operatives would be dependent on the Parliament of either the one country or the other. For his own part, he believed that the Trades Unions exercised the chief influence in the matter. The hon. Member for Shipley said that experiments as to the working of the new economic system might be tried; but he failed to see why Ireland should be the corpus vile for the experiments of this country. Those who spoke of an eight hours day as a working man's Utopia which was not likely to come about did not rightly read the signs of the times, having regard to what had taken place at the Berlin Conference. Legislation on that question was not at all unlikely. As he believed that the commercial interests of the two countries were joint he should support the Amendment.

MR. TOMLINSON (Preston) said, they could wish for nothing better to go to their constituents with than the statement of the Chief Secretary that it was the intention of the Government to give the Irish Legislature power to deal with factory legislation as they thought fit. He believed that when this matter was put before the constituencies, particularly of Lancashire, the Opposition would have all the operatives and workers on their side.

MR. J. CHAMBERLAIN: This raises a matter in which my constituents are greatly interested, as there is a considerable trade between Birmingham and Ireland. I would point out that this raises a different class of consideration to that which has been raised by other Amendments. In previous Amendments we have desired to protect ourselves against possible abuse by the Irish Parliament. That is not the case here. It is not a case of abuse of the powers which might be conferred on the Irish Legislature; but the object of the Amendment is to insure uniformity in legislation with respect to matters in which uniformity is specially desirable. I cannot understand why the Government should not be consistent in this matter. They have, yielding, I believe, to pressure from the Opposition, agreed to include merchant shipping in the restrictions which they have made on the Irish Legislature. Why, therefore, should there be no uniformity? Why should they exclude merchant shipping and include factory legislation? The two things stand on the same footing. As regards the feeling which exists among the working people of Birmingham in this matter, I can say they have two fears in respect of it. The first is that it may be possible for the Irish Legislature, in order to stimulate a particular trade or industry, to repeal some restriction which has been imposed upon trade of this country in order to enable it to be carried on in Ireland. Another objection is that we are not dealing only with legislation as it exists at present, but with possible future legislation. Whenever working people come to this House and ask for legislation in any way restricting the action of their employers, they are always told—"Take care what you are doing, because you will be at a disadvantage with regard to foreign competition." But in future this addition would be made—"Take care that you do not put yourselves at a disadvantage with regard to the competition from Ireland, because there is no certainty that this legislation which you are seeking to promote in England will be followed by the Irish Legislature." That argument will be used with great force against any proposal by the working people of this country for any fresh factory legislation; and it is upon that ground, as well as upon the ground of fear of what may happen in regard to existing legislation, that my constituents, and, at any rate, the working men with whom I have had the opportunity of talking on the subject, object very strongly to having two sets of factory legislation in the United Kingdom. I appeal to the Prime Minister, if he will not accept the Amendment, at all events to justify the anomaly of refusing to give the Irish Legislature the power of dealing with merchant shipping or factories at sea, whilst he gives it the power of dealing with factories on land.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I do not know whether the right hon. Gentleman opposite proposes to respond to the appeal which my right hon. Friend has just made before the Debate closes. As he did not rise, I availed myself of the opportunity of making the few observations that I think it necessary to lay before the House on the present occasion. The Chief Secretary has accused the right hon. Member who moved the Amendment of repeating arguments that were employed on a previous occasion. I cannot make a retort on the Government, because I cannot find out that on a previous occasion they used any arguments at all. I gathered from the tone of the Chief Secretary's speech that this question had been thoroughly threshed out in Committee; that the Government had replied to all the arguments; and that it was unnecessary for them to meet again a case which they had met so effectually on a previous occasion. Well, Sir, my memory is not very good in this matter; but I taxed myself in vain to find any record of the wonderful arguments used by the Government in Committee. The only speech delivered by a Member of the Government was a speech by the President of the Board of Trade, which did not fill a column in Hansard. As a matter of fact, the Government have not, either in Committee nor on the present occasion, faced the problem, or even touched the fringe of the question raised. That alone would afford ample justification for the raising of this question again, even though it appears we are not to be more successful than we were in June in extracting from the Government an adequate reply. It is evident that the Government think silence the most judicious policy, and, from their point of view, I am not sure that they are not right. I cannot deal in these few remarks with the Government case, because I am in ignorance of what it is. I can make some observations on what I have heard from various Members in the course of the Debate. The Chief Secretary argued that we cannot consistently vote for this Amendment, because we supported the Amendment of the hon. and learned Member for Harrow (Mr. Ambrose), which purported to give to Ireland the management of her own affairs in certain branches of Departmental administration. The right hon. Gentleman never looked at the Amendment, for he completely overlooked the fact that the hon. and learned Member for Harrow deliberately excluded from his Amendment the Home Secretary's functions, and it is the Home Secretary who is alone charged with the particular administrative duties which we are dealing with in the Amendment. Whatever value there might have been in the tu quoque, had it been well-founded, there is, as a matter of fact, no foundation at all for it. At present the Home Secretary is supreme in regard to all inspection in England, Scotland, and Ireland. The inspection of factories and workshops in Ireland does not come under the survey of the Chief Secretary. He has nothing to do with it; he does not appoint the Inspectors, and it is not to him that the Reports are addressed. When you pass this Bill, if you pass it without this Amendment, and without the consequent changes the Amendment would require, you take away from the Home Secretary the whole regulations respecting factories and workshops, and you throw the responsibility, and, what is more, the cost upon the new Irish Legislature. I want to know what hope there is that that Legislature will operate effectively the very costly machinery we have devised for looking after factories and workshops? It has been mentioned by some gentlemen in this Debate that the Legislature in Ireland would represent a purely agricultural constituency, and would not be interested in manufacturing questions. The number of the manufacturing population is comparatively trifling in proportion to the whole population, and of this fraction of the population a very small proportion are in harmony with the political opinions of the majority. I think it is, under the circumstances, a perfectly vain hope for us to entertain that under the new Irish Legislature the existing and most costly system of inspection of factories and workshops can be continued, or that any proper system can be substituted for it. Several of my right hon. and hon. Friends have, speaking for the manufacturing districts they represent, stated that the utmost jealousy existed as to the course which might be taken by the Irish Legislature, or, what is still more important, which the Irish Legislature might abstain from taking. That was replied to, in the first place, by one of the Members for Belfast, who said he thought questions of wages and laws were not really settled by legislation in the trade with which he was acquainted, but entirely depended on the Trades Unions. I do not doubt at all that Trades Unions have a very great, and, I dare say, extremely beneficial power in Belfast, as in other towns; but they probably only affect wages over a very restricted area, especially as my hon. Friend says wages are lower in Belfast than in parts of England and Scotland.

MR. WOLFF said, his remarks about Trades Unions and length of hours had applied to skilled trades. The trades in which wages were lower were unskilled trades.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: That was the interpretation I was disposed to put on what my hon. Friend said. Therefore, we have it on my hon. Friend's own authority that, as a matter of fact, the Trades Unions cannot be relied upon to produce uniformity. The hon. Member for Dewsbury (Mr. Oldroyd) said that Ireland was competing with him in the woollen trade, but that he was not afraid of Ireland, and did not desire to maintain uniformity, as he did not think that any disparity of condition between England and Ireland would inflict any injury whatever on the trade he represents.

MR. OLDROYD was understood to say that he did not refer to the future, but to the present state of things.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I do not say that wages are the same, or that hours are the same, in Great Britain and Ireland; but I do say that factory legislation is the same, and I say that, in so far as factory legislation of whatever kind operates as one of the conditions of production, making it more less costly, you undoubtedly may have differences introduced which could not be introduced under your present system. It has been said it is an error to suppose that short hours mean defective production, and that it would not pay the Irish Legislature to permit an increase of the hours of their workmen, because no commercial or manufacturing advantage would thereby accrue to Irish productions. I must firmly hold the faith that the shortening of the hours of labour in very many instances has not only not diminished the effectiveness of capital and labour, but has actually augmented the effectiveness of both. But I think it would be an extravagant conclusion to draw from that general doctrine that no restriction that might be made would, to some extent, hamper the capitalist and merchant. I think it quite possible that some restrictions in the hours of labour ought and probably would be made; but if such restrictions are made they ought to apply equally to the Three Kingdoms, and not to England and Scotland only, to the exclusion of Ireland. The contention of the Government is that the Irish Legislature would never attempt to repeal the existing factory legislation, or to do any thing to injure the English workmen. I grant that; but I ask whether it is probable that the restrictions which we in this country think desirable would be extended to Ireland? The Irish farmers would say to themselves—"Our industries are infant industries—industries of tender years, delicate and somewhat sickly—and if we apply these robust remedies to them, we shall kill them, instead of curing them.” That being so, the 80 Representatives of Ireland would vote in favour of the restriction of the hours of labour in this country, and would abstain from carrying out that principle in Ireland. I think that the Government have made a double mistake in this matter. They have made the mistake of not answering the questions that have been put to them on this subject, and the mistake of framing the Bill as they have done. I believe there is no part of the Bill that will be better understood by the British workmen than the portion of it that is now under discussion. As to the workmen of this country being satisfied with the argument put into the mouth of the Chief Secretary, and with the assurance that the Irish Members have always shown themselves sympathetic with the claims of labour, I say that the workmen of Great Britain are not so idiotic as not to be able to perceive that when those Members have to deal in Ireland with their own affairs their sympathy will be with the Irish, and not with the English industries, and that may lead to very different results. I think it would be in vain to ask the Government to throw any further light on the question; and I will, therefore, conclude by saying that I shall undoubtedly vote for the Amendment.

MR. JESSE COLLINGS (Birmingham, Bordesley) said, that since this question had been before the Committee he had spoken to many working men and representatives of Trade Unions both in England and in Belfast, and he had found that English working men would scarcely believe that they were to be subjected to such legislation as might be imposed upon them with the assistance of the Irish Members in the Imperial Parliament, whilst a different kind of legislation altogether might be adopted by the Irish Legislature for the working classes of Ireland. When they had asked for the reasons for such a state of things, he and others had been obliged to say that the Government had given no reasons. That answer must continue to be given, unless some Member of the Government would now get up and defend the proposal of the Bill. The hon. Member for East Belfast (Mr.

Wolff) had said that the Trades Unions in Ireland were all powerful to settle these matters; but he would remind the hon. Member that Trades Unionists in Ireland were only powerful to the extent to which they co-operated with the Trades Unionists of Great Britain. If this Bill passed and the Irish Unionists were left to their own resources, they would be positively an insignificant Body when opposed to the great voting power of the rest of Ireland. He was anxious to see how the Representatives of labour were going to vote on that Division, because if the Bill were allowed to stand as it was it would amount to a virtual abandonment by British Trades Unionists of the Trades Unionists of Ireland. He had been told by men who stood high in the Trades Unions in Belfast that if they were once forsaken by the Trades Unionists of Great Britain they would have no power whatever, but would be subjected to any kind of regulation which the Irish Parliament chose to impose upon them. Two questions were involved in this Amendment; one was the welfare of the British operatives, and the other the welfare of the Irish operatives. The only defence of this part of the Bill in Committee was given by the President of the Board of Trade (Mr. Mundella), who said that the reason why the woollen trade was making way in Ireland was that wages were so low in that country. If, however, in addition to the difference in the wages, hours were made longer in Ireland than in England, or the restrictions with regard to women's and children's labour were done away with, or the expensive restrictions now put upon manufacturers abolished, these things would represent a good deal more than a difference of a few shillings a week in wages. Those who voted against the Amendment would vote against the best interests of the British workmen and against the best interests of the Irish operatives as far as health and convenience went. This was a question that was more largely talked about in the British constituencies than the Government seemed to think, and people would not believe that such a difference in legislation was really intended. It would take the vote that was about to be given to convince the British workman that the Government was forcing upon them the great injustice contemplated by the Bill.

Question put.

MR. COURTNEY (Cornwall, Bodmin) said, he wished to secure the omission, from line 16, of the words "or quarantine," his object being to leave this subject in the power of the Irish Legislature. He did not think it necessary to speak upon it at any length ; but he would point out that quarantine largely depended on local circumstances, and there was no necessity for uniform regulations throughout the United Kingdom. This was, therefore, a subject which might reasonably be left to the Irish Legislature to deal with.

Amendment proposed, in page 2, line 16, to leave out the words "or quarantine."—(Mr. Courtney.)

Question proposed, "That the words 'or quarantine' stand part of the Bill."

MR. J. MORLEY : I do not quite understand my right hon. Friend's motive in moving this Amendment. The word "quarantine" is a somewhat ambiguous phrase. It might mean the execution by Customs officers of certain regulations as to cholera, yellow fever, and other diseases coming from foreign countries, or it might mean, in a looser sense, the regulations made and executed by the Local Authority as to other diseases under its ordinary sanitary powers. The Government do not intend to exclude from Irish legislation sanitary regulations made by Sanitary Authorities ; but they are bound, from their conception of the position of Ireland in relation to foreign countries, to adhere to the exclusion of "quarantine" in its true sense from the legislative power of the Irish Government.

MR. COURTNEY : Why ?

MR. J. MORLEY : Because those regulations affect other countries as well as Ireland ; and, as they may have to be applied to foreigners and foreign ships, it is not right that the dealing with them should be left to the Irish Legislature.

*SIR C. W. DILKE (Gloucester, Forest of Dean) said, the law of quarantine must be looked upon as virtually extinct in this country ; and it would be a mistake to spend much time in discussing the question, as some years ago it was decided that in future quarantine should not be enforced in this country as regarded cholera. It still remained, as regarded yellow fever, under the Privy Council, which had no staff for the execution of its powers, and the Local Government Board had control over all the arrangements at ports with regard to the importation of cholera and every other disease. In Ireland the Irish Local Government Board had similar powers. In this matter we were not bound by any engagements with Foreign Powers, and really the whole subject was one of antiquarian interest only.

MR. GIBSON BOWLES (Lynn Regis) said, the right hon. Baronet was mistaken in asserting that the quarantine law was practically extinct ; so far from it being so in this country, there was a Vote of £1,500 on the Estimates this year for the maintenance of the quarantine station at the Motherbank. He was no friend of quarantine ; he believed it did more harm than good ; but if harm was to be done let it be done by all means by the Irish Government, and not by the Imperial Parliament. He sympathised with the Amendment on those grounds, and would, therefore, vote for it. He strongly objected to the policy of the Government in throwing upon the ports the expense of taking precautions against the importation of cholera. His own constituency had been put to a very considerable expenditure on account of quarantine directed against foreign vessels, and much injustice was done, as the Central Government sent down an Inspector to tell the Local Authority what to do, and afforded it no pecuniary assistance at all. Seeing that this was really an Imperial and not a local matter, the burden should fall on the country at large. But so long as the Government insisted on treating this as a local matter by making local ports pay all the expense, they had no right to prevent the Irish Parliament having control over it.

*SIR J. FERGUSSON (Manchester, N.E.) : The right hon. Gentleman the Member for the Forest of Dean (Sir C. W. Dilke) is mistaken in supposing that quarantine is inoperative in this country, because I remember perfectly well that two or three years ago I attended a meeting of the Privy Council, at which an Order was passed consigning to quarantine the passengers and crew of a ship just arrived from the West Indies.

SIR C. W. DILKE: Yes; that was a case of yellow fever.

*SIR J. FERGUSSON: The question is whether the Irish Parliament shall have power to frame quarantine laws and regulations different from those in force in other parts of the United Kingdom, and to adopt a system of quarantine such as obtains in Spain and other countries, thereby causing considerable inconvenience to the people of this country, or to neglect rules that we consider necessary. I think the House should pause before adopting the proposal of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Bodmin.

Question put, and agreed to.

Amendment proposed, in page 2, line 20, after "1854," to insert the words "and the Acts amending the same."—(Mr. J. Morley.)

Amendment agreed to.

MR. VICARY GIBBS (Herts, St. Albans) said, he had to move an Amendment substituting the word "currency" for "legal tender," in the list of subjects which the Irish Legislature were precluded from dealing with. He admitted that the subject was fully discussed in Committee. But on that occasion the Chancellor of the Exchequer, while unable to accept the Amendment, promised to consider if any further safeguard were necessary. He now asked what was the result of the right hon. Gentleman's consideration. He was surprised at the absence of the right hon. Gentleman at a moment when a question of such importance to the commercial classes was about to be discussed. As the clause now stood, it would be in the power of the Irish Government to issue paper currency to any extent they might think proper. The principal currency in Ireland at the present time was a paper currency; the banks were allowed by law to issue notes to a certain extent secured by their own reserves, and beyond a certain limit they were required to keep gold in their cellars as against the notes. But the Irish Government might think fit to stop that currency, and there was nothing in the Bill to prevent them doing so. Then the question would arise as to what currency should be substituted for it, and the Bill would enable the Government to issue a paper currency without any security at all.

It being half-past Five of the clock, Further Proceeding on Consideration, as amended, stood adjourned.

QUESTIONS.

INDIAN CIVIL ENGINEERS' FURLOUGH ALLOWANCES.

SIR G. CHESNEY (Oxford) : I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for India whether the Secretary of State is aware that the civil engineers serving under the Indian Government who entered Cooper's Hill in 1875 receive their furlough allowances at the official rate of exchange, whereas those of previous years receive theirs in sterling ; whether he is aware that in the autumn of 1874 a prospectus giving particulars of the entrance examination to be held in 1875 for admission to Cooper's Hill, with an appendix thereto giving particulars regarding the regulations then in force for the Public Works Department as to leave, pensions, &c., was issued in the official Cooper's Hill Calendar, published under the authority of the Secretary of State ; whether his attention has been called to the particulars and regulations regarding furlough allowances given in the appendix to this prospectus taken from Sections 10 and 11 of the Civil Leave Code, which provides that officers on furlough are entitled to be paid their furlough allowances at the Home Treasury of the Government of India in sterling ; and also to a subsequent prospectus for the year 1875, which was issued from the India Office, the appendix to which contained in addition to Sections 10 and 11 of chap. iii. of the Civil Leave Code, Section 26 of chap. x. of the Code which provides that furlough allowances paid at the Home Treasury shall be paid at the official rate of exchange, and whether any warning of the addition of this condition was given to candidates for examination ; whether, since Sections 10 and 11 of chap. iii. of the Civil Leave Code contain the only regulations as to payment of furlough allowances at the Home Treasury inserted in any prospectus published prior to the second prospectus of 1875, it is upon that ground that the civil engineers who joined the Public Works Department through Cooper's Hill prior to 1875 are paid their furlough allowances in sterling ; whether the Secretary of State has received complaints from engineers who entered Cooper's Hill in 1875 that they were misled by the prospectus published in the Cooper's Hill Calendar ; and whether he is prepared to sanction their furlough being now paid at the Home Treasury in sterling ?

*THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR INDIA (Mr. G. RUSSELL, North Beds.) : 1. All Indian civil engineers receive their furlough allowances in sterling ; but those who entered the Indian Civil Engineering College before 1875 have their allowances converted into sterling at 2s. to the rupee, while those who entered in 1875 and subsequent years receive theirs at the official rate for the year. 2. Yes ; but the Calendar is not a work supplied officially to candidates. 3. Yes ; the Secretary of State's attention has been called to those regulations. The appendix, as published in the Calendar, said that the officers, when on ordinary furlough, would receive a leave allowance equal to half their average salary, the maximum being £200 a quarter ; and, when on other than ordinary, £120 a quarter, or one-fourth of average salary, whichever was the less. The prospectus for 1875 issued from the India Office said further that, if payment was taken at the Home Treasury, leave allowances would be converted into sterling at the rate of exchange annually fixed. There is no reason to doubt that this prospectus was given to everybody who made inquiries at the India Office about the examination for 1875. 4. Civil engineers who joined the College before the prospectus of 1875 was issued are allowed to have their furlough pay at the rate of 2s. the rupee, because the Secretary of State was advised that their having paid the College fees and passed the examination had given them a legal right thereto. 5. Yes. 6. Not at 2s. the rupee.

CARRIAGE RATES FOR GRAINS ON THE GREAT WESTERN RAILWAY.

MR. COBB (Warwick, S.E., Rugby) : I beg to ask the President of the Board of Trade whether he is aware that the Great Western Railway Company charge a rate of 6s. 10d. per ton, for brewers' and distillers' grain from Burton-on-Trent to Solihull, and that for the same goods from Burton-on-Trent to Marston Green, which is about the same distance, the London and North Western Railway Company charge a rate of only 4s. 1d. per ton; whether he is aware that the tenant farmers in the neighbourhood of Solihull are much hampered by this action of the Great Western Railway Company; and whether he will ask the Great Western Railway Company for an explanation as to this large difference; and if they are prepared to reduce their rate to the same amount as that of the London and North Western Railway Company?

THE PRESIDENT OF THE BOARD OF TRADE (Mr. MUNDELLA, Sheffield, Brightside): I am informed that the facts are not as stated in the question. The Great Western Railway do not go to Burton-on-Trent. Inquiries have been made, and it is shown that no brewers' or distillers' grains have passed from Burton to Solihull either this year or last. The Great Western Company, however, assure me that if any trader wishing to send such traffic will communicate with them, they will try to arrange with the other Companies interested a fair through rate.

POST LETTERS BY RAILWAY.

MR. PARKER SMITH (Lanark, Partick): I beg to ask the Postmaster General why the conveyance of single post letters by railway is limited to letters not exceeding one ounce in weight; and whether the system can be extended to letters of any weight if prepaid at the letter rate?

THE POSTMASTER GENERAL (Mr. A. MORLEY, Nottingham, E.): The present arrangement limited to letters not exceeding one ounce in weight was adopted mainly on account of the objection of the Railway Companies to having to weigh letters at their stations; but for some little time past the question of extending the limit of weight has been under consideration, and I am in communication with the Railway Companies on the subject.

Mr. Cobb

CROYDON POSTAL SERVICE.

MR. S. HERBERT (Croydon): I beg to ask the Postmaster General whether he is aware that letters posted in London for Croydon after 4 p.m., and letters arriving in London from the Provinces and abroad (also addressed to Croydon) after 4 p.m., are not delivered in Croydon until the following morning; and whether he will arrange that in future a mail bag shall be sent by train after 6 p.m., so that letters can be delivered in Croydon from 8 p.m. to 9 p.m., as is done at Wimbledon, Bromley, and elsewhere?

MR. BARROW (Southwark, Bermondsey): Is the right hon. Gentleman aware that Croydon is a borough containing at least 105,000 inhabitants, a large number of whom are City, business, and professional men?

MR. A. MORLEY: I believe that that is so. It is not practicable to make a complete despatch to Croydon, for delivery the same evening, of all letters posted in London later than 4 p.m., without delaying the last delivery at Croydon until an unreasonably late hour. The town authorities having been consulted whether they would prefer the present last delivery (which commences at 6.30 p.m.) being postponed to a later hour in order to include a portion of the letters posted after 4 p.m. in London, have declined to entertain the proposal, as it would delay considerably more letters than would be accelerated. It is further considered by them that unless the whole of the letters posted in London up to 6 p.m. could be included in a later evening delivery the expense of such a delivery would be largely thrown away, and they state that the inhabitants generally are well content with the existing number of postal deliveries at Croydon. The circumstances at Wimbledon are different, as it is in the London Postal District, and the evening despatch to Bromley is not a complete one.

ORDNANCE SURVEY MAPS.

MR. H. HOBHOUSE (Somerset, E.): I beg to ask the President of the Board of Agriculture whether it has been found practicable to provide facilities for the inspection of Ordnance Survey Maps by persons desiring to refer to them; and, if so, what are the arrangements which have been made?

THE PRESIDENT OF THE BOARD OF AGRICULTURE (Mr. H. GARDNER, Essex, Saffron Walden): We have recently made arrangements by which the latest issues of the Ordnance Survey maps on the 1-inch and 6-inch scales will be available for inspection by the public at the offices of the Board of Agriculture at 3, St. James's Square. Changes in the boundaries of boroughs, Local Government districts, and parishes, will be recorded on 6-inch maps, as soon as possible after they have been authorised, and a complete set of the index maps and indices of all Ordnance Survey maps and publications will be kept for reference. I trust that the provision of those facilities will be found of general public utility.

TITHE DISTRAINT AT NEWCASTLE EMLYN.

MR. REES - DAVIES (Pembroke-shire): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether he is aware that, in a case recently tried before Judge Bishop in the County Court of Newcastle Emlyn, Cardiganshire, an important point of law was raised and adjudicated upon as to the right of a bailiff to effect an entrance into premises by climbing over fences in levying distraints for tithe, and that a fine of £5 was imposed upon the defendant, who has entered an appeal against the Judgment of the County Court Judge; whether he is aware that the Treasury has now taken up the case on appeal for the bailiff of the County Court, notwithstanding that a solicitor had been engaged and counsel instructed on the bailiff's behalf; whether he will state under whose authority these proceedings were taken; and whether he will take steps to prevent such action on the part of the Treasury in interfering with civil proceedings?

THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE HOME DEPARTMENT (Mr. ASQUITH, Fife, E.): I had no knowledge of these proceedings until my attention was called to them by my hon. Friend's question. I am in communication with the Attorney General on the subject, and in the course of a few days I shall be able to make a further statement.

MIXED RAILWAY TRAINS.

MR. SEYMOUR KEAY (Elgin and Nairn): I beg to ask the President of the Board of Trade whether an Order has been issued under the Regulation of Railways Act, providing that in all mixed trains the goods waggons must be placed behind the passenger carriages; whether he is aware that railway officials declare that the working of a train thus composed is impracticable, and that an adherence to the Order would result in the entire or partial abandonment of the system of mixed trains; whether he is aware that particularly on the single lines in the Highlands of Scotland, the public are indebted to the system of mixed trains for a very large part of the facilities for travelling which they possess, and are very unwilling that these should be curtailed by the operation of the Order; whether it can be shown that the mixed train system, as hitherto worked, has resulted in an undue proportion of accidents on the Highland Railways as compared with that of purely passenger trains, and has this new Order been issued in consequence of complaints from the public in regard to the present system; and whether, having regard to the fact that nearly one-half of the whole existing train service on the Highland and other railways in Scotland is carried on by mixed trains, the Government will reconsider this important matter, with a view of withdrawing or modifying the Order, in the interests both of the railways and of the travelling public?

MR. MUNDELLA: The Board of Trade made an Order on 16th February, 1891, providing that in mixed trains the goods waggons must be placed behind the passenger carriages, and two years and six months was allowed for compliance with its requirements. It would be impossible to marshall the train in any other way without making the law as to the use of the automatic continuous brake on passenger carriages a dead letter. I am not aware that railway officials generally declare the working of the train thus composed to be unworkable; on the contrary, on a very large proportion of lines the practice is in force, and in some cases the carriages were so marshalled before the passing of the Act of 1889. It is generally admitted that there is much greater risk to passengers in mixed trains than in ordinary passenger trains; and having regard to the interests of the public safety and the obligations imposed on the Board of Trade by the Act of 1889, I am advised that the Order should not be withdrawn or modified. I am fully alive, however, to the convenience of mixed trains, and am anxious that the greatest possible facilities should be afforded to the travelling public; but such serious accidents have resulted from the conveyance of passengers in vehicles inadequately braked that the Board of Trade would fail in their duty if they disregarded the precautions ordained by Parliament.

Mr. SEYMOUR KEAY: Will the right hon. Gentleman specially consider the case of single lines as in the North of Scotland?

Mr. MUNDELLA: That case has been specially considered, and in all cases except that of the Highland line there had been general compliance with the Order. I am bound to say that so recently as 1892 there was a collision at Auchintulloch, which might have been accompanied by grave loss of life, and in that case the Inspector specially reported that it was necessary to fit these trains with automatic brakes.

Mr. REITH (Inverness, &c.): Has the right hon. Gentleman received a Memorial from the Chamber of Commerce of Inverness in which it is stated that the Order of the Board of Trade will be extremely detrimental to the convenience of the people in the North of Scotland and to trade generally?

Mr. MUNDELLA: I have received such a Memorial. If any application is made for mixed trains, with proper arrangements, we shall be happy to consider it; but no such application has been made.

Dr. MACGREGOR (Inverness-shire): Is it a fact that no accident has occurred on the Highland line to a mixed train?

Mr. MUNDELLA: That is not so. I have just quoted one case, and I am bound to point out that the worst accident that has happened of late—that in County Antrim—was to a mixed train, where there is not proper brake power on the carriages for passengers.

Dr. MACGREGOR: Will the matter be reconsidered if the Chamber of Commerce makes application?

Mr. Mundella

Mr. MUNDELLA: No, Sir. I hope the Chamber of Commerce will not make itself the means of relieving the Railway Company of its duty to the public. The Company have had two-and-a-half years' notice, and have done nothing. They have never applied for a single mixed train till this day.

ANTHRAX.

Mr. JEFFREYS (Hants, Basingstoke): I beg to ask the President of the Board of Agriculture how many herds of cattle in England are suffering from anthrax at the present time; what precautions have been taken to prevent the disease spreading; and if he can state how the disease originates amongst cattle?

Mr. H. GARDNER: Anthrax was reported to exist on 13 farms in England during the week ended the 12th instant. The measures taken to prevent the spreading of the disease are set out in a General Order issued by me on the 16th December last, a copy of which I shall be happy to supply to the hon. Member. The disease is due to the entrance into the blood of a minute bacillus, which is a species of fungus and grows from spores or seeds, and the difficulty of dealing with it is due to the fact that it is practically impossible to prevent these microscopic organisms from entering stables and fields. The hon. Member will find some interesting information on the subject in the Annual Report of the Director of the Veterinary Department for the year 1892.

LICENSING REGULATIONS IN SCOTLAND.

Sir C. CAMERON (Glasgow, College): I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury whether his attention has been called to the fact that, by Section 6 of "The Public Houses (Hours of Closing) (Scotland) Act, 1887," it is provided that any person holding a licence for the sale of Excisable liquors in Scotland who shall contravene the terms of the certificate granted to him under this Act shall be guilty of an offence involving the penalties and forfeitures provided by the Licensing (Scotland) Acts, or any one of them, for breaches of the terms, provisions, and conditions of certificates; whether, in defiance of this provision of the law, the Board of Inland Revenue, under date 1st January, 1893, has instructed its officers in Scotland to permit publicans, who have received the permission of the Magistrates, to sell at the usual place of business beyond the hours mentioned in their certificate; whether he is aware that such a breach of the terms, provisions, and conditions of 10 o'clock certificates was sanctioned in Arbroath on the night of the 6th July last; and on what authority the Board of Inland Revenue acted when it suggested and countenanced this breach of the Licensing Law of Scotland?

THE SECRETARY TO THE TREASURY (Sir J. T. HIBBERT, Oldham): The instruction referred to is, no doubt, a paragraph in the "Instructions relative to Licences" issued by the Board of Inland Revenue, and has been in force for a number of years. It is incorrectly described in the question as an instruction to permit publicans to sell beyond the hours mentioned in their certificates. It is merely an instruction that publicans who have the permission of the Magistrates to sell beyond the hours prescribed by law at their usual place of business do not require occasional licences. This is a statement of the law, and is founded on the provisions of the Act 26 & 27 Vict., c. 33, section 19. It is understood that the Magistrates of Arbroath, on the occasion of the Royal Wedding on the 6th July last, authorised the publicans in the town to keep their premises open till 11 p.m.; but this extension of time was not in any way suggested by the Board of Inland Revenue, who were not concerned in the matter.

SIR C. CAMERON: But is not this instruction entirely contrary to the Act of Parliament, and ought not the Inland Revenue to administer the law?

SIR J. T. HIBBERT: The Inland Revenue Authorities should be the last people to do anything contrary to the law. If my hon. Friend wishes to try a test case he is at liberty to do so.

SIR C. CAMERON: I shall raise the question on the Estimates.

THE IMPRISONED ARMENIANS.

SIR J. KENNAWAY (Devon, Honiton): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether, besides the condemned Armenian prisoners recently referred to, there are also 24 who have been for six months in gaol awaiting trial, and if there is any prospect of a speedy hearing of their case; whether, on the anniversary which occurs this month of the accession of the Sultan of Turkey to the Throne, it is the habit of His Imperial Majesty to release prisoners convicted of State offences; and whether the Secretary of State would see his way to urge that on this occasion the Royal clemency should be extended to the Armenian prisoners now under sentence?

THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR FOREIGN AFFAIRS (Sir E. GREY, Northumberland, Berwick): There are other prisoners still awaiting trial at Angora, though accounts differ as to the exact number. The Sultan has already been asked to extend his clemency to some of the prisoners; in two cases recently he has done so, and in other cases the sentences have been materially reduced. Any further representations must depend upon the nature of the evidence to which Her Majesty's Embassy has been promised access.

EUROPEAN UNCOVENANTED CIVIL SERVANTS.

SIR R. TEMPLE (Surrey, Kingston): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for India whether the Secretary of State in Council has under his consideration the disadvantages under which European Uncovenanted Civil servants in India suffer in respect of leave and furlough regulations whereby among others they are only permitted to take two years' furlough during their whole service, and having taken any such furlough are debarred from taking any leave on private affairs?

PRECAUTIONS AGAINST CHOLERA IN THE EAST.

SIR H. ROSCOE (Manchester, S.): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for India whether his attention has been called to a resolution passed at the Public Medicine Section of the British Medical Association meeting at Newcastle, on 2nd August, in which they recommend that it be referred to the Parliamentary Bills Committee to take such steps as may be desirable to approach the British and Foreign Governments with a view to obtain their intervention in securing measures for the suppression of cholera at the Hurdwar and other Indian fairs, and at the Mecca pilgrimage, and that for this purpose also due submission of the facts be made to His Majesty the Sultan; and whether he will be willing to give the assistance requested in promoting efforts to check the extension of cholera at and from these religious festivals, and to co-operate with other European Governments and His Majesty the Sultan in providing measures for arresting the extension of cholera by inspection of pilgrims at the respective Indian ports of exit prior to embarking on the pilgrimages, and of obtaining the assent and assistance of His Imperial Majesty the Sultan of Turkey towards taking corresponding steps at Mecca in respect both to the sanitation of that holy place during the periods of pilgrimage, and the due inspection and sanitation of the land stations of caravans passing overland as well as at Jeddah and El Tor?

*MR. G. RUSSELL: The Secretary of State for India has not yet seen the resolution mentioned in my hon. Friend's question; but he has seen abstract reports of some of the proceedings and addresses at the meeting. The Government of India has for some years past made effort to prevent the occurrence of epidemic cholera at, and its spread from, the great fairs and religious gatherings by instituting strict sanitary control at and around such fairs and gatherings. He is glad to say that the great fair at Hurdwar in the present year passed off without spreading cholera. These efforts will be continued by all authorities in India. Regarding the cholera at the Moslem holy places, the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs has recently given answers in this House. So far as the assistance of the Government of India can second the arrangements of the Porte for preventing the occurrence of cholera at Mecca, Medina, and the Red Sea ports, such assistance will be readily given.

FLEET AND STAFF ENGINEERS.

MR. JEFFREYS: I beg to ask the Secretary to the Admiralty whether the Royal Navy is now short of Fleet and Staff Engineers; and, if so, whether he can give any reason for this?

Sir H. Roscoe

THE SECRETARY TO THE ADMIRALTY (Sir U. KAY-SHUTTLEWORTH, Lancashire, Clitheroe): Taking the question to relate to Fleet, Staff, and Chief Engineers, which ranks are reckoned together for all purposes, the number is not short. The limit, which was 250, is being raised by 10 promotions during each year to 280.

THE TIPPERARY MAGISTRACY.

MR. HOGAN (Tipperary, Mid): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether he is aware that considerable public inconvenience has been occasioned for some time past in the town of Templemore, County Tipperary, from the dearth of local Magistrates; whether local gentlemen, willing and qualified to act as Justices of the Peace, were recommended for appointment several months ago; and whether he will endeavour to expedite the appointment of additional Magistrates for Templemore and district?

THE CHIEF SECRETARY FOR IRELAND (Mr. J. MORLEY, Newcastle-upon-Tyne): No complaints have been made to the Lord Chancellor as to the dearth of local Magistrates at Templemore. A Resident Magistrate is stationed there, and the Petty Sessions appear to be fairly attended. One of the Magistrates recently appointed by the Lord Chancellor will attend the Templemore Sessions. The names of two other local gentlemen for the Templemore district were suggested to the Lord Chancellor; but his Lordship did not consider that he could appoint them to the Commission. The Lord Chancellor is always ready to consider the names of any properly qualified persons that may be brought before him.

BALL CARTRIDGE AT ALDERSHOT.

MR. HANBURY (Preston): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for War whether it has yet been ascertained how ball cartridge came to be intermixed with the blank cartridge recently issued to the troops at Aldershot; and what steps it is intended to take to avoid a similar danger at Aldershot and other stations where blank cartridge is issued?

*THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR WAR (Mr. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN, Stirling, &c.): The accident is supposed to have arisen from the packers of the two kinds of ammunition at Woolwich working in too close proximity. Most stringent orders have been given to separate, as far as possible, the inspection and packing of blank and ball ammunition. In addition every packet of blank ammunition is to be carefully weighed to ascertain that it does not exceed a proper mean weight. The whole of the ammunition at Aldershot is being examined and repacked.

MR. HANBURY: Is it a fact that men worked at the two kinds of ammunition in the same room?

MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: They were working in the same room.

SWAZILAND.

MR. HANBURY: I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies what he intends when he undertakes that Swaziland shall not be handed over to the Transvaal Government without the full and free assent of the Swazi people; and how is it proposed to ascertain the wishes of the Swazi people as distinct from the will or interests of the Swazi King?

THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE COLONIES (Mr. S. BUXTON, Tower Hamlets, Poplar): When I am in a position to communicate and to explain to the House the terms of the Convention, the hon. Member will see what I meant by saying that no arrangement in regard to the future government of the Swazis will be come to which does not involve the full and free assent of the Swazi nation. Until then I fear I cannot amplify my statement.

MR. HANBURY: When will that time arrive?

MR. S. BUXTON: I hope very soon. I am in communication with the Transvaal Republic.

MR. TOMLINSON (Preston): Have similar steps been taken to ascertain the wishes of the British residents in Swaziland?

MR. S. BUXTON: They are in a totally different position, and it was not necessary in their case to take such steps. If the hon. Member will wait till he sees the Convention, he will find that their rights and privileges have been carefully maintained.

THE MATABELE RAID IN MASHONALAND.

BARON H. DE WORMS (Liverpool, East Toxteth): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies whether any further information has been received relative to the Matabele raid and the action of Lo Bengula in the matter; if so, whether he will communicate it to the House?

MR. S. BUXTON: The right hon. Gentleman has, no doubt, seen the telegrams published yesterday by the British South Africa Company and Reuter's Agency on the subject. We have not any further telegraphic news from Sir Henry Loch, who was, no doubt, aware that the information would reach this country through other channels.

THE MERIONETHSHIRE EDUCATION SCHEME.

VISCOUNT CRANBORNE (Rochester): I beg to ask the hon. Member for Merionethshire whether the only limitation as to the teaching of formularies distinctive of any particular denomination contained in "The Intermediate Education (Wales) Act, 1889," is to be found in Section 4, Sub-section (3) of that Act, which only applies to day scholars; (2) whether the sections dealing with religious education in "The Endowed Schools Act, 1869," are 15 and 16; (3) whether either of them can be put in force except at the demand of the parents or guardians of particular children, and in no case interfere with the religious education and observances of those who remain boarders; (4) and upon what statutory authority the Merionethshire Scheme interferes with the user of the formularies or the teaching of the distinctive tenets of any particular denomination in the case of boarders at a hostel or boarding-house of a school under the Scheme?

THE PARLIAMENTARY CHARITY COMMISSIONER (Mr. T. E. ELLIS, Merionethshire): (1) There is no other limitation in the Act. That mentioned applies only to day scholars. (2) Sections 15 and 16 of the Act of 1869 and Section 11 of the Act of 1873 directly, and Section 19 of the Act of 1869 indirectly, deal with religious education. Section 19 of the Act of 1869 is amended by Section 7 of the Act of 1873. (3) Section 15 of the Act of 1869 is in part independent of the demand of parents and guardians; but it applies to day scholars only. Section 16 does not interfere with the religious education and observances of those who remain boarders. (4) The general statutory authority to make provisions of the kind indicated, which do not contravene any of the special provisions of the Act, is conferred by Section 9 of the Endowed Schools Act, 1869, as amended by Sections 3 and 11 of the Welsh Act.

MR. STANLEY LEIGHTON: May I ask whether the words "in the family worship so held, the formularies of any religious denomination shall not be used," are in the Welsh Scheme; and whether that does not limit the discretion of the Governing Body of the hostel or schools; and whether the Governing Body is not expressly left free by Section 16 of the Endowed Schools Act?

MR. T. E. ELLIS: All religious instruction given in the school is completely at the discretion of the local Governing Body. It is so in every Scheme, and in this case the prohibition is subject to Section 16 of the Act. A similar prohibition has been made in the Carnarvonshire Scheme, which has passed the House of Lords, and is now an Act of Parliament.

MR. STANLEY LEIGHTON: But are the words I have quoted not only not subject to, but in direct contradiction of, the 16th section of the Act?

MR. T. E. ELLIS: I do not think they are in direct contradiction; they are simply subject to the section. I take the view of the Charity Commissioners as both legal and formal.

VISCOUNT CRANBORNE: What means are there of testing the legality of the view which the Charity Commissioners take of the Scheme?

MR. T. E. ELLIS: By an appeal to the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council.

MR. LLOYD GEORGE (Carnarvon, &c.): Is it not the fact that the Scheme now complained of was the result of a compromise arrived at between two rival Schemes; and when it came before the Merionethshire County Council did the Conservative Members of the body object to it?

MR. T. E. ELLIS: No; I do not think there was any such objection.

Mr. T. E. Ellis

EXPLOSIVES IN MINES.

MR. CARVELL WILLIAMS (Notts, Mansfield): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether he is aware that, notwithstanding the provision of "The Metalliferous Mines Act, 1872," that not more than 4 lbs. of explosives shall be taken into a mine by a workman, packets of 5 lbs. have, for convenience, been permitted; but that, recently, Her Majesty's Inspector has insisted on a strict observance of the provision of the Act; whether, as explosives are put up in boxes containing 10 packets of 5 lbs. each, he will take advice whether it is safer, as well as more convenient, to allow such packets to be used than to break bulk and re-weigh the contents; whether 5 lb. packets are permitted by "The Coal Mines Regulation Act, 1872"; whether he is aware that Mr. Dickinson, the late Inspector of Mines, expressed the opinion that the use of 5 lb. packages was safer than that of 4 lb. packages; and whether, in view of all the facts of the case, the permission to use 5 lb. packages may be continued in metalliferous mines?

MR. ASQUITH: Five pound packets are permitted by the Coal Mines Regulation Act, 1872. Mr. Dickinson, the late Inspector of Mines, expressed the opinion that the use of 5 lb. packages was safer than that of 4 lb. packages. Neither I nor the Inspector has power to give permission for the use of 5 lb. packets in metalliferous mines; but I will consider whether legislation on the point is not desirable.

SHIPBUILDING FOR THE NAVY.

MR. ARNOLD-FORSTER (Belfast, W.): I beg to ask the Secretary to the Admiralty how many ships for the Royal Navy have been commenced in the Dockyards or elsewhere since 1st September, 1892; and what are the names, class, tonnage, and date of commencement of such ships respectively?

SIR U. KAY-SHUTTLEWORTH: Since the 1st September last year the following ships have been commenced:—1 battleship; 3 second class cruisers; 2 sloops; 5 torpedo gunboats; and 2 torpedo boat destroyers. I shall be happy to give my hon. Friend the other particulars for which he asks; but it would take too long to include them in an answer to a question.

OMNIBUS FARES IN THE METROPOLIS.

MR. SEYMOUR KEAY: I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether he is aware that many omnibus proprietors place inside their vehicles movable boards with scales of fares painted thereon, which are so affixed as temporarily to conceal the permanent scales of fares painted on the wall of the omnibus itself; and is this practice in accordance with the law; whether he is also aware that much deception is practised on the public by certain omnibus proprietors who paint inside their vehicles scales of fares not only unusual but unreasonable in themselves, as in the case of omnibus No. 2151, which demands the usual fare of 2d. for the journey from Chapel Street to Charing Cross, while it also demands 2d. for less than half of the same journey—namely, from Oxford Circus to Charing Cross; and can any steps be taken to protect the public in this matter? At the same time, I will ask the right hon. Gentleman whether his attention has been called to a case tried in the West London Police Court, on the 14th instant, from which it appeared that the scale of fare painted inside an omnibus was 1s. any distance, the public having entered the vehicle in the belief that the usual fares were in force; what degree of permanence is required in the fixing and exhibition of scales of fares painted on omnibuses, so as to meet the requirements of the law; and whether he will consider the advisability of amending the law, if such is necessary, to prevent impositions on the public in the matter of omnibus fares?

MR. ASQUITH: The late Chief Magistrate expressed an opinion that the fares may be painted on a board secured by nails or screws on the inside of an omnibus. The fraud to be guarded against is a change of tariff during a journey; but the proprietor may change his tariff at the end of every journey. The painting of the fares on the actual body of the vehicle would prevent the proprietor from exercising his undoubted right. The present Chief Magistrate—Sir John Bridge—also is reported to have said that he considered no offence had been committed even when the board containing the table of fares was not screwed or fixed to the omnibus, and to have dismissed the summons in a case where the board was only hanging by a string. An omnibus proprietor may charge what fares he likes so long as he keeps distinctly painted in a conspicuous manner inside the omnibus a table of fares, which are deemed to be the only lawful fares. As the law at present stands, no steps can be taken except by legislation to protect the public in the matter. Passengers might, to some extent, protect themselves by asking before entering an omnibus the fare from one place to another. I shall consider, in consultation with the Commissioner of Police, whether it is desirable and practicable, by any and what change in the law, to secure a greater degree of uniformity in omnibus fares, and to protect the public against deception.

BURLESQUE MILITARY FUNERAL AT SHOEBOURNE.

MAJOR RASCH (Essex, S.E.): On behalf of my hon. and gallant Friend the Member for the Rye Division of Sussex, I beg to ask the Secretary of State for War whether the Military Authorities have received any report of a burlesque military funeral alleged to have taken place at the Camp, Shoeburyness, during the Volunteer prize meeting recently held here; whether any such serious breach of discipline occurred; whether any officers, non-commissioned officers, or men have been made responsible for the same; and whether Colonel Howard, R.A., the Camp Commandant, has made any observations or furnished any report with reference to the acts of profanity which are alleged to have occurred?

*MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: There seems to have been some harmless joking among the Volunteers at Shoeburyness, and photographs were taken of an arranged scene; but this did not constitute a breach of discipline, and was not worthy of notice. Colonel Howard has reported on the incident.

INSANITARY GOVERNMENT PROPERTY.

MR. BYLES (York, W.R., Shipley): I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury whether he has seen a letter in The Standard of Saturday last, from Mr. Herbert W. Seager, M.B., alleging that he rents a house from the Woods and Forests, and that the house is at times uninhabitable by reason of its being filled with deadly gases from a neighbouring cesspool, for which his landlord is responsible; that his wife and child have already died there from blood poisoning; that the Woods and Forest Commissioners refuse to take any action; and the local Sanitary Authority refuses to step in on the ground that it has no jurisdiction over Government property; and whether these allegations are admitted to be true; and, if so, whether the Commissioners will be compelled to adopt such measures as will protect the health of the inhabitants?

SIR J. T. HIBBERT: These allegations are not admitted to be true. I am informed that the deaths referred to occurred in 1887, and that Mr. Seager made no complaint to the Office of Woods about the cesspool until May, 1892. The cesspool had been made some time previously without any consent from the Department of Woods; but no complaint has been received respecting it from any other resident (though some are in closer proximity than Mr. Seager), nor from the local Sanitary Authority. The Commissioner of Woods, however, on seeing Mr. Seager's letter in The Standard, at once communicated with the Sanitary Authority; but no reply beyond an acknowledgment has been received.

DUNDALK INCOME TAX PAYER'S COMPLAINT.

MR. T. M. HEALY (Louth, N.): I beg to ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer is he aware that a trader in Dundalk, finding himself this year assessed 10s. more than he was last year, remonstrated with the Income Tax official against the increase, and said that for the past year his business had not been as good as previously, adding, "To the truth of what I say I can swear"; that the official is alleged to have replied, "You could swear 20 oaths and then go to your priest and he'd forgive you"; that The Dundalk Herald, a Conservative organ, vouched for these facts on 29th July, and as they have not since been challenged will he take any notice of the language in question?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER (Sir W. HARCOURT, Derby): The surveyor states that the trader in question, instead of making his objection to the assessment in a proper manner, addressed him (the surveyor) in the street on the subject, and made use of offensive language. This, of course, affords no justification for the language used by the official, who has received a severe official reproof.

RESERVE SOLDIERS CALLED OUT.

COLONEL MURRAY (Bath): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for War what number of Reserve soldiers have been, and will be, called out for drill and training this year; and what steps have been taken towards using a certain number of the Reserve in strengthening battalions when required for emergencies?

*MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: About 2,000 men of the Reserve are being called out for drill and training this year. The second question is still under consideration.

MILITARY SERVICE ABROAD.

COLONEL MURRAY: I beg to ask the Secretary of State for War what steps have been, or will be, taken this trooping season to equalise the number of battalions and strength of establishments of the Army at Home and Abroad?

*MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: It is in contemplation to reduce by the end of this year the number of regiments having both battalions abroad from seven to four. All the Line battalions at home are on the equal establishment of 721 rank and file.

WANDSWORTH REGISTRATION LISTS.

SIR C. W. DILKE (Gloucester, Forest of Dean): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for the Home Department, with reference to the Return, Parliamentary Electors, No. 129, what is the meaning of the classification, under the heading of "Freemen, &c." of 30 voters in the Metropolitan constituency of Wandsworth; whether "Reform Act, 1867," mentioned in a foot-note on page 8, means the Reform Act of 1832; and whether it is the case that no reduction appears to have been made for duplicate voters, numerous among the ownership electors in counties?

Mr. Byles

THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE HOME DEPARTMENT (Mr. H. GLADSTONE, Leeds, W.) As regards the first question, I have asked the Returning Officer for Wandsworth for an explanation of the entry "30 freemen, &c.," made in his portion of the Return. As regards the second, I have to express regret that the clerical error pointed out should have occurred. I find that the date "1867" was substituted for "1832" in transcription for the printers. As regards the third, I cannot say whether or not any reduction has been made for duplicates among ownership voters. Occupation voters starred under Section 7 (5) of the County Electors Act, 1888, have been excluded, and Returning Officers were requested to exclude all other duplicates so far as possible. To do this with absolute accuracy is almost impossible.

THE DUBLIN MAIN DRAINAGE SCHEME.

MR. W. FIELD (Dublin, St. Patrick's): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for War whether his attention has been directed to the resolution unanimously passed at a great labour meeting held in Phoenix Park last Sunday, which condemned the delay alleged to be caused by the War Office and Treasury Departments in commencing the Dublin Main Drainage Scheme, as the health and convenience of the city is injured by the present condition of the River Liffey, and protesting against the waste of valuable fine weather for such operations, and the omission of giving much-needed employment; and whether he will expedite arrangements, so that the works may be begun at once?

*MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: In view of the improved state of health of the troops in Dublin which may be looked for in the event of an efficient system of drainage being carried out for the city, I am as anxious as the Corporation can be to facilitate its completion. The Army Sanitary Committee, have, however, reported that the scheme proposed would be fraught with serious danger to the health of the garrison of Pigeon House Fort, and negotiations are in progress for the transfer to the Corporation of Dublin of the site of the fort.

MR. FIELD: Am I to understand, from the reply of the right hon. Gentleman, that he will expedite this business?

It has been going on for a very long time, and there does not appear to be any progress made whatever.

*MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: Great progress has been made. It was necessary, when the scheme of the Corporation was communicated to the War Office, for me to refer it to the Army Sanitary Committee to find out what effect it would have on the health of the men at Pigeon House Fort. That Committee conducted an inquiry on the spot; its Report was sent to the Dublin Corporation, who have replied to it. The question is whether the Corporation and the War Office can come to terms as to the acquisition of the land. There has been no unnecessary delay.

MR. FIELD: About how many men are there in the Pigeon House Fort?

*MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: I do not know; but whether they are many or few, it is not desirable that they should be poisoned.

THE MERIONETHSHIRE SCHEME.

SIR W. HART DYKE (Kent, Dartford): I beg to ask the hon. Member for Merionethshire, as Charity Commissioner, whether Clause 91 of the Merionethshire County Scheme is consistent with Clause 16 of "The Endowed Schools Act, 1869," referred to by him on 14th August; whether he is aware that a clause of a similar character, relating to denominational teaching in boarding houses, was contained in a scheme dealing with Christ's Hospital, and eventually struck out under a judgment of the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council as being ultra vires; and whether there is any scheme in operation under the Endowed Schools Acts containing such a restriction as indicated in Clause 91 of the Merionethshire Scheme?

MR. T. E. ELLIS: The Commissioners consider that Clause 91 of the Merioneth Scheme is consistent with Section 16 of the Endowed Schools Act, 1869; but, as has been already stated in reply to the hon. Member for Owestry, the Commissioners have taken care to obviate all possibility of incompatibility between the clause and the section by making the provisions of the clause subject to those of the section as embodied verbatim in Clause 90 of the Scheme. The provision to which the hon. Baronet refers as having been struck out of the Christ's Hospital Scheme, in pursuance of a judgment of the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council, was not similar in character to this clause. That provision was that—

“Every person in charge of a boarding house of any school of the Foundation should allow exemption when claimed from attending prayer or religious worship, or from any lesson or series of lessons on a religious subject.”

This provision the Judicial Committee declared to be contrary to Section 16 of the Endowed Schools Act, 1869. No provision similar to this can be found in Clause 91 of the Merioneth Scheme. But, if there be anything similar, it must give way to the requirements of Clause 90. The precise provisions of this clause are not contained in any scheme which is in operation under the Endowed Schools Acts. But a similar provision is made in Section 89 of the Carnarvonshire Scheme. In nearly all the schemes which have been framed by the Charity Commissioners under the Endowed Schools Acts for schools in England and Wales (except those which are strictly denominational by virtue of Section 19 of the Act of 1869), the power of prohibiting instruction in the schools in the formularies of any particular denomination is given by the Schemes to the Governing Body.

SIR W. HART DYKE: I do not wish to press the hon. Member unfairly, but I desire to ask him whether, as Clause 91 now appears for the first time, and is proposed to be carried into operation under this Scheme, whereas the House was first informed by the Vice President of the Council that this clause was founded on the Act of 1891, and on the Endowed Schools Act; and whether, as on the 14th August we were informed by the hon. Member that the clause was founded only on Section 16 of the Endowed Schools Act, and as we have been informed that it is subject to six or seven other clauses of the Endowed Schools Act, the hon. Member does not think it advisable to refer this matter to the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council to have a legal opinion taken upon it rather than risk the destruction of the whole Scheme, which is inevitable as the clause remains, and so put back the entire education in this district of Wales?

Mr. T. E. Ellis

MR. T. E. ELLIS: I have just stated that a similar provision appeared in Clause 89 of the Carnarvonshire Scheme, which was thoroughly discussed in the House of Lords for several hours some months ago, and passed without any vote whatever. The Commissioners are perfectly satisfied that the clause is legal, not founded on Section 16, but subject to Section 16, and it is not the duty of the Commissioners, but of the objectors to the Scheme, to test its validity.

MR. BARTLEY: Is it not the fact that the Scheme wholly prohibits the reading of collects in family worship in the hostel.

MR. T. E. ELLIS: Yes, Sir.

DINING ROOM ACCOMMODATION IN THE HOUSE.

MR. MAC NEILL (Donegal, S.) I beg to ask the First Commissioner of Works whether he has acted upon his promise to communicate with the Lords with a view to the use of their Dining Rooms by Members of this House; and whether, as the House of Lords has adjourned for some weeks, he can see his way to effect this arrangement, and thus to relieve the Members of the House of Commons from the heat and inconvenience arising from the over-crowded state of their Dining Rooms?

MR. W. JOHNSTON (Belfast, S.): Before the right hon. Gentleman answers that question, may I ask whether, instead of holding a House of Commons picnic in the House of Lords, it would not be better for the convenience of Members to suggest to the Prime Minister the withdrawal of the Home Rule Bill?

THE FIRST COMMISSIONER OF WORKS (MR. SHAW LEFEVRE, Bradford, Central): I have been in communication with the House of Lords on the subject of the hon. Member's question in accordance with my undertaking to the House, but with no result. In my letter on the subject to the Lord Great Chamberlain, I suggested that even if their Lordships were unable to concede concurrent use of their Dining Rooms to Members of this House it would be a sensible relief to them from the inconvenience they now suffer if they should be allowed the use of the Lords' Dining Rooms when the House is not sitting or has adjourned. I have received a reply from the Committee of the Lords, to whom the matter was referred, expressing their regret that they cannot comply with my request. I do not think I can carry the matter further; but I would suggest to hon. Members opposite, whose influence with the Lords is much greater than that of the Government, whether they cannot exert that influence for the purpose of inducing the Lords to make some overture in respect of the numerous occasions when in consequence of early adjournments they make no use of their Dining Rooms?

MR. MAC NEILL: Will the right hon. Gentleman use his great influence with the Leader of the Opposition to induce him to ask the Lords to drop this "Lord-in-the-Manger" policy?

MILITARY MANŒUVRES IN HOT WEATHER.

MR. JEFFREYS: I beg to ask the Secretary of State for War what casualties (if any) occurred amongst the troops employed in the recent manœuvres at Aldershot; and if due precautions were taken so that the troops were not unnecessarily exposed to the extreme heat of the day?

*MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: I can best reply to this question by reading the Report received from the General commanding at Aldershot—

"I took all precautions to save fatigue to the Volunteers. . The extreme distance marched by any of them prior to the commencement of operations on the 9th of August was 5½ miles, and officers were detailed as guides to show the nearest route. The day was very hot, and, mainly in consequence of the heat, eight men were admitted to the hospital, of whom I regret to say, one died. He was nearly 60 years of age, and had been allowed to prolong his service as being a very good shot. He was taken to the hospital in an ambulance and every attention was paid to him. There were no casualties on other days."

MR. JEFFREYS: The right hon. Gentleman has not answered the latter part of my question. May I ask whether precautions could not be taken against exposing the Volunteers in the extreme heat of the day; whether the Volunteers in question are not unused to such violent exercise; and whether they had not marched five miles and a half in the early morning without breakfast, and then gone through the manœuvres later in the day?

*MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: The words used by Sir Evelyn Wood, with the question of the hon. Member before him, are—"I took all precautions to save fatigue to the Volunteers."

*SIR J. GOLDSMID (St. Pancras, S.): Will the right hon. Gentleman give instructions that the troops shall not be exercised in these days of extreme heat, as it has a bad effect on the troops, and it is right to save our Army?

MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: I can hardly conceive that the General Officer commanding at Aldershot would be altogether oblivious of the facts which the hon. Member has referred to. I doubt if there is any occasion for me to interfere.

MR. DARLING (Deptford): Is it not the practice, under such circumstances, for the Commander-in-Chief to protect himself with a parasol?

MR. PIERPOINT (Warrington): Did any casualties occur among the Regular troops during the excessive heat?

MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: Will the hon. Member give notice of the question?

DR. FARQUHARSON (Aberdeenshire, W.): Was not the falling-out from troops which were being marched before breakfast? Did not Sir Evelyn Wood report that as the principal cause?

MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: I have given the House all the information in my possession. If the hon. Member wishes any further details perhaps he will give notice.

PLEURO-PNEUMONIA IN CANADIAN CATTLE.

MR. W. WHITELOW (Perth): I beg to ask the President of the Board of Agriculture if he can state the history of the animal which is supposed to have infected a herd of cattle at Cambuslang with pleuro-pneumonia?

MR. H. GARDNER: The inquiries we have instituted go to show that the animal in question was taken from Dublin to Glasgow on the 22nd June last, and thence to Cambuslang. She was sent to Dundee on the 3rd July and remained there until she was slaughtered on the 21st July, and it was then that the fact that she was affected with pleuro-pneumonia was discovered. A large number of animals have been slaughtered, both in Ireland and Scotland, with which it is known that she had been in contact; but we have discovered nothing to show where the disease was contracted.

INSURANCE RATES IN BELFAST.

MR. E. M'HUGH (Armagh, S.): I beg to ask the President of the Board of Trade whether he has read the paragraph in The Irish News announcing that the Insurance Companies doing business in Belfast have raised the premiums as much as 50 per cent. on all fire insurances effected since July last; if he will ascertain from the companies why the Belfast merchants and traders are compelled to pay these enormously high premiums, which are in many cases over 100 per cent. higher than traders in Dublin and other towns have to pay; whether he has any information concerning the reason Belfast is the only city where the average clause is in force; and if he will use his good offices with the companies to induce them to put Belfast merchants on the same footing as traders in Dublin and other parts of Ireland, or at least to revert to the old rates and not to impose this additional tax on the Belfast traders, especially as the City Authorities are about to expend £30,000 in procuring the newest appliances for extinguishing fires?

MR. MUNDELLA: I understand that the Insurance Companies have raised their rates in Belfast because they did not pay; but the Board of Trade has nothing whatever to do with insurance rates.

MR. FLYNN (Cork, N.): Can the right hon. Gentleman say why the rates have been raised?

MR. MUNDELLA: I am told they have been raised. It is not a matter in which I can interfere.

FOREIGN AND COLONIAL MEAT.

MR. YERBURGH (Chester): I beg to ask the President of the Board of Agriculture whether he proposes to bring in a Bill to carry out the recommendations of the Lords' Committee upon the Marking of Foreign and Colonial Meat?

MR. MUNDELLA: The Report of this Committee has only just been circulated, and the evidence is not yet available, so that I have had no opportunity of considering it with my right hon. Friend the President of the Board of Agriculture. Under these circumstances, we are unable at present to make any statement on the subject.

MR. YERBURGH: When will some definite statement be made?

MR. MUNDELLA: It is evident none can be made till we have read and considered the evidence.

LAND LOANS IN IRELAND.

MR. T. CURRAN (Sligo, S.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether he is aware that a farmer named John Hannan, of Ballymote, County Sligo, applied to the Local Government Board for a loan of £50 under "The Land Law (Ireland) Act, 1881" (Section 31), and paid 10s. for preliminary expenses, and that on 18th May last the Local Government Board wrote to Mr. Hannan to say they were not in a position to consider his case; and will he see that the advance asked for will be made without unnecessary delay?

*SIR J. T. HIBBERT: Under existing regulations the minimum loan that can be granted by the Board of Works is £35, and the maximum amount which can be advanced in respect of any holding for which a judicial rent has been fixed is equal to three years' purchase of such judicial rent, or in this case £30. The applicants do not, therefore, qualify for the minimum loan, and have been so informed. The Board of Works will return the deposit of 10s.

THE CASE OF MAJOR RICHARDS.

ADMIRAL FIELD (Sussex, Eastbourne): I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury whether, in view of the evidence given by official witnesses from the Treasury and War Office before the Committee on Public Accounts, vide Second Report, July 1893, pages 51 to 58, relative to losses of stores in South Africa in 1886 to 1890, and to the supposed responsibility of Major Richards, late store officer in charge of military stores in Natal at Fort Napier, Pietermaritzburg, and Durban, and to the correspondence which followed between the War Office and Treasury upon the subject, notably the letters of 8th January and 8th April, 1892, from the War Office, setting forth the views of the Secretary of State for War and His Royal Highness the Commander-in-Chief, the Secretary to the Treasury will use his influence with the Lords of the Treasury to secure a reconsideration of Major Richards's case, and the withdrawal of their objection to his being placed on the ordinary half-pay of his rank?

SIR J. T. HIBBERT: The punishment inflicted on this officer of reduced half-pay was awarded spontaneously by the War Department. It is for that Department to reconsider it if the punishment was excessive. The only objections raised by the Treasury were to Major Richards's re-employment and to the write-off of the deficit on his accounts before the matter had been investigated by the Public Accounts Committee.

ADMIRAL FIELD: May I ask whether, as the Treasury have no objection to the restoration of Major Richards, the Secretary to the Treasury will use his influence with the Secretary of State for War to induce him to assume a less war-like attitude towards Major Richards?

SIR J. T. HIBBERT: I think the matter may be left with every confidence in the hands of my right hon. Friend.

SMOKELESS POWDER PATENTS.

MR. HANBURY: I beg to ask the Secretary of State for War whether, with a view to the introduction of a smokeless powder, certain private inventors were invited to send in particulars of their inventions to the War Department; whether these were submitted to a committee of experts, of which Sir F. Abel was a member, and were rejected; whether subsequently Sir F. Abel and Professor Dewar took out a patent for cordite, the manufacture of which for public reasons is kept a secret; whether, nevertheless, Sir F. Abel assigned the patent for use abroad to a foreign manufacturer, and whether this was done with the previous consent of the War Office; whether, in conjunction with Dr. Anderson, now Director of Ordnance Factories, he patented machinery for the manufacture of cordite; whether that machinery is now in use at the Government Factory; whether the orders for that machinery were given to Messrs. Easton, Anderson, and Co.; and what, at the time the order for such machinery was given or repeated, was the connection of the present Director of Ordnance Factories with that firm?

*MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN:

In reply to paragraphs 1 and 2 of the hon. Member's question, I have to say that in 1888, in the early stages of the inquiry regarding smokeless powder, one inventor was invited to submit samples. Several other explosives had previously been submitted to the Department, and others were sent in from time to time without special invitation. In 1890 several inventors, whose explosives were thus before the Department, were invited to submit samples for competitive trial, with each other and with cordite and walthamite, for use in the .303" rifle. These trials were carried out by the Explosives Committee, of which Sir F. Abel was President. The results having been submitted to and carefully considered by the Military Authorities, it was decided by them that cordite was distinctly superior to the other explosives, and its adoption was recommended to the Secretary of State. The answer to question 3 is that it was not subsequently to these trials of 1890 that the Abel-Dewar patents were taken out. They were taken out in 1889, and the British and Colonial patents were transferred to the Secretary of State. It is not the case that the manufacture of cordite is kept a secret. Certain firms who might be able to tender for its supply were, in fact, invited to inspect the process at Waltham; but as the question whether this manufacture is or is not an infringement of certain previous patents is now the subject of a suit in Court, it was thought right by the holders of those patents, as well as by the War Office, that the works should be for the present closed to the public. In regard to paragraph 4, Sir F. Abel and Professor Dewar did take out patents abroad and assigned them to a foreign manufacturer. The previous consent of the War Office was not asked for, but the fact was reported to the Department. As regards the fifth paragraph, the answer is, Yes, in conjunction also with Professor Dewar. The patent was applied for before Dr. Anderson joined the Government Service. On its completion, the patent was assigned to the Secretary of State, Dr. Anderson having been in the meantime appointed Director General of Ordnance Factories. The answer to paragraph 6 is, Yes. As to the last paragraph also, the answer is to the last.

in the affirmative. Some of these orders were given before Dr. Anderson joined the Department, the machinery being principally of his invention, and the firm having had large, and, to the War Office, most satisfactory, experience in supplying similar machinery for the Public Service. Since that time about one-third of the machinery has been supplied by Messrs. Easton and Anderson and two-thirds by the Royal Arsenal. Since Dr. Anderson joined the Service he has had no connection with the firm of Easton and Anderson.

MR. HANBURY: When the right hon. Gentleman says that this patent was applied for before Dr. Anderson joined the Public Service, is he aware that it was applied for on July 22, 1889; that Dr. Anderson joined the Public Service a week later, on August 1st, 1889; and that the specifications of the patent were not sent in till more than six months later?

*MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: I am not aware of the dates, but I may point out that in a case such as this the reason why it is desirable, when someone connected with a Government Department has made an invention useful for the Department, that he should be allowed to take out a patent, is obviously that it prevents its falling into other people's hands. As the inventor immediately assigns the patent to the Secretary of State, he gets no profit from it.

MR. HANBURY: I shall call attention to the matter on the Estimates.

MR. J. E. ELLIS (Nottingham, Rushcliffe): At the date of these transactions did the right hon. Gentleman occupy his present position, and is he responsible for them?

*MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: It is a matter of common knowledge, I should think. These questions are connected with a transaction for which I have no personal responsibility.

*SIR C. W. DILKE: What is the advantage of assigning the patent to the Secretary of State, seeing that it has been ceded also to foreign manufacturers?

MR. HANBURY: Was not the direct result of Dr. Anderson's taking out this patent that the manufacture of the machinery was given to the private firm in which Dr. Anderson was interested?

Mr. Campbell-Bannerman

*MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: This is a matter of argument which could better be dealt with when the subject is brought up on the Estimates. But the potential reason for the making of this machinery being given to the firm referred to was that that firm had already been employed more largely than any other by the War Office for making similar machinery. The machinery for manufacturing gun-cotton at Waltham Abbey was made by this firm, and gives great satisfaction.

THE LANARKSHIRE MAGISTRACY.

MR. JOHN WILSON (Govan): I beg to ask the Secretary for Scotland whether he is aware that 49 gentlemen were last week appointed Justices of the Peace for the County of Lanark; whether he would explain how it comes that there are on the list more than four Conservatives for every one who are supporters of the present Government; and whether, considering the dissatisfaction arising from this state of matters, steps will be taken to have the balance of Parties on the Commission of the Peace placed on a more equal footing?

THE SECRETARY FOR SCOTLAND (Sir G. TREVELYAN, Glasgow, Bridgeton): In answer to my hon. Friend, I beg to state that the Lord Chancellor is fully alive to the circumstances of the case, and hopes shortly to sign a fiat for further additions to the Commission.

PUCKLECHURCH SCHOOL BOARD.

MR. COLSTON (Gloucester, Thornbury): I beg to ask the Vice President of the Committee of Council on Education if he will state what inquiry was held in the case of Pucklechurch, Gloucestershire, before ordering the election of a School Board; and whether the managers of the voluntary schools had signified to the Education Department their intention to provide for any deficiency of school places which might arise from the closing of one of the schools?

THE VICE PRESIDENT OF THE COUNCIL (Mr. ACLAND, York, W.R., Rotherham): The Department made inquiry into the circumstances of the case through Her Majesty's Inspector, who visited the locality for that purpose.

The managers of the national schools signified the intention mentioned in the question. A Memorial signed by 65 residents and ratepayers, and showing a strong feeling in favour of the provision of a school by a School Board, had, however, been received by the Department; and it was, moreover, necessary to make immediate provision for about 120 children who had been attending the British school. This immediate provision, by means of the School Board taking over the British school, could only be supplied by action under Section 12 (2) of the Act of 1870, which was intended to meet such cases, and the Board was accordingly formed under that section.

CUSTOMS ACCOUNTS.

MR. THEOBALD (Essex, Romford):

I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury whether a system of warehouse accounts common to the Customs and Inland Revenue Departments was adopted with the approval of the Treasury in 1885, and whether the Treasury then ordered that no change should take place in this system without the joint approval of the respective Revenue Boards; whether this system of book-keeping has worked satisfactorily in the Inland Revenue Department; and whether the proposed alterations, involving the abolition of warehouse ledgers and the reduction of the checks against fraud in the Customs Outdoor Department, have been submitted to the Inland Revenue Board for approval?

SIR J. T. HIBBERT: The statement in the first paragraph is substantially correct, and the system of book-keeping has worked satisfactorily in the Inland Revenue Department. The changes in the Customs system were made with the full approval of the Treasury, and were notified to the Board of Inland Revenue. They were made on competent advice, with the object not of reducing, but of strengthening, the checks against fraud.

WAGES FOR GOVERNMENT LABOUR.

MR. DARLING: I beg to ask the President of the Board of Trade whether his attention has been called to a speech delivered on the 1st August by Mr. Sidney Webb, of the London County Council, to the men employed in the Victualling Yard at Deptford; whether it is the fact, as alleged by Mr. Webb, that the Labour Department of the Board of Trade had made a Report to the Government as to wages and hours of labour in the various Government Departments in London; whether it is the fact, as alleged by Mr. Webb, that such Report showed—and whether it is intended to publish such Report?

MR. MUNDELLA: The Report in question was prepared for the confidential information of a Committee of Her Majesty's Government. It is purely statistical; was never intended for publication; but was meant for the private use and guidance of the Departments concerned, who were represented on the Committee. The account of the Report referred to as given in the question is not accurate.

*MR. COHEN (Islington, E.): Can the right hon. Gentleman inform the House how this document, which he says was intended for private and confidential circulation, came into the hands of Mr. Sidney Webb?

MR. MUNDELLA: I have never heard that it ever did come into his hands. I should very much doubt if he ever had possession of it.

*MR. DARLING: Is the right hon. Gentleman aware that Mr. Sidney Webb in his speech used the words quoted in the latter part of the question—namely, that such Report showed

“Such a state of starvation wages in the Government Departments, and wide difference between Government rates and the current rate actually being paid outside, that the Government had not dared to publish the Report”?

MR. MUNDELLA: There was no letterpress in the document; it was purely statistical. It was not of the nature suggested, and was prepared for use at a private meeting of the Cabinet.

MR. DARLING: Does the right hon. Gentleman intend to suggest that Mr. Sidney Webb did not see the Report from which he quoted?

MR. MUNDELLA: I made no such suggestion; but I should like to ask the hon. and learned Member—[Cries of “Order!”—whether he means to say that Mr. Sidney Webb had a copy of the Report?

*MR. DARLING: I do not know Mr. Webb's means of information; I only saw his speech, which closed with the words — "The Government have not dared to publish the Report."

MR. MUNDELLA: The Government never intended to publish the Report. It was a purely confidential document.

COMMUNICATION WITH THE "NO" LOBBY.

MR. HAYDEN (Roscommon, S.): I beg to ask the First Commissioner of Works whether, with the view of facilitating the entrance of Members into the Chamber from various rooms of the House in order to take part in Divisions, he will during the Recess take into consideration the desirability of erecting a covered passage from the Tea Room or Reading Room to the "No" Lobby, by means of which much of the delay and inconvenience caused during the present Session would be avoided?

MR. SHAW LEFEVRE: I will consider the question during the Recess.

FACTORY INSPECTORS.

SIR J. GORST (Cambridge University): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department has the post of Deputy Superintending Inspector of Factories been recently instituted; and, if so, when; was the institution thereof notified at the time by Her Majesty's Chief Inspector of Factories to the inspecting staff, according to previous custom in the Department; and, if not, why not; and will he explain why the person appointed to the new office was afterwards promoted to be a full Superintending Inspector of Factories over the heads of some of the Inspectors, senior to himself, who hold records of the highest character as to the zeal and ability with which they have performed the duties of their office?

MR. ASQUITH: In consequence of the increased duties of the Department, it was deemed advisable last May to select one of the Factory Inspectors to act, as a temporary arrangement, for any of the Superintending Inspectors who might be absent on leave or for other causes; but this was a purely temporary Departmental arrangement, which it was not considered necessary to notify to the staff generally. A vacancy among the Superintending Inspectors is filled by the selection of the Inspector who is considered most suitable for the post, and not merely by seniority. In the recent appointment the same course has been adopted as on former occasions, and the selection of the particular Inspector involves no disparagement or want of appreciation of the ability or the services of the Inspector senior to himself. I may observe that the most senior of these gentlemen was less than a year senior to the Inspector who was promoted.

UNIVERSITY COLLEGE, BANGOR.

MR. TOMLINSON: I beg to ask the Vice President of the Committee of Council on Education whether, under the constitution of the University College of Bangor, there is any person or authority filling the office of Visitor; and whether, before the grant of £4,000 is voted by Parliament for the support of the College, he will take steps to secure that a Visitorial Inquiry shall be held into the grounds for the withdrawal from Miss Hughes of her licence to keep a hall in the College?

MR. ACLAND: There is no person or authority filling the office of Visitor at University College, Bangor. With reference to the latter part of the question, I can only repeat the reply given to a similar inquiry on the 14th instant namely, that I do not think that the fact that the College receives a Treasury grant of £4,000 provides any justification for the Government to undertake an inquiry or demand an inquiry in a matter which appears to be one of internal discipline.

MR. TOMLINSON: Is it not an exceptional thing for a College to have no Visitor? Will the right hon. Gentleman take steps to get one provided?

MR. ACLAND: That raises the question of the Charter granted to the College. I have no doubt there are a good many instances in modern times where no Visitor has been appointed.

MR. TOMLINSON: Will the right hon. Gentleman take steps to have one appointed in this case?

MR. ACLAND: I do not think it necessary to provide Visitors for these Colleges, which are going on very well.

MR. STANLEY LEIGHTON (Shropshire, Oswestry): The right hon.

Gentleman says the Colleges are going on well; but is that not the fact that the Duke of Westminster, Lord Penrhyn, and other persons of distinction have withdrawn in consequence of the false position taken by the Senate and the Council?

MR. KENYON (Denbigh, &c.): Are there not on the same side of politics as the gentlemen named others of equal standing ready to take the places of those who have withdrawn?

MR. ACLAND: I know nothing of the alleged withdrawals, but I quite believe that, if they have taken place, other gentlemen of position on the same side of politics will easily be found to fill the vacancies.

THE CROFTERS ACT.

DR. MACGREGOR (Inverness-shire): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether the Government will be able this Session to amend the Crofters' Act in so far as to include leaseholders paying an annual rental of £30 and under within the benefits of the Act?

THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY (MR. W. E. GLADSTONE, Edinburgh, Midlothian): As already stated, the Government approve the object mentioned in the question, and are anxious to give it their support; but, in the present state of their engagements, they are not able to make any further statement on the subject.

THE CONVICT GALLAGHER.

CAPTAIN SINCLAIR (Dumbarton): I beg to ask the Home Secretary a question of which I have given him private notice—whether the statement which appears in The Star of this evening, to the effect that Dr. Gallagher, a prisoner in Portland, has been released on the ground of insanity, is accurate?

MR. ASQUITH: There is not a shadow of foundation for that statement. From reports which reach me Dr. Gallagher is a person in very sound health, and exhibits no trace of mental infirmity. There is no intention whatever to release him.

NEW MEMBER SWORN.

Charles Wallwyn Radcliffe Cooke, esquire, for the Borough of Hereford.

ORDERS OF THE DAY.

GOVERNMENT OF IRELAND BILL. (No. 428.)

CONSIDERATION. [NINTH NIGHT.]

Bill, as amended, further considered.

*MR. VICARY GIBBS (Herts, St. Albans) said, he rose to move in Clause 3, page 2, line 23, to leave out "legal tender," in order to insert "currency." The Chancellor, of the Exchequer, at an earlier stage, had stated that he would consider whether any safeguards as to currency, and, if so, what, should be brought forward; and as they had since heard nothing from the right hon. Gentleman on the subject he thought he was justified in raising the question, so that the Government might have an opportunity of explaining their views on the matter. No harm would happen through giving the Irish Legislature power over the currency if they did not make an immoderate use of paper. But experience showed that every Government, at any rate, any needy Government always did resort sooner or later to an over-issue of paper. There was no precedent to be found in the civilised world that he knew of for a Central Authority delegating to a subordinate body the power of issuing an unlimited number of notes without providing security for their payment. The right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer had said, in reply to the right hon. Baronet the Member for the University of London (Sir J. Lubbock), that there was no necessity for any such uniformity of currency as would come into effect if the Amendment were accepted, and that if the Irish Legislature desired to issue £1 notes or £2 notes he did not see why they should not be allowed to do so. Such a currency already existed in Scotland, no doubt; but he thought it very desirable that they should do whatever they could to make the currency uniform. The Chancellor of the Exchequer, in his answer, appeared to miss the essence of the case. This was not a question of the form of the currency, but that the basis on which that currency was issued should be the same in the three parts of the United Kingdom. Speaking for the commercial classes, especially in the North of Ireland, he submitted that great injury would be caused to trade and commerce if the Irish Government were suddenly to contract the right of private banks to issue notes and to over-issue Government notes. If a large issue of notes took place in Ireland it would have a tendency to drive out gold, and consequently to cripple the purchasing power of the country as well as trade between the two countries. He denied that the Amendment, if adopted, would be humiliating to Ireland any more than the Government proposal. It merely proposed to carry out what was admittedly the object of the Government, and was not in any way opposed to the spirit of the Bill. It could not be said that the Amendment was opposed to the general principle of the Bill, which was to give the Irish Government control over purely local matters. It seemed to him quite as important to safeguard the currency as to safeguard legal tender. He did not suppose the Irish Legislature would desire to issue its own notes; but if the Bill passed without this Amendment, it was probable that they would guarantee the notes of a State bank. As happened in other democratic countries, there would be an agitation set on foot for the establishment of a State bank, supported by the guarantee of the Irish Government, and the tendency would be to give it an undue preference over the existing Irish banks. The way in which it would be done would be this—the Irish Legislature would supplement the insufficient reserve which they would compel the State bank to keep against the issue of notes, by their own guarantee; they would stop the issue of notes by other banks, or increase the severity of the present restrictions upon such issue. The Irish people would be perfectly ready to accept the State bank paper, and a large amount of it would get into circulation, there being no real reserve or protection to the holders of the paper, the security being simply the power of the Irish Government to tax the people. The establishment of such a system would give enormous power to a Government that would be stronger in eloquence than in finance—power in the matter of overdrafts and so on. A bank scandal might arise, everybody would rush to the State bank to convert their notes into gold. There would be enormous pressure for gold, and the State bank would get into difficulties. That, however, would not be the worst. Pressure, which the House of Commons would be unable to resist, would be brought to bear in favour of repealing that part of the Bill which restricted the Irish Government from dealing with matters relating to "legal tender," and that not at the instance of the Irish Legislature, but of the holders of the State paper, who, obviously, would find themselves ruined. It was on this account, and because it seemed to him that it was a necessary and proper development of the proviso the Government had themselves introduced, that he ventured again to press the Amendment on the House. There would be, of course, many other inconveniences that would react on English trade resulting from interference by the Irish Government with the Currency Laws. How had the Amendment been received in Committee by the Irish Members? The hon. Member for the County of Dublin had spoken at length on the subject, and had poured forth the vials of his wrath upon the right hon. Baronet the Member for the University of London and the right hon. Gentleman the late Chancellor of the Exchequer for the manner in which they had argued in favour of that Amendment. The hon. Member had declared that the proposal was insulting to Ireland. That was an unreasonable statement, seeing that the proposal was only made in the interests of sound commerce. And the hon. Member had said that the Irish Legislature did not require to be lectured by Lombard Street; that England had degraded the currency—though he had omitted to say how—and that when Ireland got Home Rule she would teach banking to England. That was what he (Mr. Vicary Gibbs) was very much afraid of—that Ireland would give us very striking illustrations of how banking ought not to be conducted. He would suggest to the hon. Member the adoption of a little more modesty in the expression of his views—

*MR. H. H. FOWLER: Order, order!

*MR. VICARY GIBBS: Why am I out of Order?

*MR. H. H. FOWLER: The hon. Member is replying to a speech made in Committee.

*MR. VICARY GIBBS said, he did not know that that course was out of Order, and he, therefore, apologised for what he had said. He would only express a hope that the Government would recognise that the Amendment was not brought forward vexatiously, or with the idea of obstruction, but in the desire that the Government would see their way to carry out that which the Chancellor of the Exchequer led the Committee to believe they might hope to see carried out, and so remove a serious source of danger if the Bill became law in the form in which it now stood.

Amendment proposed, in page 2, line 23, to leave out the words "legal tender," in order to insert the word "currency."
—(Mr. Vicary Gibbs.)

Question proposed, "That the words 'legal tender' stand part of the Bill."

THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY (Mr. W. E. GLADSTONE, Edinburgh, Midlothian): As the hon. Member has pointed out, the Chancellor of the Exchequer stated that he would not lose sight of this question, but would endeavour to make sure that the enactment in the Bill was a sound one. Well, the result of the consideration of this subject promised by my right hon. Friend is that the Government think it quite right that there should be uniformity of tender and uniformity of coinage in the three countries; and to that proposition, as I understand, the Irish Representatives have given their cordial assent. But outside the question of coinage and legal tender there is the question of voluntary currency; and that voluntary currency exists in this country, in Scotland, and in Ireland under the authority of the State, but, though under the authority of the State, having no special virtue. There is no special wisdom in our legislation about the notes of private banks in any of the three countries; it is the result of accident and of the fact that great difficulties have been found to attend the removal of the system, which is a very indifferent system and has no particular recommendation at all, while it deprives the State, in point of fact, of a most legitimate Revenue to which it is entitled from the profit of this circulation. I myself, when Chancellor of the Exchequer, made a very earnest effort to try and amend that state of things; but on the Third Reading of my Bill I failed in the effort. That was about 30 years ago, and nobody since has thought fit to attempt the same invidious office. The Irish Legislature may have a great deal more youthful vigour for this practical purpose than we have, and it is possible they may do good, and, without injustice to anybody, may secure a perfectly honest and unexceptionable Revenue from the voluntary currency in Ireland, though we have failed, or almost failed, to do it; and our legislation on the whole matter, though good in certain points—notably the Bank Charter Act of 1844—yet has not been developed, and has never been anything but a bungling business. I hope the Irish may manage these matters better than we have done—they cannot very well manage them worse. But, Sir, to take this matter out of Irish hands, in my opinion, would be most unjust; whether they manage it well or ill is a matter for the Irish to consider. They should be allowed to exercise their own discretion; and when they come to be invested with the power of domestic government, whatever may be the course taken by Ulster Members and anti-Nationalists, I believe they will stand up firmly for their prerogatives, and will endeavour to make honest gains at the expense of nobody, under sound principles of commercial law—of course, without invading the provisions of the Statute in respect of coinage and legal tender. The Government, therefore, are at issue with the hon. Member on this subject, and must adhere to the Bill.

MR. GOSCHEN (St. George's, Hanover Square): Although I believe it is not so absolutely out of Order on the Report stage to refer to speeches made in Committee as the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Local Government Board appears to suppose, I do not myself propose to allude to the Debate which took place on a previous occasion, except to refer, as the right hon. Gentleman did himself, to the declaration of the Chancellor of the Exchequer, on the force of which the Amendment was withdrawn. I regret that the Government have not seen their way to meet the views of the Opposition in any degree. What we put forward was this—that the powers which this Bill gives of issuing inconvertible currency ought not to be given, at all events—

MR. W. E. GLADSTONE: Not convertible currency.

MR. GOSCHEN : Yes ; inconvertible currency.

MR. W. E. GLADSTONE : Inconvertible currency means an instrument that cannot be converted, but is made so by the law.

MR. GOSCHEN : I do not know whether hon. and right hon. Gentlemen have thought out the force of that definition ; but I think it will be admitted that generally speaking among financiers, in common parlance, the idea of inconvertible currency is a currency that cannot be converted into gold or silver when desired. However, the right hon. Gentleman objects to my words, and I will, therefore, put the matter into the plainest possible language. Under this Bill, the Irish Government will have the power of issuing any number of bank notes without holding any reserve of gold or silver for it. The right is to be given to this Government to issue paper money without its being represented by specie. I think that is a power which it is dangerous to give, not to Irishmen alone—for I do not suspect them in this case—but a Government which is likely to be in financial difficulties. ["Oh !"] Hon. Gentlemen below the Gangway say "Oh !" but I thought that was their view.

MR. FLYNN (Cork, N.) : You argue the other way.

MR. GOSCHEN : I think it very likely that the Irish Government may get into financial difficulties, and that we shall not get from them what we ought to get. The Irish Government might find itself in difficulties, and it is suggested that provisions should be inserted in the Bill which would remove the greatest part of the danger which we foresee. My right hon. Friend is opposed to the proposal not only from an English or an Irish point of view, but because he has an old quarrel with the issues of £1 notes in Scotland, and a still greater quarrel with the issues of private banks in this country. These banks defeated my right hon. Friend—I regret they did defeat him—a good many years ago, and he has since some prejudice against the existing banking system. But I think it will be a surprise to the public to hear from my right hon. Friend that we have a bad banking system, and that he looks to the representatives of the tenant farmers of Ireland as more likely to establish a sound system of currency than the Imperial Parliament with all its great traditions, and under his own guidance. I cannot bear to hear my right hon. Friend always attacking his own reputation, because if the English banking system is bad why is it that we are not in a better position, considering that my right hon. Friend, apart from the question of private issues, has had universal power during the last 50 years ? No doubt during the last few years my right hon. Friend has been very much occupied with other matters ; but he has had greater opportunities than any other man in the House to carry out improvements in the banking system.

MR. W. E. GLADSTONE : I think our banking system is admirable.

MR. GOSCHEN : But my right hon. Friend used the very words that we might, perhaps, take lessons in banking from the Irish Legislature. That is an attack, not only on the Parliament, which he now frequently indulges in, but an attack on my right hon. Friend's own past. But there is another consideration. What is to be the position of this country and of Scotland if Members from Ireland are to vote upon the English and Scotch currency system, while English and Scotch Members will not have power to interfere with the Irish currency at all ? This might be done. In England and Scotland we may sustain the present system by the help of the votes of the Irish Members, while that very same system might be abolished in Ireland by the influence of the very same gentlemen ; for while my right hon. Friend is anxious to give the Irish Members an entirely free hand to deal with the currency and banking system in Ireland, he will allow 83 of them to come over here, and perhaps affect by their votes the position of the Bank of England with which they would not be connected in any way. I can understand that each country should have power to deal with its own currency ; but that Ireland only should be allowed to deal with its own currency, and that England and Scotland should be placed in a disadvantageous position in respect of theirs as compared with Ireland, is a thing I cannot understand. If this Bill should not pass, and Her Majesty's Government should introduce another, I hope they will consider how the question of the currency may be dealt with in a manner less open to objection.

*MR. VICARY GIBBS said, he wished to have the ruling of Mr. Speaker on a point of Order. It was whether he was in Order in referring, as he had done a while ago, to a speech made in Committee on the same question?

*THE PRESIDENT OF THE LOCAL GOVERNMENT BOARD (Mr. H. H. FOWLER, Wolverhampton, E.) had objected to the hon. Member's remarks as being out of Order, and for the guidance of their future discussions he desired to have a ruling of Mr. Speaker on the point.

MR. SPEAKER : The practice is not to refer to previous Debates on other subjects in the same Session ; but it is in Order to refer to previous Debates on the subject. It is a question of degree. The hon. Member referred in detail to a speech at great length, and in doing so he was scarcely within the rule of Order.

*MR. H. H. FOWLER : My reason for calling "Order" was that the hon. Member was replying to a speech delivered in Committee, item by item and argument by argument, and I submitted that that was not in Order.

MR. COURTNEY (Cornwall, Bodmin) said, that he had not taken part in the discussion of this point in Committee, not because he had had no sympathy with the Amendment, but because he had looked forward with hope to the exclusion of the Irish Members from the Imperial Parliament under Home Rule ; and, under these circumstances, he had felt some difficulty in asserting that the Irish Legislature should not have the power of dealing with the currency in their own country. But, the proposal to exclude the Irish Members having been defeated, they were now to proceed on the basis that the Irish Members were to remain in the House ; and, that being the case, the point was whether the question of currency in Ireland should be referred to the Imperial Parliament, of which the Irish Members were to form a part, or to the Irish Legislature alone. With respect to the Motion he felt some difficulty. The hon. Member proposed to omit "legal tender" in order to insert "currency." He thought it difficult to exclude legal tender, although there was no difficulty in including currency in the excluded subjects. The Irish Legislature might have power to determine what was legal tender without having any power to deal with currency. They might have an unlimited power of making silver money legal tender ; but he doubted whether his right hon. Friend the Member for St. George's (Mr. Goschen) would think that that was a reasonable power to give to the Irish Legislature. Let legal tender remain, and then the question arose whether currency should be added to the subjects with which the Irish Legislature was not to deal?

MR. GOSCHEN : I look upon the word "currency" as including "legal tender." It will include any notes that would be legal tender.

MR. COURTNEY said that, in his opinion, currency did not include legal tender. But the question raised by the Amendment was whether the Irish Legislature should have the power of regulating the currency. The Prime Minister based his opposition to the Amendment on two grounds : first, the difficulty of making the currency of the three portions of the United Kingdom uniform ; and, secondly, his own difficulty in completing Sir R. Peel's Act when he was defeated on the Bill he laid before Parliament in 1867. But the fact that they had not been able to make the currency of the three portions of the United Kingdom uniform was no reason why they should not press on to that end. Up to the period of the Civil War in America the note issues were regulated by each State, the laws varying from State to State ; and the consequence was that a very considerable amount of confusion was produced in the internal trade and commerce of the American Union. It was the war legislation which provided national banks and greenbacks, and the national banks did then, for the first time, create a uniform system of currency throughout the American Union. Why should not we strive to make the law of the United Kingdom the same in all its parts with respect to the issue of notes? The Prime Minister referred in severe terms to the opposition that the bankers who had privileged issues brought to bear against the Bill of 1867. The right hon. Gentleman could never forgive those unfortunate bankers for having rallied their forces so strongly as to defeat that Bill. But he must know that the position or attitude of private bankers, joint-stock bankers in England having privileged issues, was very different now from what it was in 1867—that a large number of such bankers had abandoned their privileges, and that it would be a comparatively easy matter now to take steps which should altogether get rid of the private privileges with respect to issue which were still enjoyed by the surviving bankers, and to establish, as far as England was concerned, a really State-regulated currency. He thought it might be possible, moreover, to bring Ireland and Scotland into the same system. What he conceived to be the real danger which would arise in Ireland in regard to this matter if the Bill became law in its present form was that probably something would be done in imitation of the national bank system in the United States, leading, perhaps, to a depreciated currency, which would operate very much to the injury of Ireland and the disorganisation of her trade with Great Britain. He did not see why the Irish Members should object to work with other Members in an effort to obtain a uniform law for the whole of the United Kingdom as to the issue of notes. The difficulties in the way of getting uniform legislation on this subject from the Imperial Parliament affecting all parts of the United Kingdom were not, in his judgment, so serious now as they had been, and he thought it might be obtained in a reasonable time, and in a manner which would be satisfactory to each part of the United Kingdom. It was certainly inadvisable that there should be a separate system of currency in different parts of the United Kingdom. He would support the Amendment if it were altered to include legal tender.

*MR. COHEN (Islington, E.) said, he would not have the boldness of venturing to decide whether currency included legal tender or not; but they were desirous of depriving the Irish Legislature of the power of dealing with currency as well as legal tender, and he had the authority of the hon. Member for St. Albans (Mr. Vicary Gibbs) for saying that he would prefer to vary his Amendment so as simply to add the word "currency" to the words "legal tender." He had heard the speech of the Prime Minister with great surprise. Over and over again the right hon. Gentleman had told them that the object of the Bill was to give Ireland the control of matters entirely affecting her domestic affairs, and to reserve to the Imperial Parliament all subjects affecting International relations. He could conceive no question—and he had some little experience in International Exchanges—which could more affect the International relations of a country than its currency. For his own part, he would prefer to withhold both legal tender and currency from the Irish Legislature; but if he had to make a choice he would give the Irish Parliament power to control legal tender, and certainly reserve to the Imperial Parliament, in the interest of Ireland itself, absolute, complete, unfettered control of the currency. The currency included paper money, and he ventured to say that no greater disaster could overtake a country than a depreciated paper currency. It was perfectly certain that if, no matter for what reason, there was to be an inflated and depreciated currency in Ireland, every farthing of gold or silver or other metal available for the currency would automatically and irresistibly leave the country, and this would possibly lead to a state of things from which Ireland would suffer terribly. It was, therefore, in the interest of Ireland that he urged the acceptance of the Amendment.

*MR. R. B. MARTIN (Worcester, Droitwich), who was most imperfectly heard, was understood to say that the danger would be in regard to the concessions to banks all over the country for note issue, a system which, to a large extent, they had got rid of in England. Note issue by private banks was a very useful form of currency, but one that was dangerous for new Governments and opposed to the present doctrines of political economy. He thought there would be a great temptation to raise money by making concessions to banks for power to issue notes—a temptation that was not altogether for the good of a country. It was, probably, not generally known that in Scotland and Ireland there was no legal tender but the English sovereign. The £1 notes, which were so convenient in form and amount, and some of them so objectionable in personal appearance, were not a legal tender; and though universally accepted by the country as being as good as a sovereign, they had had experience in Scotland that that was not always the case, and when there was some doubt and difficulty about accepting the notes of Scotch banks as sufficient. In Ireland it would be most inconvenient to the trade, and a source of great anxiety, if there was power granted to issue bank notes in one part of Ireland and power refused to issue them in another portion. He, therefore, hoped the Government would accept the Amendment, and not allow these difficulties to be introduced into Ireland. He hoped that the Government would include currency as well as legal tender in the exemption, leaving both of those matters to be treated by the Imperial Parliament, and not by any local Government set up either in Ireland, Wales, or Scotland.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR (Manchester, E.): My right hon. Friend the Member for Bodmin (Mr. Courtney) has startled us all by suggesting the doubt whether this Amendment carries out the meaning it had in the minds of my hon. Friend who moved it, and us who intend to support it. My right hon. Friend seems to think a case might arise in which it would be possible for the Irish Government to deal with legal tender without dealing with currency, and the particular case he put forward was—could they not consider their currency a legal tender for all parts? I am advised that that would be a case of dealing with the currency; that in reality the words proposed by my hon. Friend not only carries out the meaning he wishes, but preserves the old meaning the Government desire to give to the Bill. I admit this is a question chiefly for lawyers, and that no general agreement of interpretation can, therefore, be accepted; but I hope that my right hon. Friend will not abstain from supporting this Amendment on the very doubtful ground he has taken, because, by the Rules of the House, I believe it would not be possible to substitute the new forms he suggests, and which, I am ready to admit, more satisfactorily carry out the object in view. Well, Sir, I leave that which is the question affecting the limitation of the Amendment, and come, in the few words I mean to make, to the line taken by the Government on this question; and I cannot help having a dark suspicion that the pledge or the undertaking given by the Chancellor of the Exchequer was, perhaps, not very seriously considered between the day on which he gave it and the day on which it is to be redeemed. I do not greatly blame the Government, for I admit that occasionally I am brought face to face with some hasty observations of my own on previous stages of the Bill, and I do not wish to unfairly criticise or make any observations approaching bad faith as to the line they have taken; but I am forced to believe they have not very carefully considered this question, because, from the whole speech of the Prime Minister, it is perfectly evident, not that he did not see we had a legitimate object in view, but thought this Amendment, if carried, would produce certain advantages of which he did not approve. He laid it down the Irish Government should be allowed to deal with the question of note issue from private banks—if you carried this Amendment it would prevent them. I will not argue the question whether the Irish Government ought to have that power; but I think it is arguable whether they should have that power; and if the Government had devoted much time and attention to this question, they could have found a method that would have left the Irish Government power to deal with this question of private note issue in Ireland and prevented them making that unlimited issue which, if not a legal tender, would be a customary tender, and which is the main danger we have to anticipate. So far as I recollect the speech of the right hon. Gentleman at the head of the Government, he did not touch on the danger of this unlimited or excessive note issue; yet does not the whole history of the world, and the history of Ireland in particular, show that is a danger from which they may not have immunity? The right hon. Gentleman is fond of crediting the Irish people with special capacities for government—

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: Then with great capacity.

MR. W. E. GLADSTONE: I merely protested against placing them on a level lower than that of human beings.

AN hon. MEMBER: Hottentots.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: Hottentots are human beings, but I am not aware what the lower order of animals have to do with note issues or bank currency. I may be permitted to say that I do not think that what we know of Irish history indicates that they have exceptional aptitudes in the direction of commerce or trade. Their great gifts—and they have great gifts—lie in a less prosaic direction; and when the Assembly of this almost purely agricultural country has to deal with these questions of currency and tender, I do not see any reason for anticipating they will show greater wisdom than has been shown by their forefathers. Then let it be admitted, as it must be admitted, that if this Bill passes as it stands, it will be in the power of the Irish Government to make their note issue a customary issue, an issue which the habits and traditions of the people will make them readily accept as money, and make that either absolutely inconvertible or, it may be, far in excess of any metallic basis which may rest as the foundation of the note issue. If they did this Ireland would suffer from all the evils necessarily incident on convertible currency. So far as the great commercial interests of Belfast and Dublin require protection—so far as this country is concerned—if there was not an excessive currency, it would produce nothing but local injury, and they might be allowed to work out their own salvation in these matters, and go through a little experience of the local views of this question. But it would not be a local injury; an injury of this kind must spread to Great Britain, and would not only spread to Great Britain in the form of an interference with the trade between the two Islands, but probably would come before us in a far more concrete and dangerous form; and I certainly anticipate that now you have brought the Irish 80 Members into Parliament, if they find themselves in their own country face to face with the probable consequences of their own imprudence in these matters, they will come to us for relief. They will point out with perfect truth that it is not to the interests of the United Kingdom that one of its members should be insolvent; that it was an injury not to Ireland merely, but to Scotland and England, and they would say to you—“You, with your great wealth behind you, must come and help us in our difficulties. We acted for the best, but they have not come up to our anticipations, and we ask you to relieve us.” You would have to relieve them, and the result, therefore, of leaving to the Irish Legislature an unlimited power of dealing with a customary note issue—a power they would have a temptation to abuse—would be, in the long run, to inflict an injury not confined to Ireland alone, or to the commercial interests of England and Scotland, in so far as they are dependent on Ireland. The evil we should have to deal with within these walls, and it would touch the pockets of every taxpayer in Great Britain.

*MR. VICARY GIBBS moved the following Amendment:—

The hon. Member said that, although this Amendment was perhaps not so important as that upon which the House had just divided, yet he was convinced that if it were not adopted serious inconvenience to, and restrictions on, trade might follow. Bills of exchange at the present moment were governed by the Act of 1882, which codified the law and made it uniform throughout the Three Kingdoms; and it appeared to him, if this Amendment were not accepted, it would be in the power of the Irish Government to take a retrograde step against the interests of the general trade of the Three Kingdoms by making alterations in the law relating to bills of exchange, and so destroying the uniformity which they had been at so much pains to obtain, which had done so much to stop litigation on that complicated subject, and given so much satisfaction to the commercial classes. The Prime Minister said it was necessary that uniformity of Commercial Law should prevail throughout these Islands. If they had a separate Parliament for Ireland he (Mr. Gibbs) was sure it would not prevail, but, at the same time, he considered it their duty to make it prevail where it was at all possible to do so. When the attention of the Prime Minister was called to the remarks to which he had referred, the right hon. Gentleman implied that these bills related to internal trade, and that what he had said had nothing to do with internal trade. But that was in contradiction to the remarks of the Chancellor of the Exchequer, who, when certain inconveniences were pressed upon him that might result from alterations of the law in Ireland, pointed out that the Irish Government were prohibited from dealing with any matters of trade outside Ireland, so that this prohibition would apply to exchange of bills if they were matters of trade outside Ireland, as he (Mr. Gibbs) believed they were. They might be, as the Prime Minister had implied, matters of internal trade, but they were not purely matters of internal trade. What would be the position, if this Bill became law, of the holders of bills of exchange, whether drawn in Ireland on England or in England on Ireland? They had two classes of bills—English and foreign bills. They knew perfectly well when they were holders of either one or the other what their position and rights were. Bills after they were drawn and accepted were discounted and re-discounted, endorsed and re-endorsed, and they formed one of the principal features in modern commerce. What he wanted to know was, whether the Government had thought this matter out, and considered what inconveniences and disadvantages might arise if the Irish Government were to be allowed to deal with the laws as to bills of exchange as separate from the laws of the United Kingdom on the subject? Take the case of a bill drawn in Cork on London. The Irish drawer drew on an English acceptor and discounted the bill. The discounter now took into consideration not merely the credit of the English acceptor, who was the first person he could go against to recover the money expended in discounting the bill, but also the credit of the Irish drawer, whom he knew he could afterwards go against if the acceptor failed. But what would be the position suppose the Irish Government passed some law which had the effect of making it easier for the Irish drawer to escape his ultimate liability under the bill? Suppose they were to say that something should constitute laches in the action of the holder of a bill in endeavouring to recover from the acceptor, and that something should release the drawer which did not release him now, the effect of that would be to make Irish bills drawn in Ireland on England of a different character from an ordinary inland bill; they would thus be less acceptable to the discounting houses, and consequently tend to restrict trade between England and Ireland, and would injure, pro tanto, the two countries. Take, again, a bill which was drawn in London on Dublin. The drawer drew on the man in Dublin, and then discounted the bill. When the time came for the due date of the bill, the holder sent the bill to Dublin in order to collect the money. Supposing that the money was not paid; that some Irish law was passed, and that under this law the holder, in the process of endeavouring to recover against the drawer, failed to do something, or did a thing which he should not do, and which again constituted laches according to the view of the Irish law on the subject. The effect of that would be to release all the solvent endorsers of the bill, and let them go free. If the Irish Parliament had a right to alter the law of bills of exchange, they might make such alterations as would put these bills of exchange in a different position from ordinary English bills, and thus constitute a third class of bills which City men would have to consider and learn all about. He could not see why the Government should not accept this Amendment. When the matter was discussed in Committee this subject of bills of exchange was coupled with the question of Irish banks, which were both put in one Amendment so as to save time. It appeared to him that there was an infinitely stronger case for depriving the Irish Legislature of the right of interfering with the law on bills of exchange than of depriving them of the right of legislation with regard to banks. It would be a great disadvantage to the commercial classes in England if an Irish Parliament were to be allowed to legislate separately on this matter. The Government might say that if the Irish Parliament altered the law, those who were interested in the matter should make themselves acquainted with the alteration. It was quite enough for them to be expected to know their own law, without being compelled to follow any operations of the law in Ireland connected with bills of exchange. When speaking on this subject in Committee the Chancellor of the Exchequer said the exception of trade was an exception from the powers of the Irish Legislature which would be operative upon both classes of bills; and if the matter were connected with trade, as that was excepted, it would prevent it being acted upon by the Irish Legislature. Such being the case, he could not conceive any reason for the Government declining to accept the Amendment, which was certainly not in any way injurious or insulting to the people of Ireland. There was a much stronger reason now for its acceptance than there was when it was originally introduced, for since then a radical alteration had been made in the Bill. It had been decided that they were to retain the Irish Members in that House. These Irish Members would be able to express their opinions on the matter, point out any alterations in the law which would be of advantage to the people of Ireland, and their representations would have due weight in that House. He hoped, therefore, the Government would re-consider their position in the matter. He begged to move the Amendment.

Amendment proposed,

In page 2, line 23, after the words "legal tender," to insert the words "bills of exchange."
—(Mr. Vicary Gibbs.)

Question proposed, "That the words 'bills of exchange' be there inserted."

MR. W. E. GLADSTONE: I regret that the hon. Gentleman has found himself compelled by a sense of duty to raise anew this question, which was fully debated in Committee, notwithstanding the recommendation from the Chair that questions disposed of in Committee should not be revived unless in the case of principal points. I hardly suppose this will be said to be a principal point, and I am very sorry a recommendation from the Chair, in other circumstances so powerful, appears to be of very small value when it tends to expedite, or at least to relieve from the snail's pace—which appears to be the intended law of proceeding—the progress of the Bill. However, Sir, I will say a word or two in answer to the hon. Member. I think he has urged no argument whatever which ought to induce the Government to alter the Bill. His argument with reference to the unlimited vote of the Irish Members would, if admitted, be an argument for withdrawing one by one all the powers conferred on the Irish Legislature by the Bill. The Bill has already been affirmed in principle, and Amendments like this seem intended to destroy it in detail. As to bills of exchange they are really a portion of internal trade. The first aspect of a bill of exchange is that of an instrument intended to facilitate internal commerce; and although the use of bills of exchange in foreign matters has become most important, and for all I know possibly predominating, yet that was not their original purpose. As regards inland bills of exchange, they are matters wholly, absolutely, and purely Irish; yet the hon. Gentleman seeks by his Amendment to take them out of the hands of the Irish Legislature. We have assented to withhold from the Irish Legislature the management of matters connected with foreign trade, but we cannot assent to the management of internal trade being withheld. To show how a question of this kind allies itself with the general question of self-government, I may point out that a few years ago we found it expedient in this House to introduce in our laws a system of what were called Bank Holidays, and they rest upon this legal basis: that bills of exchange presentable on days that are Bank Holidays are not to be paid on those days, but on the day following. Suppose that in Ireland the Irish Legislature were disposed to make any law of its own relating to Bank Holidays—and that, I presume, will not be considered a very startling or revolutionary proceeding—they would not be able, if this proposal were adopted, to make those laws. Under the Amendment they would not have the power to provide that bills payable on those holidays should stand over till the following day. The Amendment constitutes a pure and gratuitous innovation on the idea of self-government which the Government intend to apply to Ireland, and which the House, by repeated votes on questions of principle, intends to apply to Ireland. With regard to foreign bills, the whole argument of the hon. Gentleman proceeded upon the invidious—to use no stronger term—suggestion that the Irish Legislature would exercise its ingenuity to devise means to enable debtors to evade meeting their obligations, and upon that Christianlike supposition the hon. Member draws the inference that great inconvenience would arise to creditors of Irishmen who had the misfortune to live under a swindling Legislature. My point is that the hon. Gentleman has no right to impute anything of the kind to the Irish people. In my opinion the Irish, taken upon the whole, have been singularly remarkable for their willingness to meet their pecuniary obligations and for the sacrifices they have undergone in order to do so. I do not think there is any other country equal to Ireland in that respect. But putting that imputation aside, the same difficulties to which the hon. Gentleman refers are to be met with in the case of bills payable in France and other foreign countries. The hon. Gentleman said it was hard enough to know the law of his own country; but does he not require to know the laws of France, Holland, Germany, and other foreign countries and the law of every colony? I do not believe the hon. Gentleman has lost an hour's sleep in his life through any difficulty arising out of a want of knowledge on that point. The truth is, that it is the strong desire of every State on the face of the earth which pretends to civilised methods to forward and promote the use of these bills, and all have tried to construct a system under which their bills should work and run throughout the world. Why should Ireland be made an exception? Why should it be supposed that Ireland should endeavour to put a stop to a system which gives easy currency to bills of exchange? Notwithstanding the multiplicity of systems, no practical inconvenience exists or has ever been experienced since the Lombards invented their splendid system. The Government cannot accept the Amendment of the hon. Gentleman.

MR. GOSCHEN: I regret that my right hon. Friend should, whenever a speech is made on this side of the House—especially if it is a speech of some detail going fairly and frankly into the whole matter—endeavour to create a prejudice against that speech by such observations as he is continually making, trying to arouse Irish feeling against what is said on this side of the House. Was it necessary in a case of the kind, dealing with so dry a subject as bills of exchange, that my right hon. Friend should endeavour to exaggerate and put into the mouth of my hon. Friend behind me charges against the Irish people or the Irish Legislature which he never made, and which he never thought of making? My right hon. Friend has got the idea on the brain that in everything we say we are running down Ireland, and there is not a single point he can treat except from that view. And here, again, I will join with him if he wishes in commending the desire of the Irish people to pay their debts. But why dwell upon this as in contrast to Great Britain? It is as if the right hon. Gentleman had become so absolutely not the Prime Minister of England, but the advocate of the Irish people, that he can see nothing good in the English Parliament, nothing but what is offensive in the speeches of hon. Members on this side of the House, and nothing here which would afford a fair precedent for the Government which he proposes to establish in Ireland. I really regret that my right hon. Friend should have thought it necessary on this occasion to endeavour to create that feeling which, I am sure, most of us are not anxious to import into this discussion. Then my right hon. Friend censured my hon. Friend behind me, and alluded to observations from the Chair that it was undesirable that the same matters should be repeated again on Report which had been dealt with in Committee. I think that the number of Amendments on Clause 3, compared with the Amendments in Committee, will show my right hon. Friend that there are comparatively few matters that have been urged again. To-day we have urged two matters over again—namely, the questions of currency and bills of exchange. And why? Because in the case of currency the Chancellor of the Exchequer had given us some hope of amendment—not very definite, but which justified us in raising this point again, and I do not think we have dealt with it at great length. I will tell the Prime Minister why we have urged this point as to bills of exchange. We thought on the last occasion that we had almost converted the Government, and we thought that one little push more might really bring the Prime Minister to accept the Amendment. I believe there are many of his

hon. Friends behind him who would be glad if he would accept this particular Amendment, and I know there are few points on which I should like to pit myself in argument against my right hon. Friend, but I do say this: Before any trading constituency—not in the City of London, but any trading or commercial constituency in England or Ireland—I will argue that it is desirable to keep this subject of bills of exchange to the Imperial Parliament, and my right hon. Friend would not be able to convince his audience to the contrary. My right hon. Friend says this is an Amendment in a concerted movement. Surely my right hon. Friend will see that this is an Amendment which does not touch Ireland alone, but touches the relations between Great Britain and Ireland. My right hon. Friend has himself admitted that the question raised by the Amendment touches the relations between Great Britain and Ireland. He has told us that there are certain questions which should be either given or taken. We must either include such matters in the Bill or leave them as matters to be dealt with between the two countries. We say that it would be more convenient for all parties that legislation on the subject of bills of exchange should be left in the hands of the Imperial Parliament. By dealing with the question in this manner, I think it will be seen that no right of Ireland would be affected in the least. Surely the supporters of the right hon. Gentleman will see that it is desirable to have some general law in regard to bills of exchange. They must be aware of the tendency of all commercial countries to come to an arrangement, and to secure International agreement upon these topics. It is unfortunate that the system should be different in parts of Europe and America; but the whole tendency, as I say, has been for the codification of the law of bills of exchange. Simplicity in these transactions is a matter to which all traders attach the greatest possible importance; and I cannot help thinking that if my right hon. Friend were not so wedded to the idea that any change in the Bill might be derogatory to Ireland, he would see that, in the general interest of trade, this is a matter which ought properly to be confided to the Imperial Parliament. I do not argue the point from the idea that the Irish Legislature would do wrong in the matter; but, looking to the commercial transactions between the two countries, and to the general tendency to consolidate the law, I believe it is better that the Amendment should be adopted. If it is insulting to a country not to have the right to legislate on this subject, if this Bill should pass into law, England and Scotland will be in that position, for English and Scotch votes will be overruled by the Irish. I do not, however, put it on that ground, but on general grounds. I say this is a case in which the Government might yield. I know for a fact that there are certain traders, supporters of Her Majesty's Government, holding the same general views as right hon. Gentlemen who, in matters of this kind, deeply regret that there should be any possibility of difference upon this class of legislation. There is, I repeat, nothing insulting to Ireland in the Amendment which has been moved, and I say with what I believe to be the greatest truth and conviction that I think it is desirable to have the most uniform legislation for the three countries that circumstances will permit.

*MR. JACKS (Stirlingshire) said, there was one matter that he would like to point out to the Government which he thought, if it occurred—he did not say that it would, but if it did—would cause very great confusion. They had a three days' grace in the payment of bills of exchange. That was no doubt an absurdity and an anomaly which every thoughtful business man deplored. What he wanted to point out was that when the Irish Legislature was established—and he spoke with a knowledge of the business capacity and ability of Irishmen—it might, and likely would, pass an Act doing away with this anomaly. If that occurred, and if a bill were drawn by a trader in Ireland upon another in Ireland or elsewhere, and made payable in London, it might not be presented on the day upon which it was due, but after the three days of grace had expired; and if it was then dishonoured, it would have to be followed to its source. What would happen then? Would the question be tried by British or by Irish law? If by Irish law, the result was clear as to what would occur. He did not say that the Judges in Ireland would be incapable of dealing with the matter, as in the case of foreign bills. Those who knew how the matter stood as regarded foreign bills knew that there was a difficulty; and he thought they would see that, although the matter as regarded Ireland would be cleared up, still there would be great trouble and inconvenience, to which the trader should not be subjected. It occurred to him that this was not covered, owing to the vagueness of the Amendment. The question to which he referred differed from that of banks, and he would like to know whether the Amendment could not be accepted in a form dealing with "bills of exchange payable out of Ireland"? That, he thought, would give the Irish power to deal with their own bills of exchange, and, at the same time, avoid the inconvenient results to which he had referred.

*MR. R. B. MARTIN (Worcester, Droitwich) said, the question involved was one of the greatest importance. They wanted to have it clearly laid down how trade was to be affected, and to be able to consider whether any difficulty was likely to arise. They knew what the difficulties were in the matter of foreign bills. Were these bills to be subjected to the Irish Legislature, and to be treated as foreign bills in England, or were they to be treated as part and parcel of English bills? If they had an answer to that question they would know where they were. The question of the stamps on bills of exchange was one that would intimately affect the Chancellor of the Exchequer both of this country and of Ireland. He hoped the Government would make the matter clear to the House and to the country.

*SIR A. ROLLIT (Islington, S.) said, he hoped, notwithstanding what the Prime Minister had said, the Government would even yet give consideration to the claims of this Amendment, or to the modification of it suggested by the hon. Member for Stirlingshire. He put forward this expression of hope on the ground of uniformity of action, for sake of which he had already voted against his own Party. The very gravest disadvantage would arise if this were not done. The Prime Minister said this was not one of the principal points of the Bill. Commercially, he thought it was a very essential and organic detail of the Bill, and he appealed to the arguments adduced to demand from the Government some re-consideration of the matter. He knew that upon this, as upon some other details of the Bill, there was the very strongest feeling on both sides of the Channel. It was felt that there should be no variation from commercial practice, and that there should be security against a departure which would result in great disadvantage. One point had not yet been raised—that bills of exchange were creations of commercial custom, of the growth of commercial experience, and they must be guided by mercantile practice, which was joint between the two countries. They would see, therefore, that there was great danger in making any departure from that. A Member of the Government had said in a previous Debate that they should not deal with internal matters; but bills of exchange were matters of external trade. The Bill itself reserved such matters. He disliked the term "foreign" in relation to Ireland; but he doubted whether external bills would be within the purview of the Bill. He thought it ought not, at all events, to be left in doubt. The Prime Minister's observations with regard to the treatment of Ireland struck him as being out of place. It was very unfortunate that anything should be said which could enlarge the feeling of difference in both countries and in that House. They should do what they could, where it was possible, to come nearer a solution, and, if they could have security for joint action, an obligation rested upon them to endeavour to obtain it by both speech and act. This question was, he submitted, a commercial one, and from that point of view it was desirable they should have uniformity. He had, as he said, voted with the Government on similar grounds on another question, and he was of opinion that uniformity should be established here. Even in a modified form the Government should accept the Amendment and embody it in the Bill.

*THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir C. RUSSELL, Hackney, S.): I may say, Sir, in reference to what my hon. Friend who has just sat down has said, that I should be only too glad if any settlement of this question in the direction contended for by him would make any substantial advance towards agreement upon the vital matters involved in the Bill. Unfortunately, while the Government are engaged upon what we believe to be an important legislative structure, hon. Gentlemen opposite, from conscientious motives, desire to overthrow that structure, and avowedly propose all their Amendments with that object. It is suggested that in this case the Irish Legislature would proceed to do away with the three days' grace. I do not think it is at all likely they will do so. It would not be in the interest of Irish traders. The case is put of a bill payable in London, and it is said that, owing to the abolition of the three days' grace, the bill might not be presented in time; but the conditions of that transaction would not be regulated by the Irish Legislature. In the case of a bill payable in London the law of the place would prevail; and if an action ensued, as the hon. Member for Stirlingshire (Mr. Jacks) now suggests, while Irish law might apply to the contract, payment would be regulated by the law of the place of payment. Therefore, Irish legislation would not affect the matter. The hon. Member below the Gangway (Mr. Martin) wishes to know if bills drawn upon Ireland were to be considered as foreign bills? Certainly not. Ireland would not be a foreign country, and will not be called such when this Bill passes. It will still be a part of the United Kingdom, and bills drawn upon Ireland will be inland bills. Any question as to the stamp duty in respect of bills drawn in Ireland will arise equally in the case of foreign bills. The Irish Legislature will not have any interest in legislating in a direction which would depreciate the value of their own negotiable securities; on the other hand, they will have every reason for making those negotiable securities as valuable as possible in the commerce of the world. Therefore we think this is not an Amendment which ought to occupy the time of the House.

*MR. MATTHEWS (Birmingham, E.): After the admission of the hon. and learned Gentleman, the question at issue is one of small dimensions. It was admitted in Committee by the Chancellor of the Exchequer (Sir W. Harcourt) that if a bill were drawn in Ireland and accepted in England that was a bill about which the Irish Legislature could not legislate at all. After a good deal of pressure the Chancellor of the Exchequer also admitted that if a bill were drawn in London upon an acceptor in Ireland, or even if it were payable out of Ireland, the Irish Legislature could not deal with it. So that all the invective of the Prime Minister applies simply to legislation applicable to the narrow class of bills drawn in Ireland upon an acceptor in Ireland and not payable in England. But a bill drawn in Ireland and accepted in Ireland may be endorsed in reference to a trade transaction in England. In what category would such a bill fall? Would it be a bill respecting which the Irish Legislature could not alter the number of days of grace? By the Bill as it stood, a large class of bills of exchange in which Irish traders were interested were taken out of the purview of the Irish Legislature. [Mr. W. E. GLADSTONE dissented.] I see the Prime Minister shakes his head, but I doubt whether the right hon. Gentleman was present in Committee when the Chancellor of the Exchequer accepted that position. But the Chancellor of the Exchequer did not deal with the third class of bills accepted in Ireland and payable in London, but the Attorney General has admitted this time—

SIR C. RUSSELL dissented.

*MR. MATTHEWS: Then the Attorney General is a most illogical person. The Chancellor of the Exchequer had not honoured them with his presence during this Debate, and it was a little inconvenient that in his absence they should be met by observations from the Treasury Bench to the effect that the Chancellor of the Exchequer had not known what he was talking about on the previous occasion. Was a bill drawn in Ireland and accepted in Ireland, but payable in London, a transaction with "a place out of Ireland," or not?

SIR C. RUSSELL: No.

*MR. MATTHEWS: Then, commerce with England was not trade with a place out of Ireland. That was the exact opposite of the admission of the Government in Committee, and it showed how necessary this discussion was. They had proved that the Government did not agree among themselves as to what the Bill meant. The Chancellor of the Exchequer said one thing in Committee, and the Attorney General absolutely denied it on Report. That was not a satisfactory state of things, and it made it all the more necessary to press the Amendment. It was unnecessary to urge the enormous importance of uniformity in trading matters between the three parts of the United Kingdom. Did they mean to attach to transactions with Ireland the disadvantage which notoriously attached to transactions with foreign countries? It was absurd to say, as had been said by the Prime Minister, that in these matters the Opposition were treating the Irish Legislature as a swindling Legislature. [Mr. W. E. GLADSTONE dissented.] The right hon. Gentleman did impute to his hon. Friend that he was dealing with it as a swindling Legislature. His hon. Friend did nothing of the kind. He merely pointed out the difficulties which every mercantile man knew were involved in dealing with a bill of exchange that was a foreign bill. Irish bills were foreign bills until 1882, and the Government were practically converting them into foreign bills again. One would have thought that, in the interests of Irish commerce, as well as of English commerce, they would have accepted the Amendment.

Sir C. Russell

*SIR C. RUSSELL said, he did not at all admit, as the right hon. Gentleman appeared to assume, that dealing with bills of exchange was legislating with respect to trade within the meaning of the 3rd clause. He had not said so, and did not think so.

*SIR H. JAMES said, the Attorney General had stated that it was the desire of the Government to erect an edifice, and the desire of the Opposition to blow it up. Well, how they could blow up an edifice before it was erected he did not know. As a matter of fact, what the Opposition were doing was making sure, so far as they could, that the edifice, if erected, should stand upon a solid foundation. The Prime Minister had said that it was desirable that the great circle of trade should not be unduly interfered with. The Unionist Members agreed with that, and they were anxious to see that the law was framed so as to prevent the circle of trade breaking down. At the present moment, putting the statements of the Attorney General and the Chancellor of the Exchequer against each other, he had not the slightest idea what the state of the law affecting bills of exchange would be if the Bill passed. His only hope was centred in the Solicitor General, who, if he would only bring his usual emphasis and clearness into play, might enable them to understand what distinction was to be drawn between the statement of the Attorney General and that of the Chancellor of the Exchequer. They could not control the law of foreign countries; but whilst they were delegating powers to the Irish Legislature ought they not to do their best to maintain uniformity in the customs prevailing amongst merchants in the different parts of the United Kingdom—ought they not to take care that the law of Ireland should not be altered as against the law of England, seeing such alteration would affect something outside Ireland as well as inside it? He could not see that this should be other than a business discussion. There was nothing in the matter affecting the honour of Ireland. He was asking that a business view should prevail, and at present he was confident that the greatest confusion would exist in the minds of lawyers, even of Judges, as to the interpretation of the Bill, and the greatest complications would be occasioned in business. He was certain the object of the Government must be to prevent such complications arising.

SIR R. WEBSTER (Isle of Wight) said, he was somewhat surprised that the Solicitor General had not thought fit to make some reply to the very moderate appeal of the right hon. Member for Bury (Sir H. James). He (Sir R. Webster) endorsed that appeal on two grounds. The Attorney General had expressed an opinion upon a matter of law—as he was perfectly entitled to do—and probably they might take it that his opinion on a point of law was of greater value than that of the Chancellor of the Exchequer.

SIR C. RUSSELL: What is your opinion?

SIR R. WEBSTER: That was not a fair observation to make. They desired to know the interpretation put upon the clause as introduced into the Bill. The question was not his view of the words; but whether there was any doubt about the meaning of the words. It was desirable that the matter should be explained, in order that the fears entertained in many quarters as to the powers of the Irish Legislature might be allayed. The Chancellor of the Exchequer, in Committee, had made a distinct statement to the effect that the exemption of trade would be operative in regard to both classes of bills, the Irish Legislature being unable to legislate upon them. The Attorney General now came down and, in order to secure the clause on Report, threw overboard the view of the Chancellor of the Exchequer. He (Sir R. Webster) ventured to submit that there was one rule which, at least, ought to govern them in this kind of discussion; and although he could not hope to obtain the ear of the Prime Minister, he thought this rule was of more importance than endeavouring to import into the Debate the suggestion that the Opposition were prospectively imputing roguery or fraud to the future Government of Ireland. He referred to the necessity of having a definite statement from the Government when matters of this kind were under discussion. The Chancellor of the Exchequer had made a statement in Committee which might, and, no doubt, ought, to have had an influence upon the minds of hon. Members in recording their votes. But the clause was defended in Committee on one view of the law, and now, on Report, hon. Members had another and an entirely opposite view presented to them. That opposite view was given by one of the Law Officers of the Crown. Was it, therefore, unreasonable to appeal to the other Law Officer—who was present when the Attorney General gave his opinion—to confirm the view of his colleague? It appeared to him essential that, in order to allay the fears of the commercial community, there should be some authoritative announcement that the law regulating bills of exchange between Ireland and Great Britain should not be tampered with. With regard to the merits of the question, he should hesitate, as a lawyer, to express the opinion that the Irish Legislature would not alter the law in respect of bills drawn in Ireland; but when it was suggested that it would be impossible for the Irish Legislature to treat a bill drawn in England as a bill drawn in a foreign country, he pointed out that the words in the Bill were “trade with any place out of Ireland.” It was, therefore, by no means impossible that the Irish Legislature might apply to bills from England some of the conditions applicable to foreign bills. He had said enough to show that they ought to know on what horse the right hon. Gentleman the First Lord of the Treasury elected to ride when he desired to win in the Division about to take place. Was he going to abandon the law laid down by the Chancellor of the Exchequer, and elect to stand on that laid down by the Attorney General?

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL (Sir J. RIGBY, Forfar) said, he did not rise to engage in the discussion. He had merely to say that every word that had been uttered by the Attorney General with regard to the point at issue had his entire concurrence, and he had no doubt that what the Attorney General had said expressed the real state of the law.

MR. COURTNEY (Cornwall, Bodmin) [Cries of “Oh!”] said, he would not detain the House for more than a few moments; but it appeared to him that the position now taken up by the Solicitor General, following the Attorney General, was in direct conflict with the Chancellor of the Exchequer, and it brought before the House the substantial as apart from the legal question at issue. The substantial question, as had been stated by the Prime Minister on a former occasion, was that the great circle of trade between all parts of the United Kingdom was to be a complete unity, and the right hon. Gentleman said that he would not consent to anything which interfered with the preservation of that unity. It was, no doubt, in view of that principle that the Chancellor of the Exchequer had spoken, seeing that if these bills between Great Britain and Ireland were in any way made subject to the separate legislation of the Irish Parliament that circle would be broken. It was now admitted that they were to be made subject to the legislation of the Irish Parliament so that the circle would be broken. Under the circumstances some further explanation was due from the Government.

Question put.

The House divided :—Ayes 156 ; Noes 190.—(Division List, No. 271.)

MR. HANBURY said, he rose to move to insert in Clause 3, after “trade marks,” the word “designs.” He did so because, although both the Solicitor General and the Chief Secretary had given a distinct promise, when the matter was discussed in Committee, that they would bring up words on Report to meet the difficulties that were then pointed out, they had omitted to redeem the pledge.

Amendment proposed, in page 2, line 25, after the words "trade marks," to insert the word "designs."—(Mr. Hanbury.)

MR. J. MORLEY: We agree to the words.

Amendment agreed to.

*MR. BUTCHER said, he wished to move to insert in Clause 3, after Sub-section 10—

"Or (11), the raising of moneys for State, county, or borough purposes by means of any lottery or undertaking of a similar nature."

His object was to prevent the Irish Legislature from repealing certain existing Imperial Statutes, and from sanctioning a peculiarly demoralising form of public gambling. There were some people who would look with horror upon the proceedings at Newmarket or Monte Carlo, and yet would not regard public lotteries with aversion. He would point out that in the United States of America public opinion had formed itself into definite and strong lines upon this question. In every single State except two, special provisions had been introduced into the Constitution to prevent the legalisation of lotteries. He might be told that this was an imaginary danger. But if the Irish Government should be in very considerable straits for money, to meet the demands upon them both the Government and the Municipal Authorities would be certain to resort to this method of replenishing the Exchequer. At present lotteries were forbidden in the United Kingdom by a series of Statutes, beginning in 1698, and in the Preamble of an Act passed in the reign of William III. in 1698 the evils that resulted from the existence of lotteries were very strikingly specified, and such methods of raising money were prohibited as being "a common nuisance." This Act, however, had been infringed for State purposes at the beginning of the present century. Since then no attempt had been made to raise money by means of public lotteries in this country. Under the circumstances he thought it not unreasonable to insist that the Irish Government should not have power to repeal the British Statutes so as to make legal lotteries which had been unlawful for the past 200 years. One of the worst features of the Bill was that it would enable the Irish Legislature to repeal British Statutes; and the object of the Amendment was to provide that, at all events, that should not be done in regard to one of the most pernicious, demoralising, and discreditable forms of gambling.

Amendment proposed,

In page 2, line 26, after the word "rights," to insert the words "or (11) The raising of moneys for State, county, or borough purposes by means of any lottery or undertaking of a similar nature."—(Mr. Butcher.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

MR. J. MORLEY: There is, I suppose, no difference between the hon. and learned Gentleman and anybody else in the House in reference to the description he has given of the practice of a public resort to lotteries. Of course, we are all agreed on that point. He says that such a practice on the part of any State or Municipality is pernicious, demoralising, and discreditable. Exactly because such a practice would be pernicious, demoralising, and discreditable, we do not suppose for one moment that the Irish Parliament will be likely to resort to it. Why does not the hon. Member add all the other practices to which Governments of a lower type than we assume ourselves to be resort? Why does he not insist that the Irish Legislature should not make any laws permitting gaming, or allowing betting houses to remain open? Does he not see that to proceed to an enumeration of all these pernicious, demoralising, and degrading practices is a task beyond our competence? The Amendment is in the highest degree unsatisfactory from the hon. and learned Member's own point of view, as it ought to include a great many other things, whilst from our point of view it is entirely unnecessary.

MR. RENTOUL (Down, E.) said, he believed most firmly that when an Irish Legislature was established a lottery would be established. It seemed to him that what was done in several other Catholic countries might be done in Ireland. He understood that there was no objection in the Catholic Church to the establishment of lotteries. He knew the German lottery system, and was certain that a worse system could not possibly be established. It tended to upset almost everyone for a couple of months every year—almost everybody talked about it during that period, servants clubbed together to buy joint tickets, and the thing worked a great deal of evil. If the Irish Legislature did not want to have anything to do with lotteries there could be no objection to having the Amendment inserted in the Bill. Why should they ask to have their hands left free in this matter? It was another case of Sairey Gamp—

“Do not ask me whether I will take any or not, but put the bottle on the chimney-piece and let me put my lips to it when I am so disposed.”

He hoped the Government would reconsider the matter, and accept the Amendment.

MR. SEXTON (Kerry, N.) said, the hon. and learned Member who had just sat down had enriched a very generous speech with a most refined and scholarly quotation. But he (Mr. Sexton) ventured to confirm the opinion of the Chief Secretary, and to say there could be no difference of opinion among Members of the Nationalist Party in the House of Commons as to the impropriety of resort by the Government of Ireland to lotteries for the purpose of raising money. The hon. Member for Down (Mr. Rentoul) had no doubt, if a Legislature were established in Ireland, it would proceed to start lotteries to support services that ought to be maintained out of the rates and taxes. He seemed to hold that opinion because the Catholic Church in Ireland, being a poor and voluntary Church, and having no support from the State, occasionally employed bazaars for the purpose of helping charitable institutions. The hon. Member tried to establish some occult association between Catholicism and lotteries. Evidently what was working in the foggy depths of the hon. Member's consciousness was that because Ireland was a Catholic country it was more likely to establish these lotteries. The City of Hamburg was the chief supporter of the lottery system, and he (Mr.

Sexton) believed that city obtained more money than any other in the world out of lotteries, and much of it came from Protestant countries. Hamburg was itself Protestant, and, at any rate, the case of Hamburg decidedly disposed of the connection the hon. Member supposed existed between Catholicism and lotteries. He (Mr. Sexton) must say, as far as his observation went in matters of betting and speculation, the Teutonic races did not yield to the Latin races. The suggestion of the Amendment was that the Irish Government would raise money for State purposes by means of lotteries. Having legal power to raise money for State purposes by national taxation, was it likely that if there was a connection between Catholicism and lotteries the Irish Legislature would ignore the power of taxation, and resort to a device the effect of which would be that Catholics alone would raise money which Protestants would otherwise contribute to?

MR. BUTCHER (interposing) said, he had not argued that Catholics alone favoured lotteries.

MR. SEXTON said, the hon. Member had suffered from the zeal of his supporter (Mr. Rentoul) in this respect. The hon. Member for Down had certainly suggested that because Ireland was a Catholic country there would be a special tendency to resort to lotteries. He (Mr. Sexton) had only to add that if the Irish Government were so silly and unprincipled as to do anything of the kind the Imperial Parliament, in the first place, could veto the Bill, whilst, in the second place, it could at any time pass a Statute preventing it from continuing in such a course.

MR. H. PLUNKETT (Dublin Co., S.) did not think the speech the House had just heard was quite fair or ingenuous, the hon. Member for Kerry having imputed to the hon. Member for Down (Mr. Rentoul) certain statements which he (Mr. Plunkett) certainly did not understand him to have made. He was sorry the hon. Member for Northampton (Mr. Labouchere) was not in his because on the 8th of June, in Truth, he had commented not only on the use of lotteries in Ireland, but on the circulation of Irish lottery tickets in England, and had said what the teaching of the Catholic Church might be as to the morality of gambling he did not know but on grounds of expediency lotteries had been suppressed in England, and he trusted that a Home Rule Parliament would speedily suppress them in Ireland. It had, indeed, been necessary to suppress lotteries in England, as it had been in every one of the United States except two. The two exceptions were Kentucky and Louisiana. The last-named State still resorted constantly to lotteries, and it was considered a great national disgrace and grievance that lottery tickets from that State were sold all over America. He was certain that if the Irish Legislature were left to itself it would prefer to raise money by lottery tickets circulated in other countries than by taxes upon its own people.

*MR. GERALD BALFOUR (Leeds, Central) pointed out that there was an obvious difference between State lotteries and gambling hells. The public lotteries in Italy brought in a large revenue to the State. But gambling and betting houses were, in the first instance, private undertakings, and intended for private profit, although, of course, it was true that a State might obtain profit from them by issuing licences. He was not prepared to say that Ireland would certainly adopt the lottery system, but he saw nothing in the nature of things to make it improbable. Ireland would unquestionably have some difficulty in raising the Revenue she required, and the lottery system had been resorted to by other countries in similar circumstances with a large degree of success from the purely fiscal point of view. If, however, Ireland chose to resort to an expedient which, in the language of the Chief Secretary, borrowed from the Mover of the Amendment, was disgraceful, pernicious, and discreditable, he did not think it was the business of the House of Commons to interfere.

Question put, and negatived.

MR. MACARTNEY (Antrim, S.) rose to move, in page 2, line 26, at the end, add "or marriage and divorce." He said, that no apology was needed in bringing this subject before the House, because it had been once described by the Prime Minister as a matter of awful, if not unmeasurable, responsibility. But, apart from that great and high authority on the importance of the question, he also relied on the feeling which it excited amongst that portion of the population of Ireland with whose political and religious opinions he was identified. He could hardly exaggerate the anxiety and alarm which had been aroused amongst the Protestants in Ireland by the decision which the House had come to in Committee on the question raised by his Amendment; and neither he nor his colleagues would have been justified in allowing the Report stage of the Bill to pass without calling the attention of the House to the serious responsibility they had incurred in coming to that decision. He was of opinion that the position which this question occupied in Ireland, and the still more important position which it would assume if the Bill were passed, had not been clearly before the minds of hon. Members when they arrived at their decision in the Committee stage; and, therefore, he thought he was amply justified in assuming that, far from treating this Motion as a dilatory Motion, hon. Members would be grateful to him for giving them an opportunity for revising a decision which they probably had arrived at hastily and without due consideration. The Prime Minister, replying to the hon. Baronet the Member for Wigan (Sir F. S. Powell), who moved the Amendment in Committee, relied on one argument only, and that was that, on a survey of the great English-speaking communities of the world, he was enabled to state that an attempt had never been made by Parliament to force any large community or body of persons under one Marriage Law. He quite agreed with the right hon. Gentleman, and he said frankly that he and his friends did not desire that Parliament on this occasion should force the Irish community under one Marriage Law. But the British North America Act did not force the subordinate Legislatures of the Dominion under one Marriage Law. The Act which created a Representative Legislature for New Zealand did not force the inferior Legislatures of that country under one Marriage Law. Both these Acts gave merely to the Mother Parliament the right of revising or discussing any future legislation that might be proposed in these communities, and that was all he and his friends desired to do by this Amendment. The straits to which the Prime Minister was driven in his argument in Committee were well illustrated by the reply he gave to the hon. Baronet, who had interjected the remark that in the case of Canada Parliament had taken the course suggested by the Amendment. "Oh," said the right hon. Gentleman, "Canada has not a large population; it does not contain a great number of people." But the Dominion of Canada, which was under the legislative control of the Dominion Parliament, had a larger population than Ireland. At the time the British North America Act was passed the population was 3,500,000, and surely the right hon. Gentleman would not deny that when Parliament passed that Act it must have believed it was legislating for a community that might in time rival even the United Kingdom in population. In the second portion of his argument the Prime Minister said that no uniformity of Marriage Laws could be found in any of the English-speaking communities—that there was no uniformity to be found in the United States; none to be found in the Colonies, and none to be found at home in the United Kingdom. But the right hon. Gentleman himself admitted fully and freely the enormous mischiefs and scandals that resulted in America from the diversity of the legislation on this question in the various States; and if it were true that the Colonies had freedom of legislation on this point, it was equally true that the United Kingdom had, over and over again, refused to follow the views of the Colonies in regard to the Laws of Marriage and Divorce. With reference to the United Kingdom, it was, of course, admitted that the Scotch law differed from the English and Irish law. But it was admitted on all sides that the Scotch Law of Marriage was an unfortunate law. The Prime Minister did not, certainly, apply to it the language of praise. Indeed, he had a distinct recollection that the right hon. Gentleman stated that it would be a good thing for the United Kingdom if the Scotch law was made the same as the law of the United Kingdom. The Prime Minister had said that the facts were against the Amendment, and that, therefore, he was opposed to it. But the right hon. Gentleman had spent a great deal of time very unprofitably in looking to the facts of the rest of the world, while the right hon. Gentleman completely ignored the facts as they existed in Ireland, and yet it was upon these facts that he claimed that the Amendment deserved the very serious consideration of the Government. What was the position in Ireland? The Marriage Law of Ireland was precisely the same—except in an unimportant detail—as the Marriage Law of England, and the Law of Divorce was also almost exactly the same. He wished to say here that he was not concerned much with the question of divorce, because all classes in Ireland of every variety of religious opinion were agreed that there should be, if anything, a restriction of the operation of the Divorce Laws. But the question of the Marriage Laws was in Ireland of the highest possible moment. The position which the Roman Catholic Church occupied in Ireland on this question was entirely different from the position which the Roman Catholic Church occupied in England, and for this reason—in the first place, Ireland was, in the view of the Roman Catholic Church, a Roman Catholic country. England was not regarded by the Roman Catholic Church as a Roman Catholic country. Therefore the Roman Catholic hierarchy of England were not obliged by the policy of the Church to attempt to force into the political arena those peculiar views which the Roman Catholic Church held with regard to marriage. But, as Ireland was a Roman Catholic country in the view of the See of Rome, there was an obligation on the rulers of the Church in Ireland to do everything they possibly could to force to the front, either in legislation or in relation to general social questions, the views the Church might hold, no matter how extreme those views might be. The difference between the Roman Catholic Church in England and Ireland in that respect was owing to the fact that the Decrees of the Council of Trent had been published in Ireland and had not been published in England. It was, therefore, absolutely necessary for the House to consider what effect the publication of the Decrees of the Council of Trent in Ireland would have on the legislation that might be presented to the future Irish Parliament. The views of the Roman Catholic Church in regard to marriage were stated by the Royal Commission which reported in the year 1868 upon the Marriage Laws of the United Kingdom. The Report stated—

Mr. Macartney

"By the law of the Roman Catholic Church under the Decrees of the Council of Trent (which are now received throughout Ireland) the presence of the Bishop of the Diocese or priest of the parish (or of some other priest deputed by the priest of the parish) is made indispensable for the solemnisation of a marriage recognised as valid by that law; and every Roman Catholic marriage ought, according to the same law (though not under pain of nullity), be preceded by the publication of banns for three Sundays, unless dispensed with (as in Ireland it usually is) by episcopal licence. Of these matters, however (being requisites of marriage by the internal economy only of the Roman Catholic Church) the law of the land takes no cognisance; and if contracted in the presence of any Roman Catholic priest in Ireland between two Catholics, although contrary to the law and discipline of their own Church, would be legally valid."

That statement was founded on the evidence given by Cardinal Cullen, Archbishop of Dublin, which received the imprimatur of all the Roman Catholic Bishops of Ireland, and the evidence was based on the Decrees of the Council of Trent. He would further remind the House that one of the highest authorities in the House—one who had in the field of theology, as in every other field, acquired a position of the first importance—had thus spoken of the policy of the Roman Catholic Church in this country—

"The intention of those who rule the sensible rulers of the Roman Church to disturb civil society will doubtless be developed in a variety of forms as circumstances and seasons may serve; but at present it is nowhere conspicuous than in regard to the Law of Marriage."

He had taken the quotation from the revised edition of the well-known pamphlet entitled, Vaticanism, published by the Prime Minister; and in the preface to the pamphlet the right hon. Gentleman further said—

"If there is one civil right and privilege which the population of the United Kingdom enjoy under the legislation of Parliament which is open to the offensive policy of the Church of Rome, it is the Law of Marriage."

Now, what was it that the Roman Catholic Church was bound to attempt to carry out? Again he referred to the authority of the Prime Minister. The right hon. Gentleman had stated as his deliberate opinion that it was the peculiarity of the Roman Catholic authority to thrust itself into the domain of politics. Therefore it was not a dastardly violation of "the angelic theory," which found such favour with hon. Gentlemen on the other side, for him to suppose that in Ireland under the Home Rule Bill the Roman Catholic Church would use all the powerful means at its disposal to make itself felt in the domain of politics. The views of the Roman Catholic Church with regard to the marriages which were not solemnised by its own ministers in its own Churches differed essentially in different countries. In a country in which the Decrees of the Council of Trent had not been published, such as England, these views of the Roman Catholic Church were tainted with a certain amount of liberality—

SIR C. RUSSELL: Tainted?

MR. MACARTNEY said, he would use the word "toned" or "softened," as he did not wish to hurt the feelings of the hon. and learned Gentleman. That he was correct in that view any hon. Member would see on referring to the Royal Commission on the Marriage Laws from which he had already quoted, for it would be found there that the views put forward by the Prelates of the Roman Catholic Church in England as to their relations to the State were infinitely more moderate than the views put forward by Cardinal Cullen, speaking on behalf of the Roman Catholic Church in Ireland, and that the difference in the two views was due to the fact that the Decrees of the Council of Trent had been published in Ireland and not in England. The view held by the Roman Catholic Church in regard to all marriages not solemnised by her own ministers in her own Churches was that these marriages were concubinage—

MR. M. HEALY (Cork): Certainly not.

MR. MACARTNEY said, the hon. Member for Cork evidently knew very little of the theology of the Roman Catholic Church, for in the third pamphlet published by the Prime Minister, in that particular portion of it in which he contemptuously referred to the "rusty toes" of the Vatican, the right hon. Gentleman wrote—

"It is true indeed that the 200,000 non-Roman marriages which are annually celebrated in England do not at present fall under foul epithets of Rome. But why? Not because we marry, as I believe 19-20ths of us do, under the sanctions of religion; for out in the eye of the Pope purely civilly of but only for the technical, accide- He precarious reason that the disciplinar, case of Trent are not canonically in force in this country. There is nothing, unless it be motives of mere policy, to prevent the Pope from giving them force here when he pleases. If and when that is done every marriage thereafter concluded in the English Church will, according to his own words, be a filthy concubinage."

No one could deny that these views of the Prime Minister were supported by the accumulated evidence of the theological writers of the very highest authority in the Roman Catholic Church, and were perfectly accurate. Therefore in Ireland, where the Decrees of the Council of Trent had been published, it was held by the Roman Catholic Church—though for motives of policy the rulers of that Church did not publicly proclaim their views—that marriages, civil or otherwise, not solemnised in their own Church and by their own ministers were not marriages at all—

MR. M. HEALY : Certainly not.

MR. MACARTNEY : The hon. Member has not read the authorities of the Church.

MR. M. HEALY : I beg your pardon, I have.

MR. MACARTNEY said, that was the view held by the Roman Catholic Church, and that was the view supported by the Prime Minister. He saw that the Attorney General shook his head in doubt.

*SIR C. RUSSELL : My right hon. Friend was writing of marriages between Catholics.

MR. MACARTNEY said, that the Prime Minister wrote of "non-Catholic marriages." The argument of the right hon. Gentleman was that if the Decrees of the Council of Trent had been published in England the 200,000 yearly non-Catholic marriages would fall under the foul epithets of Rome. He, in order to enforce his argument, was not bound to show that the Church of Rome in Ireland would take legislative action in the Irish Parliament to carry out these views. It was sufficient for him to say that there was a possibility of their doing it—that there might be a possibility of it, and that, therefore, he was justified in pressing this matter on the attention to the House. The position taken up in spent by the recognised leaders of the ably in Catholics in Ireland on this question was absolutely different from, the words variance with, the views man could variance with, the views existed by the Prelates of that Church in England ; and, therefore, the Protestant minority in Ireland had a right to claim from the House that protection in this matter which the Imperial Parliament had given to every other community in the Empire to which a Legislative Body had been granted—namely, a subordinate Parliament should not have the power of altering the Marriage Laws. In the proposed Irish Parliament the hierarchy of the Roman Catholic Church would find convenient malleable tools to carry out its policy ; and, in the circumstances, he could not blame them if they insisted that the men whom they had returned to that Parliament by their absolute will should place the Church which they represented, and of which they were members, in the best possible position it could occupy. As in all probability this would be done, the Protestants in the country were entitled to protection in the all-important question of marriages. Over and over again hon. and right hon. Members on the Treasury Bench had given pledges to the country that the Bill should contain nothing which would interfere with the religious opinions of the Protestant minority in Ireland. At the re-election of the Chief Secretary for Ireland at Newcastle, the President of the Local Government Board assured the electors as a Nonconformist, and pledged himself, and, he presumed, pledged the Government, that nothing would be done under Home Rule in the slightest degree to interfere with the privileges of any Protestant community in Ireland. Unless the Government went behind those pledges, they ought to accept the Amendment. It was against the Marriage Laws that the power of the Church of Rome in Ireland would be directed under Home Rule ; therefore, the Protestant communities of Ireland had every reason to ask from the House that protection in regard to the Marriage Laws which even Roman Catholic countries like Italy, France, and Belgium had given to their citizens.

Mr. Macartney

Amendment proposed,

In page 2, line 26, after the word "rights," to insert the words "or (11) Marriage and divorce."
—(Mr. Macartney.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

*SIR F. S. POWELL (Wigan) said, he had had the honour of submitting some observations on this question on the Committee stage of the Bill, and he would not have presumed to address the House again on the subject had he not had the privilege since the discussion in Committee of sitting on the Committee which had been appointed to consider the Marriage Laws of the United Kingdom, and of making a further investigation of the question. In the first place, he would call the attention of the House to the leading and most prominent passage of the Report of the Royal Commission on the Marriage Laws which sat in 1868—

"It must be universally conceded," said the Report, "that if it be possible to reduce the Marriage Laws in the United Kingdom to one uniform system, such an object is in the highest degree desirable."

It was very satisfactory to be able to state to the House that since the publication of that Report considerable advances had been made towards uniformity and assimilation. In Scotland there had been some progress in that direction, and he knew that the state of the law was satisfactory to the Scotch community; but, at the same time, the Committee had had evidence from the Registrar General and his subordinates that there had been a great increase in irregular marriages in Scotland, which was a most unfortunate condition of affairs. Nevertheless, there was a tendency towards assimilation. During the discussion on this question in Committee he had referred to the condition of the law in regard to Canada, and had mentioned that the British North America Act of 1867 provided that marriage and divorce were amongst the subjects to which the exclusive legislative authority of the Parliament of Canada extended. He had been much surprised to hear the Prime Minister on that occasion speak with contempt of the population of Canada. Surely the most loyal of our Colonies, with its vast extent of territory, did not merit such a reference, and no argument could be fairly founded on its population. But it might be said that the great central and authoritative Act had not been carried entirely into force. He had examined with great care the Canadian Statutes in the Library of the House, and his labours had not been by any means in vain. He found that in the Parliament of Ontario there had been two large Statutes passed of considerable bulk respecting marriage. He had read those Statutes with some alarm, but the alarm ceased when he found that those Statutes had been twice revised and consolidated since 1867—an example which might very well be followed by the Imperial Parliament—and that there was the following provision:—

"The Revised Statutes shall not be held to operate as new laws, but shall be construed and have effect as a consolidation of the law as contained in the said Acts and parts of Acts so repealed, and for which the said Revised Statutes are substituted."

It was also carefully provided that everything in those Statutes in contravention of the Central Legislature should be non-effective. The Dominion Parliament was therefore supreme as regards marriage and divorce. On crossing the border into the United States he found, as the result of his investigations, that there were between the different States differences so slight that they were not worth maintaining, and also inconsistencies so great as to produce serious and most painful embarrassments. For instance, in the State of Massachusetts he found, in the matter of divorce, that it was provided—

"When the inhabitant of this State goes into another State or country to obtain a divorce for any cause occurring here, and whilst the parties resided here or for any cause which would not authorise a divorce by the laws of this State, a divorce so obtained shall be of no force or effect in this State."

The Court had, therefore, to investigate motives and decide what was the reason why a man passed from one state to another. He also found in some States that divorce could be established on the simple ground of felony; in other States felony was not sufficient unless it were accompanied by two years' imprisonment; and in Tennessee he found a condition of affairs which must cheer the temperance advocates, because there habitual drunkenness was sufficient to obtain a divorce. He also found that there was a great difference in the terms of residence to justify parties in seeking divorce. In some States it was six months, and in others 12 months. In fact, great mischief was wrought in the United States by the diversity of legislation in regard to divorce. He thought he had made out a strong case for uniformity in this country. The Commission which sat on this subject in 1868 said they had found uniformity desirable. They had found under that the superintending eye of one Parliament, owing to the growth of public opinion under the guidance and governance of one Parliament, great progress had been made towards that assimilation which was so essential; and he did hope the Report of the inquiry of the Select Committee, when it was published and discussed in the country, would lead to the further assimilation which the Members of the Royal Commission so greatly desired. He believed if they did destroy this superintending and governing eye of Parliament, those diversities which had been diminished would be perpetuated and increased; the hopes which some of them entertained as to uniformity would be lessened, and the time would be rendered more distant than they could desire when the recommendations of that great and carefully-manned Commission of 1868 would be carried into effect. He felt himself, the more one inquired into these subjects, both by the investigation of documents and by such means as arose in the converse between individuals—the more one felt the importance of one common system of law in a matter so profoundly affecting the national life—the more anxious one must be to resist by every possible means the adoption of any procedure which might tend to further perpetuate differences and to postpone the period of that identity and similarity which he was sure must be the desire of every person who had given careful attention to this most momentous and important subject.

*SIR C. RUSSELL said, he did not intend to follow at length the speeches of the Mover of this Amendment and the hon. Baronet who had just sat down, for the reason that this matter was fully discussed in June last; and if they were to have the continual repetition of matters which had been fully debated, the object of those who desired that no progress should be made on this Report stage would be accomplished. The hon. Baronet who had just sat down had expressed a wish that there should be a general uniformity in the Marriage Law in all the dominions of the Queen.

SIR F. S. POWELL: No, in the United Kingdom.

Sir F. S. Powell

*SIR C. RUSSELL: But the hon. Baronet went on to discuss the law in the Colonies amongst other places, and certainly no argument in support of this Amendment had been drawn from them on the question of uniformity. Again, in the three Divisions of the United Kingdom there were wide differences in regard to the Law of Marriage. As regards the Decrees referred to, it might be important to consider them if in the United Kingdom they bound the conscience or dealt with the actions of others besides the persons who by their religious professions were supposed to be subjected to the obligations of those Decrees. Did the hon. Member gravely say that the Decrees of the Council of Trent had been put in operation in any compulsory course against persons not subject to them?

MR. MACARTNEY: In Spain they certainly have.

*SIR C. RUSSELL: All he could say was that the hon. Member had not given them Spain in his speech; and they were dealing with this country.

MR. MACARTNEY: I said distinctly Spain.

*SIR C. RUSSELL: He did not hear him mention Spain. However, let him correct the hon. Member on another point. The hon. Member seemed to think there was a great difference between the position of the Decrees of the Council of Trent in England and Ireland. But he was informed the House of Lords had decided that the Decrees of the Council of Trent were promulgated in England, or that the Common Law of England in important respects coincided with them. There were differences between the law of Ireland and the law of England not so very marked, and between the law of Scotland and that of Ireland the differences were of a very marked character indeed. Well, then, was any argument, founded for the withdrawal of this question from the cognisance of the Irish Legislative Body, based upon any legislative precedent? No; the precedents where Constitutions had been given to other countries, with hardly an exception, had treated this question of Marriage Law as essentially a matter to be dealt with by the local Legislatures. The hon. Member for Antrim then proceeded to a theological disquisition on this subject. Without any disrespect to the hon. Member, and without himself professing to be an adept in such matters, he thought the hon. Member had not mastered the subject at all. As to the Catholic doctrine regarding marriage not as a civil contract merely but as a sacrament, he pointed out that that view was taken with due regard to the civil rights of others who took different views on that subject to those held by Catholics, and he really declined to consider further that theological discussion which the hon. Member had sought to introduce. What was the real difficulty apprehended by the hon. Member? He had read the speeches made in the preceding Debate, made for the most part by the same hon. Members and raising the same objections; and he really could not realise, and he did not think the House could realise, what danger was apprehended. Was the danger apprehended that the Irish Legislative Body was going to do something to outrage the consciences and interfere with the civil rights of the Protestant minority? ["Hear, hear!" from the Opposition Benches.] Very well, and did hon. Members think that in the state of public opinion, with Ireland so close to our doors, with so close an observation from day to day, with intimate association and knowledge of all that took place there, public opinion in this country—to say nothing of public opinion in Ireland—would for one instant tolerate such a thing? The idea was only one conjured up by the hon. Member as to which he could not conceive that he himself had any belief that there was any real danger—[Mr. MACARTNEY: I have.] Then he differed from the hon. Member. As regarded the question of divorce, the speech of the hon. Member answered the speech of the hon. Baronet, because the hon. Member for Antrim at once said that so far as divorce was concerned he did not think there was any necessity for this, as the people of Ireland, to whatever religion they belonged, were practically agreed as to the absence of Divorce Law in Ireland. That being so, he did not seek to enter into that matter, and would conclude by saying that this was one other illustration of the way in which hon. Members—no doubt conscientiously and honestly—conjured up dreads and doubts for themselves which had no real existence.

Mr. J. Morley rose in his place, and claimed to move "That the Question be now put."

Question, "That the Question be now put," put, and agreed to.

Question put accordingly, "That those words be there inserted."

The House divided :—Ayes 108 ; Noes 157.—(Division List, No. 272.)

MR. HENEAGE (Great Grimsby) (for Mr. COURTNEY) proposed the following Amendment, which, he said, the Government had agreed to accept :—

Clause 3, page 2, line 29, after "Parliament," insert "or to prescribe conditions regulating importation from any place outside Ireland for the sole purpose of preventing the introduction of any contagious disease."

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

*MR. GIBSON BOWLES (Lynn Regis): Does this, or does it not, cover quarantine? It seems to me most distinctly to do so, yet an Amendment regarding quarantine was rejected with scorn by the Government yesterday; and it is rather strange, therefore, that they should accept it this evening.

MR. J. MORLEY: Quarantine does not concern importation. This is an Amendment to extend the powers of the Irish Government in a direction to which, I think, nobody can object.

Question put, and agreed to.

*LORD G. HAMILTON (Middlesex, Ealing) rose to move to amend the 3rd clause by adding a Proviso that the Irish Legislature should not have power to pass Resolutions or discuss any question connected with the subjects, enumerated in Sub-section 3 (Navy, Army, Militia, Volunteers, forts, arsenals, &c.), unless the assent of the Lord Lieutenant, upon instructions given by Her Majesty, had been previously obtained. He said: In moving this Amendment, Sir, I do so for the purpose of enhancing the clause to which it is related. We have spent much time in discussing theoretical questions; we have discussed the real meaning of the words in reference to the supremacy of Parliament; but nobody yet—certainly no Member of Her Majesty's Government—has considered how practical effect is to be given to the supremacy of the Imperial Parliament, or the means by which it is to be enforced. This is the question to which I wish to call attention—a question which is immeasurably more important than any question which has, up to the present, been discussed. Only one sub-section in the Bill relates to the Naval and Military Forces of the Crown, or the position in which they will be after the Bill has passed. Yet no one will deny that in certain contingencies the Military Forces of the Crown are the only instruments upon which the Imperial Parliament will be able to rely for the enforcement of its theoretical supremacy. There are a large number of hon. Gentlemen opposite who are pledged theoretically to the assertion of the supremacy of the Imperial Parliament, and who believe that, after Home Rule is passed, the forces at the disposal of the Imperial Parliament will remain unaltered. That is a great delusion and mistake. The Military Forces are the only forces—the only reliable forces—that this House can depend upon; but I contend that under this clause as it stands it is in the power of the Irish Legislature to fatally interfere with the Military Forces—to hamper their efficiency and action. In Committee my noble Friend the Member for West Edinburgh (Viscount Wolmer) proposed an Amendment providing that the Irish Legislature should be debarred from even discussing or passing Resolutions on certain subjects. The Prime Minister resisted the Amendment mainly on two grounds—that it would be very difficult, in the first place, to enforce the prohibition; and, in the second place, that it would deprive the Irish Legislature of the right of Petition possessed by every public body in the United Kingdom. Anyone who takes the trouble to look at the Bill will see that the other subjects reserved from the Irish Legislature under Clause 3 are in quite a different category from the Army and Navy; they are matters of constitutional and political character, relating to general legislation with which a Provincial Legislature ought not to deal. But it is evident that power should not be given to such a Legislature to tamper with the instrument which alone would be able, in certain circumstances, to keep it in a subordinate position. All the Civil and Executive authority in Ireland now behind the Imperial Government will, if the Bill be passed, be transferred to the local Legislature. Now, in any difficulties which have arisen in recent years in Ireland or in any other part of the United Kingdom, the authority of this House and of the law has been asserted, not by Imperial instruments such as the Army and the Navy, but by domestic instruments such as the police and the Civil Authorities of the localities; and if the whole Civil and Police Forces which are now at the control of this Parliament are transferred to the local Legislature, in any collision or difficulty which may hereafter occur, not only would there be an enormous subtraction from the forces which are now at the disposal of the Imperial Parliament, but that subtraction will go to the augmentation of the strength of the only authority which can dispute the jurisdiction of Parliament. I do not know that the question has ever been argued out. The whole Executive authority now exercised by the Imperial Parliament would be transferred to the Irish Parliament, which will have the whole Police Force at its disposal in a short time. What remains of the Imperial authority behind this House? There is nothing but military power. Hon. Members who support this Bill should read the history of the great Civil War in America. At its commencement they would see how certain States announced their intention of repudiating the authority of the Central Power. The repudiation was treated with contempt; but we know what took place; we know that, in order to settle that matter, a certain number of Volunteers were raised for a few days, and that out of that arose the greatest war of modern days. How was it that the recalcitrant States were able to offer this resistance? Because in every case the Legislative Authority of the recalcitrant States carried with it the whole Executive forces of that State, the local Militia, and even the officers of the Federal Army, who were connected with the State. Well, what would be the position of the Imperial Parliament if this Bill should become law? Hitherto Parliament has had this great advantage in asserting its authority in Ireland—the Irish people have been divided into two sections, and there has never been a dispute between the English Government and the Irish people in which the former could not rely on one section to support them. Now, however, the Government are deliberately repudiating the allegiance of that part of the population which has hitherto adhered to England. [Mr. GLADSTONE : Deliberately ?] Yes, deliberately ; for you propose to place the whole power and authority of Irish government in the hands of gentlemen who until recently have always been opposed to the power of England ; and, therefore, any collision which takes place between this Parliament and the Irish Legislature must be a collision produced by hon. Gentlemen sitting below the Gangway, who will constitute the majority. Does the Prime Minister think he can appeal to a minority whom he and his friends had betrayed ? [Mr. W. E. GLADSTONE : Hear, hear !] Yes ; betrayed ! I have been many years in this House, and I have a tolerably good recollection of speeches of the Prime Minister, in which he declared how much he was indebted to the support of the Loyalist population of Ireland in putting down disturbances in other parts of Ireland. Some astonishing statements have been made in the course of the Debate from that (the Treasury) Bench. I heard the Chancellor of the Exchequer the other day speaking of the maintenance of the Military Forces in Ireland, and he seemed to think that the moment Home Rule is passed a great part of the Military Forces now quartered in Ireland ought to be transplanted into England. It probably did not occur to the right hon. Gentleman or to anybody on the Treasury Bench that the Imperial Army is based on a system of territorial recruiting, and that a large proportion of this Army—the solitary instrument left to us if we pass this Bill—is composed of Irish regiments which are recruited in Ireland, and whose headquarters, under the present system, are in Ireland. As soon as it becomes clear to the Nationalist Members in the Irish Parliament that there is but one single, solitary obstacle to the full realisation of their national aspirations—namely, the solitary obstacle of the Imperial Army—they will naturally, and from their point of view legitimately, do what they can to remove that impediment. This clause, in its present form, places in their hands a weapon by which they may vitally affect the efficiency of the British Army. They are not to legislate on the subject, but they are to be allowed to pass Resolutions. Have right hon. and hon. Gentlemen ever heard of the unwritten law of the Land League ? It is not remote in point of date, but there are some memories so conveniently constructed that they can forget what happened yesterday. The unwritten law of the Land League was in force in Ireland—[Cries of "Question !" "Hear, hear !" and interruption.] I am coming to the point. Will anybody deny—[Renewed cries of "Question !"]

MR. SPEAKER : Order, order !

MR. MAC NEILL (Donegal, S.) rose his place, and, apparently addressing Mr. Bartley (Islington, N.), said : Do not presume to mention my name.

MR. SPEAKER : Order, order !

MR. MAC NEILL, again rising in his place : You have no right to use my name.

MR. SPEAKER : Order, order !

*LORD G. HAMILTON : I was stating, Sir, that only a few years ago the Land League issued directions which were known as the unwritten law and were obeyed. If the gentlemen who issued that unwritten law are given the control of the Executive and the Police, can the House suppose that any Resolution passed by them will not be observed throughout the greater part of Ireland ? The Irish Parliament will find that the Army is a territorial Army, recruited to a large extent from Ireland ; and what will be easier for that Parliament, remembering the speeches of the Prime Minister supporting the theory of a distinct Irish nationality, than to propose by Resolution—if I were an Irish Nationalist, I would suggest it—that whilst Ireland is ready to contribute towards the expenses of the Imperial Army, she requires as a prior condition that the only regiments quartered in Ireland should be regiments which are raised in Ireland ? [Cheers and laughter.] Hon. Members oppose laugh at that. You laugh at the mere suggestion ; and yet you are raising this Constitutional structure on a foundation of a union of hearts, and when I test you upon it you repudiate it. Why do you repudiate it ? Then the right hon. Gentleman would say, what is the harm of passing such a Resolution ? Why, the right hon. Gentleman and his Colleagues on the Treasury Bench have not thought out the A B C of the question I am arguing. I am putting myself in the position of a Nationalist. Supposing the Resolution which he has suggested might be passed were not assented to here, but were repudiated by the Imperial Ministry—and properly repudiated—would it not be easy for the Irish Parliament to propose another declaring that, inasmuch as the English Government declined to assent to this idea of the union of hearts, any man enlisting in an Irish regiment for Imperial purposes was an enemy of his country? [Laughter.] Yes; you laugh; but what, then, would become of your Irish regiments and your territorial system? I speak in this matter with knowledge of that part of Ireland which has hitherto been most favourable to the Imperial connection, and I say that if such a Resolution were passed under such circumstances it would have a tremendous effect—it would strike at once at the very foundation of the system according to which our Army is recruited. But there is another point which ought not to be overlooked. In an Army supported entirely by voluntary recruiting it is essential that desertion should be punished, and desertion cannot be punished by the Military Authorities unless the civil police co-operate with them. What could be simpler than for the Irish Parliament to pass a Resolution stating that in the strained conditions between the two countries they would decline to allow the police to assist the Military Authorities in stopping desertion? The Irish Parliament might resolve that in the strained relations between Great Britain and Ireland the police should not assist the Military Authorities in stopping desertion. Is that a risk we ought to run? Did hon. Gentlemen opposite believe in what they themselves say when they expressed themselves in favour of the theoretical assertion of the supremacy of this House? What is the use of supporting words which sustain the theoretical supremacy if you deliberately decline to support the only proposal by which means can be given for the practical enforcement of that supremacy? As I can speak only once, I must anticipate the arguments that may be brought forward in opposition to my Amendment. Everybody would admit that the position of the Lord Lieutenant would be a very difficult one. He would go over to Ireland as the representative exponent and supporter of the Imperial authority of this House; but he would also go there to promote within the limits of this Bill self-government in Ireland. Suppose a Resolution such as I have suggested, which strikes vitally at the efficiency of the solitary Imperial instrument left for the assertion of supremacy is proposed in the Irish Parliament, and that hon. Members below the Gangway, who represent the Irish Government, do their best to oppose the Resolution as contrary in its spirit to their understanding of the Act, and that they are beaten by a majority—what will be the position of the Lord Lieutenant? He will be deprived of the Ministry who have opposed this improper Resolution, and he will send for the Leader of the Opposition, who has carried the Resolution, and ask him to form a domestic Government. That gentleman may say,—“I can only do so on the understanding that the Resolution is assented to by the British Government.” He goes to another gentleman who gives the same answer. What is the Lord Lieutenant, under these circumstances, to do? The Irish Parliament will have deposed the existing Government by passing an anti-Imperial Resolution, and the unhappy Lord Lieutenant will not be able to carry on the domestic government of Ireland with the co-operation of Irishmen unless he, as an Imperial officer, assents to proposals which he knows are fatal to Imperial rule. It is to avoid all these difficulties that I have put my Proviso on the Notice Paper. The other night, when we were discussing the position of the Army under certain contingencies, the Prime Minister relied exclusively and entirely upon the words of the patent and commission of the Lord Lieutenant. He said that the Lord Lieutenant, by his patent and commission, would be omnipotent over the British troops which might be quartered in Ireland. Very well, I have adopted the suggestion which the right hon. Gentleman's argument implied, and I propose that no discussion can take place in the Irish House of Commons on this matter without the previous assent of the Lord Lieutenant, who will, under an instrument from Her Majesty, have control over the troops. I cannot anticipate what objections will be taken to my Proviso. The Imperial Army and Navy are subjects forbidden to the Irish Parliament; they are forbidden fruit that may not be eaten. I propose that that fruit may not be touched or smelt, for we know that the handling and smelling frequently engender appetite. My desire is that the Imperial authority should be something that can be enforced, and that will continue to act in all parts of the United Kingdom, and I therefore beg to move my Amendment.

Amendment proposed, after the foregoing Amendment, to insert the words—

"Provided always, the Irish Legislature shall not have power to pass Resolutions or discuss any question connected with the subjects enumerated in Sub-section (3), unless the assent of the Lord Lieutenant, upon instructions given by Her Majesty, has been previously obtained."
—(Lord G. Hamilton.)

MR. W. E. GLADSTONE: I think my first duty to the noble Lord is to thank him for the kindness and compliments he has paid to the Treasury Bench. The noble Lord has been so good as to suggest that those who are responsible for this Bill have not properly thought out the A B C of the question, which assertion was understood to apply to the Treasury Bench in general. The noble Lord has coolly addressed those words to men some of whom have been doing the best they can with their feeble faculties to serve the Crown and the Kingdom long before the noble Lord's eyes first saw the light; and then, no doubt in the most conscientious manner, the noble Lord proceeded, with that intuition which has been given to him, and with the wonderful power of accumulating the experience of a long life in the course of a short one, to instruct the Government upon this subject, discovering the shallowness and insufficiency of their knowledge. My next duty is to say that, except in the very last portion of the noble Lord's speech, I was at a loss to discover what was the relation between the Amendment and the oration which the noble Lord has delivered. Why has the noble Lord limited his Amendment to the 3rd subsection, making it, for all ostensible purposes, totally insufficient? Why has he introduced these most awkward, ill-advised, ineffective, and inexpert words? There are other sub-sections which deal with the Crown and succession to the Crown, with the making of peace and war, and matters arising out of a state of war, with Treaties and other relations with Foreign States. All these things the noble Lord, as the guardian of the State, will leave open, going from the A B C to the X Y Z of the situation. All these questions the noble Lord says, by implication in his Amendment, he will leave to the Irish Legislature, provided they only do not make laws. Well, the fact is the noble Lord would leave matters infinitely worse than they were before. I think the mouth of the Legislature ought not to be wholly closed on all these subjects. The noble Lord implies that the Irish Legislature are free to pass Resolutions on these subjects, but not on questions concerning the Army and Navy. If another battle of Waterloo were fought, would the noble Lord refuse to allow the Irish Legislature to pass a Vote of Congratulation?

MR. W. E. GLADSTONE: That is a most delightful solution of the difficulty. What is it that gives value to congratulatory Resolutions of the House of Commons? It is because they are spontaneous. Here there is to be an official approbation or intimation, and then, with the stamp of that prior approbation, forthwith there may be an Address of Congratulation given on some great national victory. My answer to this is, that the Irish Legislature ought to be left free to congratulate Her Majesty on great national occasions and on great occasions of joy. For instance, an Heir to the Throne might be born, but under this proposal no Vote of Congratulation could be passed "unless upon instructions given by Her Majesty" through the Lord Lieutenant, whose assent must first have been obtained. There might be a great victory—a great danger overcome—a decisive victory. Not a word unless by the assent of the Lord Lieutenant. Why, it is approaching in spirit the revival of the old Poyning's Law. Nothing is to be said by the Irish Legislature until the padlock the noble Lord would nail on them has been removed. That is a sober comment on this singular Resolution moved by the noble Lord. The noble Lord stated incidentally that, in a question of national danger, the minority in Ireland could not be relied on.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: He did not say that.

MR. W. E. GLADSTONE: The noble Lord can correct me if he likes. I would rather be corrected by him than by anyone else. He said that the minority had been betrayed by the Government. Evidently he meant that they could not be relied on by the Government; but did not he intend to refer to a body of persons so distinguished and trustworthy as my right hon. Friend the Member for West Birmingham?

MR. J. CHAMBERLAIN: What have I got to do with it?

MR. W. E. GLADSTONE: The noble Lord did a cruel injury and injustice to the minority, for I believe that in a case of difficulty they will not fail in their essential duties as loyal subjects. I say that in face of all the astounding speeches that have been delivered by various great authorities, excepting the right hon. Member for West Birmingham, who has never entered the ranks of those who have taught the lesson of disloyalty, violence, and rebellion. If the noble Lord's mind were in a glass bee-hive I should be most curious to find out by what process he arrives at the conclusion, first, that the Army is the only instrument to be relied upon; and, secondly, that his reliance upon the Army is to take effect upon the proceedings of the Irish Parliament. My difference with the noble Lord is that the noble Lord thinks that the natural and necessary consequence of this Bill will be the most violent antagonism between the Irish and Imperial influences.

LORD G. HAMILTON: I only said—and it is admitted by a certain section of Nationalist Members—that there will be an attempt to remove the restrictions imposed on the Irish Parliament under the Bill.

MR. W. E. GLADSTONE: Is that all the noble Lord says?

*LORD GEORGE HAMILTON: I did not go further.

Mr. W. E. Gladstone

MR. W. E. GLADSTONE: I do not agree with the noble Lord. I do not believe the attempt would be made; but, supposing it were made by perfectly Parliamentary and Constitutional processes, what would the Army have to do with it? The noble Lord does not propose to check the attempt by forbidding Petitions, Addresses, or Resolutions. His Resolution is quite as much in defect as it is in excess. It sins quite as much by what it omits as by what it commits, and sins enormously in both. The noble Lord supposes the case of a Resolution to the effect that none but Irish-born troops shall serve in Ireland. That would not be a Parliamentary Petition for the relaxation of restrictions, but a Resolution which, if it meant anything, would appear to contemplate direct military action by an Irish force against the forces of the Empire. Does he really believe that, if Ireland were unhappily set upon any of these extreme, dangerous, and suicidal councils, his Resolution would prevent it? Under the sub-sections that he leaves uncovered, there is plenty of space for an Irish Legislature to do things infinitely more dangerous to the Union of the Kingdoms and the maintenance of the Imperial power than any Resolution such as he describes would be. I am quite sure that if we wish the Irish Parliament to remain on safe lines in these Imperial matters we must show it a certain confidence; but if we begin with these little restraints and prohibitions, showing our desire to wound but fear to strike, it will be impossible to devise any methods more directly calculated to disturb the relations between the two Islands. Suppose the Irish Parliament passes this evil Resolution, how will the noble Lord proceed against it? Will he march down a regiment and repeat the process of Pride's Purge? Will he send colonels and soldiers to surround the Table in the Irish Parliament and make a selection of who shall withdraw and who shall remain? He cannot have so little of the sense of a statesman as to suppose that it is by this use of local authority and force that these, by supposition, terrible discords are to be met. The instrument to which the Government look for meeting this contingency, which is immeasurably remote, and unlikely as anything can be that is not absolutely impossible, is not the Viceroy, nor the Forces stationed in Ireland, but this House. Under these circumstances, I submit that the noble Lord's Amendment is in its positive sense most mischievous, because it begins a work which absolutely requires some initial degree, at least, of mutual confidence and reliance by a proclamation which really flaunts in the face of the Irish nation and the Irish Legislature a belief that they are untrue to their declarations, and that nothing is to be expected from them but resistance and disturbance. But, besides that, the Amendment, in my opinion, is totally inefficient for the purpose that the noble Lord has in view. While he closes one door, and one, perhaps, rather small door, he leaves open other doors that are larger, and will admit of more dangerous and serious incursions. The noble Lord, therefore, totally fails in the object which he proposes to attain, while he inflicts grave and serious damage upon those other and I think better aims which are the declared and fundamental objects of the Bill.

MR. J. CHAMBERLAIN: I had not intended to say a single word upon this Amendment; and, indeed, I had some little doubt whether I could possibly support it. I was inclined to think with my right hon. Friend who has just sat down that the Amendment was inapplicable, and while closing one single door left open many others, through which greater incursions upon the interests of this country might easily be made. But while I was reflecting upon the advantages of silence and of virtuous retirement, my right hon. Friend, to my intense surprise, sought me out to slay me with a sneer at my ability and the influence which the right hon. Gentleman supposes me to have with the loyal minority. I confess I am totally at a loss to know, when I was so inclined to keep out of the fray, why my right hon. Friend should use his most powerful weapons to demolish me. There is no encouragement to be silent.

MR. W. E. GLADSTONE: My right hon. Friend is under a misunderstanding. I had no intention of accusing him of having entitled himself to influence with the loyal minority by the means that are commonly in force. On the contrary, I desired to the best of my ability to acknowledge the honourable abstention which, it appears to me, my right hon. Friend has practised in that respect in abstaining from those means of currying favour with the loyal minority which have been so much in favour with the Tory Party.

MR. J. CHAMBERLAIN: That was the second reference which my right hon. Friend made to me, and for that I was extremely grateful. It was the first reference which aroused me from my apparent indifference, and in that my right hon. Friend, without rhyme or reason, made a sudden violent attack upon me. I really am at some difficulty to understand why I was suddenly sought out for the purpose of being held up as a terrible example to the House. I have, however, come to the conclusion that this is the usual course of my right hon. Friend whenever he has a bad case; and I feel it necessary, therefore, to look more carefully than I had intended into the Amendment which has been proposed. I remember perfectly well that on a previous occasion when the right hon. Gentleman had to throw over previous speakers and to climb down, he covered that operation, which most of us would not have indulged in with any grace or satisfaction, with such cuts and thrusts at his opponents all round, as if he was enjoying a tremendous triumph when he was really submitting to a tremendous defeat. No one admires so much as I do the rhetorical methods of my right hon. Friend; but he at once awakened my vigilance, and, having considered carefully my right hon. Friend's subsequent observations, I begin to see that there is very great force in the Amendment of the noble Lord. I still think that it does not go far enough, but that is an omission which can easily be repaired. One of the arguments of the right hon. Gentleman was certainly the strangest that I ever heard, even from him. The Prime Minister said—"What a deprivation this would be to the Irish Parliament, as they would thereby be prevented from passing a Resolution congratulating Her Majesty upon some event of great public interest;" and he actually took as a particular event upon which he thought the Irish Parliament would be in a state of almost unnatural eagerness to congratulate Her Majesty on the birth of an Heir to the Crown. I may point out that before the Irish Parliament can congratulate Her Majesty upon the birth of an Heir to the Crown they must have an opportunity of congratulating Her Majesty upon the marriage of an Heir to the Crown; but, judging from what we have recently seen, judging from the conduct of one of the most popular and Representative Bodies in Ireland, the Council of the City of Dublin, I do not think it is at all likely the Irish Parliament would feel the deprivation. The Prime Minister says—"Suppose you prohibit the Irish Parliament from passing Resolutions. By what process are you going to make your action valid? Suppose they pass Resolutions in spite of you, what are you going to do? Are you going to bring your Army down to the Houses of Parliament, carry out another Pride's Purge, and say take away that bauble." That is, of course, if the Irish Parliament indulges in a Mace, which, I suppose, it will. Has it not again and again been represented to the Prime Minister that, although the Irish Parliament are prohibited from passing Acts on certain subjects, they may do it in spite of the prohibition? The Prime Minister's reply is—"You have an Army of 30,000 men."

MR. W. E. GLADSTONE: I have not said that.

MR. J. CHAMBERLAIN: I do not say they are the exact words of the right hon. Gentleman, but they give the spirit of his reply. The right hon. Gentleman has pointed again and again to Great Britain's superior force. He has said—"You are 30,000,000 against 5,000,000." But this superior force is only operative through the Army. It is not because we are 30,000,000 that the Irish Parliament will pay the slightest attention to our wishes. It would only be because we have a force enough to carry out our wishes. The Prime Minister should see that, whatever weight is to be attached to the force to be employed, it applies exactly the same to Resolutions and to Acts of Parliament. If it be true that it is impossible to enforce a prohibition of Resolutions, then I defy the right hon. Gentleman to show how the prohibition of Acts of Parliament is to be enforced. If the Prime Minister's argument is a sound one, it cuts at the whole of the safeguards of the Bill; and Clauses 3 and 4 are not worth the paper on which they are printed. I certainly think my right hon. Friend cannot see how far his own argument goes, and I am hopeful that he may be willing to reconsider his position, and all the more because he has practically given a pledge on the subject. He said on the introduction of the Bill that it was his intention to prohibit the Irish Parliament from dealing with certain subjects and from doing any act in relation thereto. I am perfectly well aware that when the right hon. Gentleman was reminded of this on a previous occasion he said that he meant "Act of Parliament." But he could not then have had his own words before him; his actual words were "doing any act," and if "Act of Parliament" were substituted for "act" in the sentence I have quoted, it makes nonsense. The right hon. Gentleman must have meant doing acts outside the ordinary legislative process of Acts of Parliament, and anyone would have understood Resolutions to be there included. That is common sense; but what is the sense of saying to the Irish Parliament—"You shall not pass an Act of Parliament on this or that subject, and you shall pass a Resolution, which will be as injurious to the British interests which we seek to protect as any Act that could possibly be passed"? In the case of any difficulty with a Foreign Power, will anyone say that a Resolution of such a Body as a practically independent and, at all events, a separate Irish Parliament sympathising with our enemies would not be as dangerous to British interests as any Act of Parliament? It is playing with the House to suggest that these restrictions are valid and worthy of support, and at the same time freely to allow the Irish Parliament to do other acts which are kindred in their character and certain to be equally mischievous. The last argument put forward by the Prime Minister was that the difficulty suggested by the noble Lord (Lord George Hamilton) was immeasurably remote. Why should it be so? The portion of the Irish people for whom the Government are legislating are opposed to all these restrictions, and declare that they will not rest until they are removed. Is it not certain, under those circumstances, that, if they could deal with the reserved subjects by Resolution, while the restriction with respect to legislation obtain, they will take the opportunity? I do not know whether the Prime Minister has always held this opinion, but my right hon. Colleagues have not. I would remind the Secretary for Scotland of a speech he made in this House on the Second Reading of the Bill of 1886? He said of that Bill, and it is equally true of this Bill—"Do you tell us that certain subjects are reserved from the Irish Parliament? Do you flatter yourselves that you can prevent the Irish Parliament from discussing these subjects and passing Resolutions upon them"? Then the Secretary for Scotland wound up by saying that separation would be better than such a state of things. The Secretary for Scotland was perfectly logical and sensible in that argument then; it will be a pleasure to hear him now. I dare say he would make a sensible and logical speech, but I think he would find it very difficult to justify the vote he is going to give. I do not hesitate to say that, although we are only dealing with a small branch of it, this question of passing Resolutions is at the root of the restrictions which the Government propose; and it is useless and childish to prevent the Irish Parliament from legislating on any subject, if they are left free to discuss and pass Resolutions upon it.

*MR. E. STANHOPE (Lincolnshire, Horncastle): I hesitated a moment before rising, because I hoped that someone on the Government Bench would have replied to my right hon. Friend. I think the House will realise that I have some right to speak upon this subject by virtue of the office I held in the last Administration. It was most unworthy of the right hon. Gentleman the Prime Minister to pit his years and experience against the years and experience of my noble Friend, who has been a Member of the House of Commons for very many years, and who has been a Member of an Administration for more years than any gentleman on the Treasury Bench, with the single exception of the Prime Minister. The noble Lord has, moreover, in two Administrations had to deal with the Admiralty, and he has a right to bring forward a subject which he deemed of such importance to that Service. The Prime Minister argued that the proposal of my noble Friend is insufficient. That is admitted. The Opposition would like the Proviso to be extended to all the restrictions in the clause; but they do not wish to waste the time of the House. The general question was discussed in Committee at great length; we were beaten upon it, and my noble Friend now takes out one particular case that was not discussed, and asks to have it debated, because he deems it—as we all deem it—of supreme importance to the interests of this country. After the extraordinarily vague speech of the right hon. Gentleman, perhaps I may be allowed to direct the attention of the Committee more closely to the point at issue. We have been told over and over again by the Government that this Bill will make no change in the position of the Army and Navy, and that they will still remain under the Lord Lieutenant as an Imperial officer. But what we contend is, that if a Home Rule Legislature cannot alter the position of the Army and Navy by Statute, it can alter it by Resolution. This is no idle fear. The right hon. Gentleman seems to think it is unreasonable to prevent the Irish Parliament passing a Resolution. But what has he himself done on the 16th clause? He has absolutely debarred it from passing any Address to the Crown on the question of Revenue. We say that the Irish Parliament not only could change the position of the Army and Navy in Ireland, but that the temptation would be in the direction of inducing them to make that change. We want securities against the time when there may be an apprehension on the part of the Irish Parliament that the Army and Navy are to be used in enforcing Imperial supremacy. The Home Rule Parliament might pass Resolutions which would hamper and harass the action of the Services. I will give three cases in which that might be done. Would it not be possible for the Home Rule Parliament by Resolution practically to prevent the Army in Ireland from obtaining any supplies? Again, can anybody doubt that a Resolution of the Home Rule Parliament might have an enormous effect on recruiting? Why, the action of the Home Rule Party has had within the last few years a very great effect on recruiting. If we believe the Report of the Inspector General on Recruiting the National Party have done a great deal to prevent recruiting.

MR. T. M. HEALY : Where ?

*MR. E. STANHOPE : I am quoting from the Report of the Inspector General on Recruiting, and that is an authority which I think the House will accept more readily than it will the statement of the hon. and learned Gentleman.

MR. T. M. HEALY : How has it been the action of the Irish Party ? What proof is there of that ?

*MR. E. STANHOPE : In the third place, might not the English Army be placed in a very difficult position with regard to deserters if the Home Rule Legislature did its best to prevent the Civil authority from aiding the military in securing their apprehension ? I challenge the right hon. Gentleman for some reply on these three points. The right hon. Gentleman says that, if we carry this Proviso, we shall not have complete security. That is true ; but we want to get all the security we can, and this Amendment will give us some. It is a security which the Government ought not to deny to us, and if it is denied we shall be entitled to say to the country that the securities given to the Imperial Parliament for enforcing its wishes are intended by the Government to be the shams which we believe them to be.

*SIR G. CHESNEY (Oxford) said, there was one point not yet touched upon in the Debate, as to which he desired to say a few words. The Prime Minister, in replying to the speech of the noble Lord the Member for Enfield (Lord George Hamilton), twitted him with the incompleteness of applying the Proviso to one clause only — and asked why, if it were necessary to apply it to the Irish Legislature with regard to military questions, should it not be applied with regard to the much more important questions connected with foreign affairs and the succession to the Crown ? The argument afforded its own refutation. There was this difference between the two cases : A Resolution passed by the Irish Legislature with respect to foreign affairs might be extremely mischievous ; but, at any rate, it would have no Executive action. It would be inoperative except in so far as it exhibited the feeling of the Irish Legislature. But a Resolution with regard to the Army quartered in Ireland might have an immediate executive and operative effect. Therefore, it was quite reasonable to propose this particular Amendment without necessarily attaching corresponding Amendments to all the other sub-sections of the clause. A Resolution of that kind passed by the Irish Legislature might at once bring the Parliaments of the two countries into conflict, and he believed that sooner or later such a conflict would come. It was all very well for the Prime Minister to say that they had no reason to believe that the Irish Legislature would show a spirit resembling that which had for many years been exhibited by the Leaders of the Irish people. The right hon. Gentleman had certainly given them no reason why they should entertain such a hope. But even supposing, for the sake of argument, that the hon. Gentleman who succeeded to power, in the first instance, would be actuated by the sincere desire to so work the new measure as to avoid grounds of conflict with the English Parliament, they might reasonably assume that those gentlemen would not hold power long, but would be succeeded by another set of Irish statesmen who would assume the natural part of playing on the excitable disposition of their countrymen. Then difficulties would begin to arise. A Resolution, for instance, passed by the Irish Legislature on some cause of difference between the two Governments, appealing, perhaps, to the supposed patriotism of the Irish people, might be fraught with the most disastrous consequences to the maintenance of peace between the two countries. The right hon. Gentleman had told them it was their duty to act in this matter on the policy of trust. But when a man was about to marry his daughter to a young man who, no doubt, was to be thoroughly trusted, they did not exhibit that trust in drawing up the marriage settlements. On the contrary, the family lawyer treated the young man as if he were a worthless spendthrift. If that was the principle that guided them in private affairs, they ought not to show less care and caution in conducting the business of the nation. While he should support the Amendment of the noble Lord, he did not believe it would have any strong effect, for if the power of passing Resolutions was taken away from the Irish Legislature they might still express their will and wishes indirectly, and in such a manner in regard to the Army as would make the position of British troops in Ireland perfectly intolerable. He believed that if the Bill was passed it would follow, sooner or later, as a necessary consequence, that the Imperial Government would be required to withdraw the troops from Ireland as the only means of preserving peace, for they could find no example in history where a Legislature such as was proposed to be set up in Ireland had been placed side by side with a garrison belonging to a dominant and separate Government. Such an experiment had never been tried even in countries where they had no strife, no passion long pent up, no ill-will, and no ill-blood fomented in the past, and certainly, of all countries in the world, Ireland was the last in which it should be tried. The Amendment, though he thought it did not go far enough, was a step in the right direction, and on that ground he should support it. The Irish Parliament, if it meant to be thoroughly loyal, could have no objection to it; while if it had no such intention, they could not lose sight of the fact that it might do tremendous harm by passing Resolutions, and the stipulation became all the more necessary.

ADMIRAL FIELD said, the Navy had been referred to as well as the Army, and, therefore, he felt bound to say what the Navy would think of any Resolutions passed by the Irish Parliament. The noble Lord had spoken of the difficulty which might be caused to the Army and Navy by the Irish Parliament passing a Resolution dealing with Supplies; and, of course, if he went to a Division, they would support him. But, as a naval officer, he would like to point out that naval men would be in a different position from the Army—they would be afloat. Every Captain would know how to handle his ship, and every Admiral how to handle his squadron, in spite of any number of Irish Resolutions. If an Irish Parliament attempted to pass any Resolution reflecting on naval men, or fettering their action, they would make short work of it. If they wanted Supplies, which were refused, they would do as Nelson did in a like case, when he said—

“If you do not send them we shall come and take them.” They would simply send their boats ashore, and there would be no difficulty with the butchers or provision merchants. They were entirely apart from the Sister Service, and knew how to protect themselves.

COLONEL NOLAN (Galway, N.) said, that after the speech of the hon. and gallant Admiral (Admiral Field) the noble Lord would probably withdraw that portion of the Resolution that affected the Navy. But he did object to the Irish Parliament being prevented doing things which it was already in the power of Poor Law Guardians to do. Soldiers were occasionally brought before Boards of Guardians in Ireland for the purpose of obtaining an order that they should be sent to England, and, of course, Resolutions had to be passed. As to Volunteers the provision was unnecessary, as there were none in Ireland. But why should not a Resolution be passed in favour of military camps dealing with shopkeepers instead of with the stores? Again, if a foolish officer built a magazine so near a town as to be a source of danger, why should not a Resolution of protest be permissible? There were no arsenals in Ireland, and he did not see why Resolutions should not be passed in favour of having one. He did not believe that the passing of Resolutions on any of the subjects he had mentioned would upset the Military Forces of the Crown.

QUESTIONS.

THE NATIONAL GALLERY.

MR. WHITMORE (Chelsea) : I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury whether the duties of the Director of the National Gallery have of recent years been practically limited to the selection and purchase of pictures ; whether he is aware that only two pictures were bought last year, and that until the Gallery is enlarged (which cannot be done for four or five years hence), there is no space in which more pictures can be conveniently hung ; whether, in view of the approaching vacancy in the office, he will consider whether it is desirable to appoint a new Director at a salary of £1,000 per annum, in addition to the Keeper and Secretary of the Gallery ; and whether the sum economised might be added to the sum allotted annually for the purchase of pictures ?

THE SECRETARY TO THE TREASURY (Sir J. T. HIBBERT, Oldham) : The duties of the Director have in no way changed since the establishment of the office in 1855, and are by no means limited to the selection and purchase of pictures. The Director is the sole responsible officer for everything connected with the establishment. The number of pictures purchased varies, of course, very widely with the opportunities afforded. The acquisitions made in any given year form no criterion. Besides, the Director is equally responsible for the acceptance or rejection of the large number of pictures from time to time offered to the Gallery by gift or bequest. Although many of the rooms are at present much crowded under the indispensable arrangement according to schools, temporary accommodation can always be found for pictures acquired, pending an addition to the building. There is no vacancy in the office of Director at present. When there is, no doubt the First Lord of the Treasury will consider with the Trustees whether any changes in the organisation of the Gallery are required.

THE ARMY ACT.

MR. HANBURY (Preston) : I beg to ask the Secretary of State for War whether the Army Act embodying the whole of the alterations since 1881 has yet been printed in such a form as to be read as one complete Act, and to be more intelligible to those who serve under it than an Act requiring reference to some 20 subsequent Statutes ?

*THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR WAR (Mr. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN, Stirling, &c.) : The Army Act as amended by later Acts, including the legislation of the present Session, is now being reprinted by the Stationery Office, and will be issued shortly.

PRELIMINARY EXAMINATION FOR THE ARMY.

MR. JEFFREYS (Hants, Basingstoke) : I beg to ask the Secretary of State for War whether he is aware that, in consequence of his decision to abolish the preliminary examination for the Army, the majority of the candidates who have already passed that examination have been put to great and unnecessary trouble and expense in preparing for, and in coming to London to pass, that examination ; whether he is still determined that these candidates shall not derive any benefit from having passed that examination ; and whether he will consider the advisability of not making the new Regulations retrospective, but will allow those candidates who have passed the preliminary examination to compete in the further examination for the Army on the same terms and conditions as formerly ?

SIR R. WEBSTER (Isle of Wight) : I beg to ask the Secretary of State for War whether, in view of the fact that the subjects in which candidates for the preliminary examination for the Army are examined are the following :—Euclid Book I., Algebra to Simple Equations, Arithmetic to Simple Interest, French, Latin, Geography, Writing, and Dictation, he was correct in stating, in the month of July last, that the above examination was only equivalent to the Fourth Standard in elementary schools; when the new Regulations for Sandhurst will be issued; and whether candidates who have passed in the above subjects will have again to pass, or whether they will be treated as being already qualified in those subjects?

*MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: As I explained on a former occasion, any candidate who has passed the preliminary examination will, when examined in the competitive examination, be relieved from the necessity of obtaining a minimum qualifying number of marks in the subjects which were embraced in the preliminary examination. So far he will have an advantage, but to exclude him from examination in those subjects would be a distinct loss to him, inasmuch as all the marks he would gain in any of them would count towards his total number of marks. The hon. Gentleman rather exaggerates the trouble and expense which the preliminary examination entailed, inasmuch as it was frequently undergone locally, without a journey to London. And it is intended that in future there shall be arrangements for localising the competitive examination. My hon. and learned Friend takes me to task for speaking disrespectfully of the preliminary examination. I used the comparison of it to the Fourth Standard, not as my own opinion, but as a quotation from a competent authority. It was a jocular comparison not meant to be strictly accurate; but I think if my hon. Friend considers that apart from an elementary examination in subjects which were embraced in the further examination, the special subjects of the preliminary examination were arithmetic, English, and geography—all of a simple character—he will agree that it could not reckon as a very formidable test of higher education. The new Regulations for entrance to Sandhurst are in the printers' hands.

THE CASE OF THOMAS FEENY.

MR. TULLY (Leitrim, S.): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for War what reply was given to the Memorial on behalf of Thomas Feeny, who was private (No. 388) for four years in the Second North Lincoln Regiment, Tenth Foot, from 1858 to 1862; whether he is aware that this man was invalided from the effects of sunstroke in South Africa, and sent home to his relatives in Ballinamore, County Leitrim, utterly destitute, and left a burden on them since; and whether, under the circumstances, some pension or compensation can be granted to him?

*MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: No Memorial can be traced as having been received at the War Office on behalf of Thomas Feeny. The soldier was discharged in 1862 after less than four years' service on account of congenital mental imbecility. His papers do not refer to sunstroke in South Africa.

H.M.S. "APOLLO."

MR. GILHOOLY (Cork Co., W.): I beg to ask the Secretary to the Admiralty whether he has received solemn declarations made before a Magistrate by Thomas Goggin and John Regan, who allege that they have saved H.M.S. Apollo from being wrecked off Crookhaven Harbour; and whether, in view of the conflict of testimony between these men and the Captain of the Apollo, he will cause a sworn inquiry to be held into the circumstances connected with this matter?

THE SECRETARY TO THE ADMIRALTY (Sir U. KAY-SHUTTLEWORTH, Lancashire, Clitheroe): The hon. Member was so good as to hand to me the declarations to which he refers. The Admiralty have inquired into this case, and are of opinion that the fishermen were under an entire misapprehension in imagining that the Apollo was in any danger. No further inquiry regarding the occurrence can be opened by the Admiralty.

MR. GILHOOLY: I will draw attention to this matter on the Navy Estimates.

CORK, BANDON, AND SOUTH COAST RAILWAY COMPANY.

MR. GILHOOLY: I beg to ask the Postmaster General whether he will be prepared to give a subsidy to the Cork, Bandon, and South Coast Railway Company in the event of their running an additional daily train for the accommodation of the inhabitants of West Cork?

MR. E. BARRY (Cork Co., S.): At the same time, may I ask the right hon. Gentleman whether he has received copies of resolutions from all the Public Bodies in West Cork requesting that a better train and postal service be granted to that district; and whether he is able to comply with their wishes?

*THE POSTMASTER GENERAL (Mr. A. MORLEY, Nottingham, E.): I have received copies of certain resolutions on the subject referred to. As before explained, I am precluded from offering any subsidy to the Railway Company concerned by the fact the mail service in West Cork already entails a heavy loss to the revenue. I regret that it is not practicable to meet the wishes which have been expressed for an improvement of the service unless the railway service is improved by the Company.

MR. GILHOOLY: Is the right hon. Gentleman aware that his predecessor in Office offered a subsidy to the Railway Company if they would run additional trains?

MR. A. MORLEY: No, Sir.

MR. GILHOOLY: Will the right hon. Gentleman inquire?

MR. A. MORLEY: Yes, Sir.

ORANGE CELEBRATION AT PORTADOWN.

MR. FLYNN (Cork Co., N.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether he is aware that the house of a Catholic named John Furfy, of Portadown, was attacked on the night of the 12th instant by the members of an Orange Lodge returning from celebrating the "Closing of the gates of Derry," and the windows and furniture smashed, and the son of Mr. Furfy badly wounded in the head; what steps, if any, will be taken by the Police Authorities to bring the assailants to justice; and whether, in view of the frequent attacks upon the houses of Catholics by Orange drumming parties, steps will be taken by the police, whose barrack is within one mile of the scene of this occurrence, to afford full protection to the Catholic inhabitants of the neighbourhood?

THE CHIEF SECRETARY FOR IRELAND (Mr. J. MORLEY, Newcastle-upon-Tyne): With regard to the first and second paragraphs, I understand that the alleged occurrence is about to form the subject of investigation by the Magistrates at Petty Sessions before whom the facts will no doubt be fully elucidated. In reference to the last paragraph of the question, I understand it is not true that there have been frequent attacks on houses in the neighbourhood of Portadown, which is perfectly quiet and free from crime.

THE NEWFOUNDLAND (FRENCH SHORE) FISHERY QUESTION.

MR. J. W. LOWTHER (Cumberland, Penrith): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies when the Papers, promised by Lord Ripon on the 29th June, relating to the Newfoundland (French Shore) Fishery question, will be laid upon the Table and circulated?

THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE COLONIES (Mr. S. BUXTON, Tower Hamlets, Poplar): The Papers were laid on the Table yesterday, and I have every reason to expect that they will be in the hands of Members by the 23rd instant.

NEWFOUNDLAND LOBSTER FISHERIES.

SIR C. W. DILKE (Gloucester, Forest of Dean): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies whether he has now received information as to the recent incident on the coast of Newfoundland, when the Commander of H.M.S. Pelican interfered with certain lobster-catching engines?

MR. S. BUXTON: The information on the subject is now to hand. The incident was purely British, and the French were not concerned. The late Commodore, to prevent disputes, defied the fishing grounds assigned to the different British lobster factories, which under the modus vivendi were allowed to continue in operation. This year the manager of one British factory encroached upon his neighbour's water, and, on his refusing to remove the lobster traps, obedience was enforced by the Commander of the Pelican, and the owner was informed that he must confine his operations to his own water.

THE CREWE EXHUMATION.

MR. BYLES (York, W.R., Shipley): I beg to ask the Parliamentary Secretary to the Local Government Board whether the Registrar General has taken any steps in reference to the case of Dr. Atkinson, of Crewe, whose conduct in giving a certificate of death for a child whom he had not attended when ill led to the exhumation of the body and an inquest; whether he will read to the House any communication which the Registrar General has sent to Dr. Atkinson; and what opinion the Registrar General has expressed in reference to the action of the Coroner, Mr. Churton?

*THE PARLIAMENTARY SECRETARY TO THE LOCAL GOVERNMENT BOARD (Sir W. FOSTER, Derby, Ilkeston): The Registrar General on the 15th instant addressed a letter to Mr. Atkinson stating that by giving the certificate as to the cause of death of Edith Prestwich he contravened the provisions of the Births and Deaths Registration Act 1874, and that the Registrar General had had seriously to consider whether he ought not to direct that he should be prosecuted for wilfully making a false certificate for the purposes of that Act. After a very careful consideration of all the facts, however, he had decided that it was necessary to take the extreme course of directing a prosecution, but he felt it to be his duty, seriously, to warn him to be very careful in future not to give a certificate of the cause of death in a case in which he had not attended the deceased, as he would be compelled to take proceedings against him if it were again brought under his notice that he had committed an offence under the Act referred to. As Mr. Churton, the Coroner, is not in any way subject to the jurisdiction of the Registrar General, I cannot make any statement as to any opinion entertained by the Registrar General with respect to Mr. Churton's action.

GOVERNMENT CONTRACTS IN SCOTLAND.

MR. KEIR HARDIE (West Ham, S.): I beg to ask the Secretary for Scotland whether Government contracts are given to the Clyde Bridge Steel Works and to Mossend Steel Works; whether he is aware that these firms are non-Union and pay their workmen less than Trades Union rates of wages; and what action he proposes to take in the matter?

THE SECRETARY FOR SCOTLAND (Sir G. TREVELYAN, Glasgow, Bridgeton): There are no Government contracts given by any of the Scottish Departments to the firms referred to in the question of the hon. Member. I may add that in issuing contracts the Scottish Office has taken full precautions for acting in accordance with the Resolution of the House of the 13th February, 1891.

MR. KEIR HARDIE: Can the Secretary of State for War say whether these firms have any Government contracts?

MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: If the hon. Member will put the question down I will inquire.

THE GOVERNMENT AND THE NATIONAL TELEPHONE COMPANY.

MR. HOZIER (Lanarkshire, S.): I beg to ask the Postmaster General whether, in the interest of municipal telephone licences such as that applied for by Glasgow, he will, before signing it, submit the agreement between the Government and the National Telephone Company for the approval of the House?

MR. A. MORLEY: I would refer the hon. Member to the reply which I gave on the 31st ultimo to a question on this subject, which was put to me by the hon. Member for the Lowestoft Division of Suffolk (Mr. H. S. Foster).

CONTAGIOUS DISEASES REGULATIONS AT MALTA.

MR. W. M'LAREN (Cheshire, Crewe): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for War whether he has yet received an answer from Malta to his inquiry regarding the way in which the Contagious Diseases Regulations are carried out, more especially as to the soldiers being obliged to point out the woman from whom they say they have contracted disease?

*MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: This Report has been received, but I have not yet had time to read it. I must ask the hon. Gentleman to repeat his question.

PUBLIC ROADS THROUGH THE CURRAGH.

MR. MINCH (Kildare, S.): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for War whether he is aware that an application was made to the Grand Jury at Kildare, at their last meeting at Naas, on behalf of the Military Authorities, for leave to close the public road passing through the Curragh, and leading from Ballysax to Altigarvan and Newbridge; and whether, considering the widespread dissatisfaction which this action on the part of the Military Authorities has caused in the localities likely to be affected, and in view of the serious depreciation in the value of property, and the great inconvenience to the public which the closing of this road would involve, he will have inquiry made into the matter, and have the rights of the public protected?

*MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN : It has become necessary to close the road running through the camp at certain hours to allow of rifle practice. Application has been made to the Grand Jury who approve the closing of the road on certain conditions which are now under consideration, and which include the opening to the public of certain military roads and the maintenance at the War Department expense of other roads belonging to the county.

RECRUITING IN IRELAND.

MR. HANBURY : I beg to ask the Secretary of State for War whether his attention has been called to the statement, in the Recruiting Report of General Fielding, that in Ireland even those enlisted have been obtained with great difficulty from districts which 10 years ago provided the Army with an abundant supply of men of fine physique, and the chief causes are (1) great increase in number of emigrants, (2) the opposition of the Nationalist Party to the enlistment of any young Irishman in Her Majesty's Forces; and how the recruiting from Ireland for the first six months of this year compares with the corresponding six months of 1891 (the year referred to by General Fielding) and 1881 respectively?

MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN : The enlistments in Ireland during the first six months of 1893 were 1,616, against 1,679 during the same period in 1891 and 1,472 in 1881; but these numbers are rather misleading, unless compared with the total number of recruits of the respective years. This cannot yet be done for 1893; but the Irish recruits raised in the first half of 1881 were 5·6 per cent. of the whole number of recruits of the year, while those of 1891 were only 5·1 per cent. At the same time, the proportion of men in the Army of Irish nationality has fallen from 209 to 135 per 1,000.

DISTURBANCES AT PETERHEAD.

MR. RENSCHAW (Renfrew, W.) : I beg to ask the Secretary for Scotland whether he can now give more definite information as to the disturbances which took place at Peterhead; whether he proposes to institute a searching inquiry into the whole matter, on behalf of the Government; and what steps he proposes to take to prevent a recurrence of such a deplorable interference with the freedom of trade?

SIR G. TREVELYAN : I have ordered a full inquiry to be made by the Sheriff of the county, which, I understand, commences to-day at Peterhead. It would be premature to say more until his Report is laid before me and considered.

PROPOSED FRENCH CANAL THROUGH THE MALAY PENINSULA.

SIR C. W. DILKE : I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, in reference to the statement in The Times of Thursday, 17th August, that a French diplomatist of high standing has been sent to Bangkok to ask for a grant of land in connection with a French scheme for making a canal through the Malay Peninsula, whether there exist any Papers which can be laid before Parliament on the difficulties in the way of the continuation of such a canal?

SIR E. GREY : Her Majesty's Government were informed on the 18th of July that M. Myre de Vilers was being sent to Bangkok; but it is not known that his mission is in any way connected with such a scheme as that mentioned in the question. I must ask the right hon. Baronet to postpone the last part of his question till there has been time to examine the Papers.

THE BEHRING SEA AWARD.

MR. GIBSON BOWLES (Lynn Regis) : I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether the Behring Sea Award imposes upon Great Britain the obligation to forbid pelagic sealing by British subjects at any time whatever on the high seas within a zone of 60 sea miles round the American sealing grounds on the Pribyloff Islands, and also to forbid the use by British subjects of nets, firearms, or explosives, or the employment of any vessels other than sailing vessels in pelagic sealing, at all times and in all waters whatever of the Behring Sea, and further to forbid all pelagic sealing of any kind in the Behring Sea during the months of May, June, and July; whether it is the fact that, while the Award imposes these obligations on Great Britain as regards sealing on the high seas, it imposes no obligation whatever on the United States to forbid, restrict, or regulate sealing on land at any time; and whether the effect of the Award is to give a practical monopoly of sealing to the subjects of the United States, while depriving British subjects of any share therein?

SIR E. GREY: The prohibited zone round the Islands, and the nature of the prohibition as to the use of nets, firearms, or explosives, or of other than sailing vessels seem to be correctly stated, as also the close season during which sealing is prohibited; but Article 2 of the Award applies only to that part of Behring Sea which lies to the east of the line laid down in the Treaty between Russia and the United States of 1867. The Award imposes the obligations in question both on Great Britain and the United States as regards sealing on the high seas. It imposes no obligations either on Great Britain or the United States as regards sealing on land or in territorial waters. But the Arbitrators have in a separate Paper recommended that regulations should be made for this purpose. It is not considered that the effect of the Award is such as is described in the last paragraph of the question.

MR. GIBSON BOWLES: Is it not a fact that British subjects are deprived of any share in the sealing? What share, if any, have they left?

SIR E. GREY: I expressly stated that the statement in the last part of the question that they are deprived of any share in the sealing does not accord with our opinion of the Award.

MR. GIBSON BOWLES: Precisely; but what share have they left?

SIR E. GREY: Certain restrictions, but not total prohibition, are laid down.

POOR LAW GUARDIANS AND THE UNEMPLOYED.

MR. KEIR HARDIE: I beg to ask the President of the Local Government Board whether he can now state the extent of the powers possessed by Boards of Guardians for acquiring land and setting the unemployed to work thereon at reasonable wages; whether such employment necessarily implies the disfranchisement of the persons so employed; and whether he will issue a Circular to Boards of Guardians calling attention to their powers in this respect, and stating how far the Local Government Board is prepared to co-operate with them in putting such powers into operation?

THE PRESIDENT OF THE LOCAL GOVERNMENT BOARD (MR. H. H. FOWLER, Wolverhampton, E.): I am not yet in a position to answer the question.

MR. KEIR HARDIE: When may we expect an answer?

MR. H. H. FOWLER: As soon as I receive the opinion of the Law Officers.

MR. KEIR HARDIE subsequently asked the right hon. Gentleman whether he was aware that the question was of urgent importance, and that a number of Boards of Guardians in the East of London were awaiting the decision of the Government, and whether he could bring pressure to bear on the Law Officers of the Crown to give their opinion as soon as possible?

MR. H. H. FOWLER: There is no occasion to bring pressure to bear upon the Law Officers of the Crown. The question they have to consider is one of the greatest difficulty, but I am sure they will give it every attention in their power.

MR. KEIR HARDIE asked whether the Law Officers were devising any amendment of the law, or whether they were simply going to advise on the existing law?

MR. H. H. FOWLER: They will simply advise on the existing law.

PIGEON HOUSE FORT.

MR. FIELD (Dublin, St. Patrick's): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for War whether the few soldiers stationed at the Pigeon House could be temporarily accommodated elsewhere, as their location in the fort is said to delay the progress of the main drainage scheme; and whether his Department and the Irish Government will co-operate in facilitating the commencement of this urgently needed improvement?

*MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: This is not a question of a few troops who could be moved out at will, but of the Ordnance Store establishment for all Ireland. The men cannot be moved until the stores can be accommodated elsewhere. I would call upon the hon. Member to use all his influence, and I will certainly exert all mine, to bring about such an arrangement as I pointed to yesterday.

MR. FIELD: This delay is a very serious matter for the inhabitants of Dublin.

MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: It is equally serious so far as the War Office is concerned. At this place is situated the store establishment for the whole of Ireland. We are anxious, however, to meet the Corporation of Dublin as far as possible.

MR. CLANCY (Dublin Co., N.): What is the exact difficulty in the way?

MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: It is that the scheme has been pronounced by the Army Sanitary Commission to be injurious to the health of the occupants of Pigeon House Fort, and what we are now endeavouring to do is to get the Corporation to acquire the Pigeon House site on condition of giving us a site elsewhere.

MR. FIELD: Will the right hon. Gentleman come and live on the banks of the Liffey?

MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: I know the Liffey.

MR. FIELD: You know it so well that you avoid it.

VISITS TO IRISH CONVICTS.

MR. CLANCY: I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether an application made on behalf of representatives of the Limerick Amnesty Association for permission to visit John Daly and other prisoners confined in Portland Convict Prison has been recently refused; and, if so, why?

THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE HOME DEPARTMENT (Mr. ASQUITH, Fife, E.): Yes, Sir. The reason for the refusal was that given to the secretary—namely, that the privilege of visiting these convicts accorded by me on the express undertaking by the visitors that it would not be used for ulterior purposes, has been abused by the circulation in the Press and elsewhere of false statements as to the condition of the prisoners' health and as to their prison treatment.

*MR. CLANCY: Is it not the fact that before the last visit paid to Daly by Mr. Frederick Allen, of Dublin, an intimation was given to the authorities that Mr. Allen intended to publish an account of the visit in the Press?

MR. ASQUITH: I know nothing about that. Mr. Allen was allowed to visit Daly on the express understanding that he would not publish a report of the proceedings, and not make any use of the visit except to receive news from and communicate news to Daly.

*MR. CLANCY: The right hon. Gentleman has not taken any notice of the statement I made, that Mr. Allen announced that he intended to publish an account of the visit, and that he was allowed, notwithstanding, to visit the prison afterwards.

MR. ASQUITH: No such statement was made to me, otherwise Mr. Allen would never have been allowed to visit Daly.

MR. CLANCY: Seeing that some of the prisoners have no relatives in Great Britain or Ireland, and that the only visits they are likely to have are from members of the Amnesty Association, will the right hon. Gentleman re-consider his decision with regard to those against whom no fault is to be found?

MR. ASQUITH: I am extremely sorry that the prisoners should be deprived of such alleviation and comfort from the visits of outside persons, but the responsibility of the deprivation lies entirely with the persons who have violated the undertaking.

MR. CLANCY: Will the right hon. Gentleman re-consider his decision with reference to those persons against whom he has no fault whatever to find?

MR. ASQUITH: No, Sir; as at present advised, I cannot.

COMPULSORY INSTRUCTION IN SWIMMING.

DR. MACGREGOR (Inverness-shire): I beg to ask the Secretary for Scotland whether, in conjunction with the Vice President of the Council, they would consider the expediency of introducing into the Education Code a compulsory course of swimming lessons between the ages of 10 and 14, and thus prevent in a short time the loss of many lives from bathing and other causes?

SIR G. TREVELYAN: I am prepared, when the Code is next under revision, to make such change as will permit of instruction in swimming being recognised as an alternative to military drill, and to count as a school attendance.

TELEGRAPHIC TRANSFERS IN INDIA.

MR. VICARY GIBBS (Herts, St. Albans): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for India whether, as the India Council yesterday accepted the best price offered for telegraphic transfers in India, it is to be understood that they will continue to pursue this policy; and whether he is aware that the acceptance of tenders yesterday at 15½d. has had the effect of sending Indian exchange down to 14½d.?

*THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR INDIA (Mr. G. RUSSELL, North Beds.): No undertaking can be given as to the action that will be taken in the sale of bills on India, as it must depend on the amount and rates at which tenders are made. The Council of India does not fix any minimum rate below which no bills will be accepted. Usually tenders up to the advertised amount are taken, if the rate offered is not below the market rate of the day; but in a falling market tenders of very small amount are generally refused. On the last seven Wednesdays bills for 80,000 rupees above the market rate and transfers for 12 lakhs tendered at the market rate have been accepted; bills for 33,477 rupees and transfers for 4½ lakhs tendered at about the market rate have been refused owing to the smallness of the offers; and bills for 10 lakhs and transfers for 10 lakhs tendered below the market rate have been refused. Indian exchange has fallen to 14 13-16d. per rupee; but I cannot undertake to specify the cause or causes by which this effect has been produced.

THE CASE OF GENERAL NOBLE, R.A.

COLONEL NOLAN: I beg to ask the Secretary of State for War if he is aware that General Noble, R.A., who died lately from a sickness contracted on active service in India while Superintendent of the Powder Factories, leaves a widow and a large family in not too affluent circumstances; if he is aware that General Noble was the inventor of two brown powders, S.B.C. and E.X.E., and also the patentee of E.X.E., the patent of which now belongs to his widow; if, in consideration of the large amount of powder, 12,000,000 lbs., made on General Noble's plan, the War Office strongly recommended that his widow should receive an increased pension of £200 a year, and if the Treasury has refused this increase; and if the War Office will again recommend that either this pension should be awarded or else that a royalty of 1d. a pound should be paid on E.X.E. powder, patent 16,575, 1886, to General Noble's family?

*MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: The Ordnance Council recommended that Mrs. Noble's pension should be increased by £200 a year. This recommendation was based, not upon the value of any patents, nor on the amount of powder produced, but on the excellent service Major General Noble had rendered in introducing improvements in gunpowder and its manufacture, and generally on his work as Superintendent of the Royal Gunpowder Factory. The granting of such pensions rests entirely with the Treasury, and that Department was not satisfied that any special pension was justified in this case.

MILITARY DRILL IN THE EXTREME HEAT.

X MR. PIERPOINT (Warrington): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for War whether he is aware that Major General Utterson's brigade was marched on the 16th nearly 14 miles up to 10.30 a.m.; that the men were allowed to march without their tunics; that the ambulance was full, and that several men were hanging on behind; that the thermometer stood at 83 degrees or thereabouts; that there were several cases of sunstroke at Lydd Camp; whether he will inquire who is responsible for marching the men during the extreme heat; whether he will give instructions that no marching shall take place during the present weather except in the early morning and in the evening; and what number of men of the Regular Army are now or have been in hospital or on the sick list from sunstroke or other illness caused by the extreme heat since Sunday, 6th August?

MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: This question only appeared on the Paper this morning. I have called for a Report as to the alleged occurrences at Aldershot and Lydd, which I shall probably have on Monday. The last question refers apparently to the whole United Kingdom; and if the hon. Gentleman wishes to have the information, a considerable time must be allowed for obtaining it. As to the suggestion that I should issue general instructions, I must repeat what I said yesterday. I have perfect confidence that General Officers commanding will adapt their orders to the local circumstances, including in those circumstances the important element of temperature.

MR. MAC NEILL (Donegal, S.): In this Indian heat should not the troops be supplied with tropical helmets when drilling?

MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: These are matters for the Military Authorities to deal with, and should be left to the General in immediate command.

THE LOSS OF THE "VICTORIA."

COMMANDER BETHELL (York, E.R., Holderness): I beg to ask the Secretary to the Admiralty if it is intended to hold a special inquiry to find out why the Victoria capsized after being rammed?

SIR U. KAY-SHUTTLEWORTH: As I stated on the 10th instant, the Minutes of the Court Martial on the loss of the Victoria are being printed with a view to their full consideration by the Board of Admiralty. Meanwhile, answers to questions of this character must necessarily be deferred.

COMMANDER BETHELL: My question had nothing whatever to do with the Court Martial. I only asked whether a scientific inquiry could be instituted to find out why the Victoria capsized after being rammed?

SIR U. KAY-SHUTTLEWORTH: I think it has a great deal to do with it. Very full questions were asked by direction of the Admiralty at the Court Martial, and very full evidence was obtained as to the parts of the Victoria which were flooded. Until that evidence has been thoroughly investigated by the Admiralty, it is impossible, on behalf of the Admiralty, to answer whether a special inquiry is or is not necessary.

DR. MACGREGOR: Can the right hon. Gentleman say whether the second officer in command may exercise discretionary power to prevent such accidents?

*SIR U. KAY-SHUTTLEWORTH: I am afraid I can only repeat the answer I gave to my hon. Friend on a previous occasion.

THE TERRACE.

COLONEL NOLAN (Galway, N.): I beg to ask the First Commissioner of Works if a bench on the Terrace is labelled House of Lords; and, if this is an innovation, why other benches are not labelled House of Commons?

THE FIRST COMMISSIONER OF WORKS (Mr. SHAW LEFEVRE, Bradford, Central) was understood to reply that this was a very small matter. The bench in question was obtained from the House of Lords, and the label on it had not been removed. It had no signification.

HEREFORD ELECTION.

MR. RADCLIFFE COOKE (Hereford): I beg to ask the Postmaster General on what ground a private telegram was despatched at the public cost by the Under Secretary of State for the Home Department during the recent election at Hereford, to the hon. Member for Hereford, instead of at the cost of the person by whom it was sent; and what is the Rule governing the despatch by Ministers and others of official telegrams on private business?

*MR. A. MORLEY: The practice is for a responsible official to afterwards examine all telegrams sent us on the service of the Government; and if it appears that any of them are of a private nature, the senders are called upon to pay for them. I know nothing officially of the telegram to which the hon. Member refers, but it will come under review at the proper time, and be dealt with in the manner I have described.

*THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE HOME DEPARTMENT (Mr. H. GLADSTONE, Leeds, W.): Perhaps I may be allowed to say that I sent the telegram in question on the evening of Saturday last. I sent it with the full knowledge of the strict review under which all messages sent on Government forms have to pass at the Post Office. The hon. Member seems to me somewhat ungrateful, because distinctly one of the reasons which operated in my mind in sending that message on a Government form was to insure that he should get it that night. The hour was late, and if I had sent it on an ordinary form the hon. Member would probably have received it only on Sunday; and, as everybody knows, he was very anxious to get my reply. Perhaps, as a balm to his lacerated feelings, I may inform him that, in consequence of not having been in the House of Commons on the day his telegram was sent, I had to pay to my right hon. Friend the Postmaster General on it the sum of about 2s.

MR. RADCLIFFE COOKE: Arising out of that answer I may say I am very sorry the hon. Member was put to any expense. I shall be happy to repay him.

PLEURO-PNEUMONIA IN SCOTLAND.

MR. W. WHITELOW (Perth): I beg to ask the President of the Board of Agriculture whether, in view of the fact that pleuro-pneumonia has been introduced into Scotland by an Irish cow, he intends to put any restrictions on the movement of cattle from Ireland into Great Britain?

MR. W. FIELD: Has there been an outbreak in Ireland since September, 1892, as to which I sent a copy of an official letter to the hon. Member who puts the question. It is very unfair to the cattle.

MR. H. GARDNER: As to the question on the Paper, there is no evidence that the animal in question contracted pleuro-pneumonia before leaving Ireland, and the morbid appearances of the lungs were, in fact, quite compatible with infection after her arrival in Scotland. With regard to the prohibition of movement from one part of the United Kingdom to another, I can only say that I should resort to such a step with the greatest reluctance and in the presence only of the most serious danger; but I may observe that if the policy suggested by the hon. Member were adopted at the present time, it would be movement from Scotland to England, and vice versa, rather than movement from Ireland to Great Britain, which would have to be prohibited.

IRISH PRESBYTERIANS AND HOME RULE.

SIR T. LEA (Londonderry, S.): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury if the Address recently sent to him by Irish Presbyterians recorded their convictions that an urgent necessity exists for an immediate revision of judicial rents; and whether the Government will at once introduce a Bill to carry this into effect?

THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY (Mr. W. E. GLADSTONE, Edinburgh, Midlothian): It is quite correct to hold that this, along with other very important demands on the part of that portion of the Irish Presbyterian community who did me the honour of addressing me in respect to the Land Laws, was made known to me, but I cannot separate these demands one from the other. It is not possible for the Government to introduce such a Bill, certainly not at the present time.

MR. T. M. HEALY (Louth, N.): May I ask the right hon. Gentleman whether he is aware that a Bill dealing with the revision of judicial rents has been brought in and moved constantly from the Conservative side by the hon. Member for North Fermanagh, and has been blocked with equal regularity by the Conservative Member for South Antrim?

MR. PINKERTON (Galway): May I ask the right hon. Gentleman to repeat the other points of interest in the letter?

MR. W. E. GLADSTONE: It is unjust of the hon. Member to ask me to repeat by heart a portion of the Presbyterian letter, especially as no notice has been given to me that I should at least commit it to memory. The hon. Member is most welcome to see the letter.

MR. PINKERTON: Am I right in saying that the letter expressed sympathy with the general policy of the Government with regard to Home Rule?

MR. W. E. GLADSTONE: Unquestionably; that was his main object.

MR. ROSS (Londonderry): Will the right hon. Gentleman afford an opportunity of investigating the names of the alleged Presbyterians, inasmuch as we believe—[Cries of "Order!"]

MR. W. E. GLADSTONE: When I have received letters from professional persons and others expressing their friendliness to Home Rule, they have contained an express reservation that their names shall not be divulged on account of the injury to their professional prospects they would have to undergo from even the suspicion of their being associated with friendliness to Home Rule. I do not recollect whether there is any such limitation in the present instance. If I find that there is not such a limitation, the hon. Member is perfectly at liberty, so far as I am concerned, to see the names.

MR. DEPUTY SPEAKER: Order, order! Any further questions in regard to this matter ought not to be asked without notice.

THE HOME RULE BILL AND THE ADJOURNMENT FOR THE RECESS.

MR. DALZIEL (Kirkcaldy, &c.): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether he can state, for the general convenience of Members, when the Government calculate that the House will be able to adjourn for the Recess; and what steps, if any, are proposed to be taken in order to secure that a reasonable time shall be allowed to elapse between the period of adjournment and the re-assembling in the Autumn?

MR. W. E. GLADSTONE: I am very sensible that it would be very much for the convenience of the House, and the Government are as anxious as anybody can be for the arrival of that happy period when the House can adjourn; but my hon. Friend will see that the Government are under certain specific obligations with regard to Home Rule and Supply, and, therefore, our contribution to the Business of the House is known and fixed. The thing that is not yet accurately known and fixed is the amount of impediment which we shall have to encounter in the shape of Amendments and collateral discussions. With regard to that impediment and that contribution to the length of the Sitting of the House, it is obvious that gentlemen on the Opposition Benches and the gentlemen on the Benches behind my hon. Friend would be able to give a good deal more information than I can.

MR. HANBURY: May I ask the right hon. Gentleman by what right he describes as an impediment to the Business of the House the ordinary discussion of the Estimates which has been so much curtailed this Session?

MR. W. E. GLADSTONE: The hon. Member has entirely misapprehended the language I used. I never spoke of the discussion on the Estimates as an impediment to the Business of the House. I spoke of it as an impediment to the Adjournment of the House.

MR. DALZIEL: I beg to direct the attention of the right hon. Gentleman to the latter portion of my question?

MR. W. E. GLADSTONE: I am very much afraid I must return to him also what will be regarded as an unsatisfactory reply in regard to this portion of the question, which I thought was really involved in the former portion. My hon. Friend asks me

"What steps are proposed to be taken in order to secure that a reasonable time shall be allowed to elapse between the period of adjournment and the re-assembling in the Autumn?"

I do not see what answer that admits of beyond the fact that we are very desirous, first of all, that the Adjournment should arrive within reasonable time; and, secondly, that it should be found in our power to allow a reasonable vacation before asking the House to resume those labours which have in the present year reached such an extraordinary extension.

MR. HANBURY: If the discussion of Supply is to be an impediment to the Adjournment of the House, I wish to ask whether the right hon. Gentleman will consent to put Supply down for the Autumn Session?

MR. W. E. GLADSTONE: No.

MR. DALZIEL: Arising out of the answer to my question, I desire to ask the Prime Minister whether his attention has been directed to an important article upon Parliamentary procedure, with special reference to the possibility of what is termed obstruction in Supply, in which the following proposal is put forward:—

"If the House insists on its ancient Constitutional right to deal with Supply in Committee as a whole, then the only remedy (for the possible obstruction) appears to be for the House to fix beforehand, on entering on the consideration of Supply, the number of days which shall be given to each Class of the Estimates, and to order the Committee to report each Class at the expiry of the time named. The same action must be taken on the Report stage, if necessary——"

Mr. TOMLINSON (Preston): I rise to a point of Order. I wish to ask whether this question arises out of the question which the hon. Member put on the Paper?

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: The hon. Member can put his question. I see nothing out of Order in it. The Prime Minister can answer it, or ask for notice, just as he pleases.

Mr. GIBSON BOWLES: On a point of Order, Sir, is the hon. Member justified, under the guise of asking a question, in reading a long newspaper article?

Mr. DALZIEL: I may be allowed to say, in explanation, that it is only fair to the writer that I should read the whole passage. It is a very short one——

"The same action must be taken on the Report stage, if necessary, and the Opposition would have to arrange among themselves those questions of policy and detail which they might desire to raise in each section, in order to concentrate their energies on those, instead of frittering time away."

Mr. HANBURY: I rise to Order. I wish to ask you whether it has not been constantly ruled by the Chair that quotations of this kind shall not be put down in questions, and whether that Rule does not apply in the present case?

Mr. DALZIEL: The quotation is finished.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: I was going to call the attention of the hon. Member to the fact that I think he is now decidedly exceeding the limits.

Mr. DALZIEL: I will simply put my question, whether, in view of the fact that the writer of the article is the right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Birmingham, the Government will be prepared, in the event of the necessity arising, to give the suggestion that consideration which its importance seems to deserve?

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: It seems to me that this is a question of which notice ought to be given.

Mr. Dalziel

Mr. J. CHAMBERLAIN (Birmingham, W.): I think the question of the hon. Member shows the inconvenience of not putting questions of this kind on the Paper.

Mr. DALZIEL: I rise to Order, Sir.

Mr. J. CHAMBERLAIN: I claim, as a matter of personal explanation, to say that the article from which the hon. Gentleman has just quoted did not suggest that the House should deal with this matter, but that a Committee—a non-Party Committee—should be appointed, which might consider this and kindred subjects.

Mr. W. E. GLADSTONE: I do not think any advantage would arise from my making any comment on the subject.

THE CLOSURE RESOLUTION.

Dr. MACGREGOR: I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether he will take any measures within the power of the Government to bring to an end the Report stage of the Government of Ireland Bill, and so reduce the interval when the House might adjourn for a much required holiday?

Mr. W. E. GLADSTONE: I am glad to answer this question, because it gives me an opportunity of answering it in the form of a notice to this effect—that on Monday I propose to submit to the House a Resolution which, if adopted, will have the effect of securing the close of the proceedings upon the Report stage of the Irish Government Bill on Friday next, August 25. The terms of the Resolution will, I hope, be deposited on the Table within an hour or two.

Mr. J. CHAMBERLAIN (Birmingham, W.): I beg to give notice that when my right hon. Friend proposes that Resolution I shall move the following Amendment:—"That the proposal of the Government to curtail——"

Mr. MANFIELD (Northampton): I rise to a point of Order. [The rest of the hon. Member's remarks were drowned in cries of "Order!"]

Mr. J. CHAMBERLAIN: My Amendment will be——

"That the proposal of the Government to curtail Debate on the Irish Government Bill is calculated to degrade the House of Commons to the position of a voting machine, and to deprive the British majority in this House of its Constitutional right to discuss a policy by which British interests will be seriously and injuriously affected; that this House, recognising no necessity for the course proposed by the Government, and believing that it is dictated by motives of Party expediency, calls upon the Government to withdraw their Resolution and to advise Her Majesty——"

MR. MAC NEILL (Donegal, S.): To send for you.

"To dissolve Parliament at the earliest opportunity in order that the opinion of the electors of the United Kingdom may be taken on the merits of the Bill for the Better Government of Ireland, all the details of which were studiously concealed from them at the last General Election."

MR. A. J. BALFOUR (Manchester, E.): The right hon. Gentleman the Prime Minister, in the notice which he has just given, has, no doubt, informed us of the vital and essential particulars of the Resolution he intends to bring before us—namely, that we are not to be allowed to discuss the remaining 36 clauses of the Bill; but it would be a great convenience to the House if he would tell us the mode in which that Resolution is to be drawn. I do not mean the exact words, but I presume the Government have decided on the general principle on which they intend to act.

MR. T. M. HEALY (Louth, N.): Might I ask the right hon. Gentleman if he could tell the House who is the Leader of the Opposition?

*MR. T. W. RUSSELL (Tyrone, S.): When some evenings ago the Prime Minister promised to insert some Amendments in the 29th clause, it was pointed out that it would be necessary to re-commit the Bill for the purpose. I beg to ask the right hon. Gentleman whether any arrangement will be made for carrying out the pledge of the Government in this matter? While the right hon. Gentleman is about it, will he also tell us who is the Leader of the House?

MR. W. E. GLADSTONE: I am sure I shall not be expected to answer that question in view of the terms with which it concluded. As to the question of the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. A. J. Balfour), he has had a good deal of experience himself in drawing Resolutions of this nature. The Resolution will provide that at a certain hour on Friday the matter shall be brought to an issue. It will be the same measure as has been adopted on former occasions.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: No compartments?

MR. W. E. GLADSTONE: There are no compartments. The House sees that the right hon. Gentleman is well up in the matter of procedure.

MR. BARTLEY (Islington, N.) asked whether the Third Reading of the Bill was to be taken on Friday night?

MR. W. E. GLADSTONE: I suppose the hon. Member means to ask whether the Resolution includes a specification of the day for the closing of the Debate on the Third Reading of the Bill. It does not include that.

THE CASE OF JAMES THOMPSON.

MR. ROSS (Londonderry): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland if his attention has been called to the case of James Thompson, who retired on 22nd May, 1893, from the Royal Irish Constabulary on a pension of £33 13s. 11d.; is he aware that Thompson entered the old Londonderry Police Force on 7th February, 1863, and, on its discontinuance, entered the Royal Irish Constabulary on 1st November, 1870, and, having regard to the 5th section of the 46 & 47 Vic., c. 14, whether the period of approved service in the old Londonderry Police Force ought to be taken into account for the purpose of reckoning the amount of pension payable on retirement; and why this has not been done in the case of James Thompson?

MR. J. MORLEY: The facts relating to the case of ex-Constable Thompson are correctly stated in the question, except that it was in the year 1864, and not in 1863, that he joined the old Londonderry Police Force. His case was carefully considered, both by the Government and by the Law Officers, previous to his discharge, and it was decided that there was no legal basis for allowing service in the Londonderry Force to count towards his pension.

SUMMER ATTIRE FOR THE POLICE.

MR. E. H. BAYLEY (Camberwell, N.): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether he will consider the propriety of supplying the police with lighter uniforms during the summer months?

MR. ASQUITH: This question has frequently been under consideration, and, in the opinion of the Commissioners, after consultation with the chief surgeon of the police, having regard to the variable nature of the Metropolitan climate and to all the conditions of the case, it would not be advisable to provide the Metropolitan Police with lighter attire during the summer months.

ORDERS OF THE DAY.

GOVERNMENT OF IRELAND BILL.

(No. 428.)

CONSIDERATION. [TENTH NIGHT.]

Bill, as amended, further considered.

*MR. H. HOBHOUSE (Somerset, E.) moved in Clause 4, page 2, line 37, after "law," to insert the following subsection:—

"(1) Giving any undue preference to any trade or industry (including agriculture), in Ireland so as prejudicially to affect any such trade or industry in Great Britain, or."

He said he should not have moved this Amendment had he been satisfied with the terms of the Amendment which the Chief Secretary for Ireland (Mr. J. Morley) had placed on the Paper. The intention of his (Mr. Hobhouse's) Amendment was to protect British trade and British agriculture against the somewhat probable danger that would be incurred under the altered relations of the two countries in the event of the Bill passing into law. He believed that one of the first acts of the Irish Parliament would be to foster the native industries of Ireland, and to erect other industries which had not hitherto been able to take root in their country. He should be very sorry indeed to say that such an object was not most laudable in itself; but he thought that those on the British side of the Channel had a right to see that the methods adopted in forwarding that legitimate object were legitimate themselves, and were not likely to prejudicially affect their own trade and agriculture. It had often been said from the Treasury Bench during these Debates that the Government saw great advantage in securing uniformity in all trade matters; but, so far, he did not think they had quite carried out their own expressed intentions. By the Bill of 1886 the whole field of trade was excluded from the purview of the Irish Legislature; but the same could not be said of the present Bill. The First Lord of the Treasury had stated his opinion that all bounties would be illegal; but he had had to admit that there were other means besides bounties by which industries might be fostered with Government money. It had been pointed out that under the Purchase of Land Bill there were certain provisions of the most beneficial character for fostering and forwarding Irish industries by means of premiums. The fact that such an Act was passed by the Imperial Parliament, which contained plenty of British Members who were ready, as a rule, to protect the interests of British trade and agriculture, was surely no argument against placing some limitations upon the future Irish Parliament in such matters, with the object of protecting the interests of Great Britain. The benefit of the provisions he spoke of was strictly confined to those parts of Ireland which had suffered in the past, and were likely to suffer in the future, from the evils of famine and distress. Parliament had readily agreed to them in these exceptional cases; but whether it would have been prepared to devote large sums of money to the fostering of interests in other parts of the United Kingdom not so situated was a very different matter. Turning to the danger apprehended, it might easily happen that the Irish Legislature, wishing to encourage the production of butter of the first quality, which found a ready sale in the English markets, might consider themselves prohibited by the terms of the Bill from giving actual bounties, but might offer premiums of a very substantial kind for every hundred-weight of first-class butter produced in Irish dairies. He could not conceive that such a course would be contrary to any provision of this Bill as it stood. Such premiums would not be directly given with a view to promoting exportation, and yet the result to British producers of butter would be exactly the same as if they were actual bounties given for exportation. When any part of the United Kingdom exceeded certain limits in fostering a particular industry, and thereby inflicted an injury on another part of the Kingdom, Parliament ought certainly to prohibit such action. The Irish Parliament might also erect new artificial industries which might be fostered for a time on such a scale as to seriously diminish the profits of British manufacturers, who at present had in many cases a hard struggle to make both ends meet, and who would certainly think themselves seriously injured if, in addition to bearing the competition of foreign markets, they had to meet a competition produced by artificial industries in Ireland. The clause proposed by the Chief Secretary did not appear to him to really deal with the matters he had mentioned. It was intended to protect individuals only, not trades or industries collectively. He had spoken hitherto only of direct means by which industries might be fostered, but he should like to give one example of a very obvious indirect way of helping them. The Irish Legislature might come to terms with the Irish Railway Companies by giving them subsidies, and imposing certain conditions as to special rates which might place industries in particular districts at a certain advantage. It had been alleged in Committee that the Irish Exchequer would have no money to spend on fostering industries. But under the new financial scheme that Exchequer was to have a clear surplus of £500,000 to start with, and therefore the Irish Executive would certainly have the means of carrying out any object of this kind which their Party might have at heart. The least the Government could do when it provided the Irish Legislature with a surplus of this description at the expense of the British taxpayer was to see that no class of the British taxpayer was directly or indirectly prejudiced or damaged by the application of that surplus. No doubt the Attorney General (Sir C. Russell), if he spoke, would ask who was to determine what "undue preference" was? His answer would be the same great tribunal as had been set up by the Government to determine such questions as "due process of law," and the nature of "just compensation." Those were expressions new to the English law, whereas the phrase "undue preference" had been undergoing interpretation by important tribunals in England for the last 40 years. If any Member would take the trouble to look at the decisions of the Railway Commissioners, he would see that many of them, particularly those which dealt with special classes of merchandise and special trades in particular districts, had a very direct and clear bearing on such questions as he now proposed for the determination of a still more august tribunal. He was sorry that he had detained the House so long, and he would conclude by asking the Government to consider whether some modification in this direction was not required? They did not fear legitimate competition; but experiments might be tried which would not be legitimate, and, therefore, in the interest of uniformity, and to prevent any trade or industry in any particular locality being prejudiced, he begged to move the Amendment.

Amendment proposed,

In page 2, line 37, after the word "law," to insert, as a new sub-section, the words—" (1) Giving any undue preference to any trade or industry (including agriculture), in Ireland so as prejudicially to affect any such trade or industry in Great Britain, &c."—(Mr. H. Hobhouse.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

THE CHIEF SECRETARY FOR IRELAND (Mr. J. MORLEY, Newcastle-upon-Tyne): I am not sure that the hon. Member has noticed the provision made in the Amendment to the clause which stands in my name. The Government believe that this Amendment covers the whole of the ground so far as the argument as to "undue preference" is concerned. We submit that the word "undue" is not capable, in this connection, of anything like an accurate interpretation. The hon. and learned Member has referred to decisions under the Railway and Canal Acts; but he has evidently forgotten that the cases decided under those Acts were cases in which the words were capable of a definite interpretation—cases in which it was possible to discriminate between individuals and great firms or companies. Those cases did not deal with these large questions of International preference, and I believe, and I am advised, that they could not be relied on in such cases as this. How are we to deal with such large questions—how are we to show, in the case of a particular Irish industry, what is undue preference as regards British trade? We cannot deal with such a question of International discrimination.

MR. H. HOBHOUSE: I have endeavoured to cover that.

MR. J. MORLEY: We cannot proceed to discriminate, because we cannot define the limit between the individual and a particular trade in a particular locality and a similar trade elsewhere. The Acts on railways and canals were passed to meet special cases. I would remind my hon. and learned Friend that grants have already been made in various districts in Ireland. The Congested Districts Board, for instance, has made a grant in favour of a shawl-spinning industry in the County of Galway. I cannot conceive that any premium which the Irish Legislature is likely to give from the same motives as those which animated this House in 1891 is at all likely to make any appreciable effect on British industries. There is no difference between the hon. Member and the Government, I think, as to the necessity of protecting British trade. But he referred to the butter industry. He spoke of the probability of the Irish Legislature putting a premium upon the production of certain superior qualities of butter. Yes; but how would that affect the corresponding trade in England? The Irish Legislature is assumed to do this on the possible ground that there would be a margin for exportation. If the hon. Member had mastered the details of the butter trade he would not have spoken as he did. I do not think it necessary to say much more. I have referred to the Act of 1891. There is another Act, that of 1888, under the provisions of which £5,000 a year was given to the Dublin Society to improve the breed of horses in Ireland. Is the House going to say to the Irish Legislature that they are not to do that which this House has sanctioned?

MR. H. HOBHOUSE: It is a question of degree.

MR. J. MORLEY: I submit with confidence that the Amendment which I have put upon the Paper covers practically all the ground of the present Amendment, and is more comprehensive in its terms. I, therefore, trust that my hon. and learned Friend will be content to leave the subject he has now raised to be dealt with by my Amendment.

MR. J. CHAMBERLAIN (Birmingham, W.): I fully recognise the evident intention of the Government to do all they have promised in this matter, and I admit the great difficulty of that which they have undertaken. I would remind the House how the question really stands. We were dealing with a question of this character on one of the sub-sections of this clause. When that discussion was going on—a discussion on the subject of religious preference—I ventured to say that it was not a question of dealing with this question alone, but that there might be preference from political feeling—a class of preference much more common than religious preference. Thereupon the Prime Minister made a speech in which I may say that generally he agreed with me, and stated the propriety of dealing with preference as a whole, and not by separate attempts. He stated that indirect preference was a subject as worthy of consideration as direct preference, and we were promised that the matter should be considered before Report. I do not think my right hon. Friend used the word “undue.” I did use it in my speech, and I think he accepted it. The Amendment of my hon. Friend proposes to provide against undue preference. That was the question we were discussing when we got my right hon. Friend’s promise on behalf of the Government. I want now to show that there are two points in which the Amendment of my right hon. Friend does not go far enough. I would suggest that he should alter it by adding at the beginning “directly or indirectly.” That would carry out the Prime Minister’s promise on the subject. My right hon. Friend has now limited the prohibited preferences by the words “parentage, birth, or place in which the business is carried on.” Therefore an aggrieved person will always have to show to the Court that the preference of which he complains is a preference which has been given on account of his birth, parentage, or the place in which he carries on his business. I think it is probable those limiting words would exclude almost every case which is likely to arise. In the first place, it will be very difficult to prove the complaint. Take the case of butter or the woollen trade, which the Irish Government might desire to foster. The Prime Minister has made a sound economic argument which commends itself to Free Traders, and which goes to show that such bounties injure the people who give them. But is he certain the Leaders of the Irish Legislature would be sound economists after the school of Cobden? It must be recollected in regard to this that leading Members of the Irish Party have expressed their own convictions that, at any rate, Free Trade is not good where you desire to create an industry. The question whether the action of the Irish Legislature would be economically sound or not does not concern us in the least—we are not bound to protect the Irish people against these economic heresies; but if those heresies injure the English people we are bound to protect our own people, and provide that they do not injure them. My right hon. Friend will admit that, although Protection may injure, for example, the French people really more than it injures us, still it does not injure us by preventing trade which otherwise we might be able to do with France. In the same way, premiums or bounties on butter or woollen goods would, if they were sufficient in extent and continued over a sufficient length of time, enable those industries to compete successfully with similar industries in this country. My right hon. Friend the Chief Secretary spoke as if he were really cognisant of everything connected with the butter trade. Well, if a premium were put on to enable the Irish to compete with other countries in butter-making, it would be impossible to say that such a premium would be given on account of the parentage of the butter-maker, and it would not be given on account of the place in which the manufacture was carried on, because it would be given to Cork and Belfast and Waterford, and any other place in which butter was made. There are a great number of other cases, but I will only suggest one or two of them. There is the case of Poor Law relief. Suppose exceptional Poor Law relief were granted to particular classes of persons—that would not be on account of the parentage or the place in which they lived, yet undoubtedly it would be held to be a case of undue preference unless the regulations were applicable to all persons in a position to demand Poor Law relief. Yet it is perfectly certain a proposition of that kind will not be touched. Then we come to the case of preferences affecting railways. That would not be on account of the parentage of the directors, nor on account of the place in which the railway is carried on; but, at the same time, regulations affecting rates upon a particular line of railway might have a most injurious effect on one port as against another port which it was desired to favour. Again, there is the case of the fisheries. I do not think the proposal of the Government would cover that. There is competition between the trawlers and the linesmen. Hon. Members opposite (the Irish Members) are all in favour of the linesmen as against the trawlers, and the probability is they would carry out legislation which would have the effect of destroying the trawling trade for the advantage of the men who practise line fishing. That is a fair case for the Court to say whether it is an undue preference, but it could not be raised under the Amendment of the Chief Secretary. Why would it not be possible to levy dues on ships of a certain burden? The effect of that would be to keep out of port all boats above a certain size, thereby affecting particular industries to the disadvantage of others. That, again, would have nothing to do with the place of business or the place of birth. Preferences might be given between Corporations or Institutions. I can understand that it would be perfectly easy to lay down conditions for the receipt of contributions in aid of hospitals, which would enable certain hospitals to receive and prevent other hospitals from obtaining any advantage; and although there might be a hidden motive for such a preference which would bring them within the scope of the prohibitions, that hidden motive would not be declared. I have said enough to show that the Amendment of my right hon. Friend, although I fully believe it is intended to go as far as the pledge of the Prime Minister, will not actually cover all the cases which the Prime Minister himself must have had in view. We are not dealing with the preference which arises, as the Chief Secretary suggests, under the Congested Districts Board, or with any other case of that kind. Nor do I think any Court in the world would hold that such consideration as has been shown for small and struggling industries, such as the shawl industry, to which my right hon. Friend has referred, was undue preference. My right hon. Friend says it is a difficult point to decide. But will it not be difficult to decide within the scope of his own Amendment? I understood him to say that, while it is perfectly possible for the Courts to decide upon what is undue preference in regard to rates, it would be difficult for it to deal with the matter generally. He will admit, I think, that some of these cases of rates that have been before the Court have been very difficult to decide. Every case has had to be decided on its merits. I confess that, if those questions could be decided, I do not think there should be any greater difficulty in deciding in these other cases. The difference, for instance, between North Wales and South Wales would not be difficult to decide in a matter of the kind. I admit that the Government have a difficult task before them; but, seeing that the clause clearly does not go as far as the promise which we understood was made by the Prime Minister, I hope the Government will consider whether they cannot accept the Amendment, or, at all events, whether they cannot carry their own clause further.

MR. SEXTON (Kerry, N.): The right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Birmingham is certainly very exact; and having now, I suppose, come to the conclusion that even his ingenuity will be unable to prevent the granting of Home Rule to Ireland, he is naturally very anxious to secure the adoption of provisions by which the Irish Parliament will be paralysed in the attempt to render any effective service to the material interests of Ireland. The right hon. Gentleman has referred to an Amendment by which the Chief Secretary for Ireland proposes to satisfy the demand in the present Amendment, and nothing will satisfy the right hon. Gentleman except that it shall be forbidden that the Irish Parliament shall directly or indirectly impose such disabilities and confer such advantages as are referred to in the Amendment. If such words were inserted as "directly or indirectly," I imagine that the Irish Legislature, in approaching the consideration of any Bill which proposed to deal with the material concerns of the Irish people and with the improvement of their condition, would be in extreme doubt whether it was competent for them to consider any such Bill; and, in fact, the effect of the insertion of the words would be to paralyse the Irish Legislature by inducing a doubt as to any Bill concerning the material interests of the country—a doubt as to whether they could proceed with it or not. If you will apply yourselves to a provision of this kind, the least which we may expect is that you will say plainly what you mean. Instruct the Irish Legislature what they are not to do, and they will, no doubt, obey you; but do not deliberately use words which would leave the Irish Legislature in doubt as to the powers which you intend them to exercise. The right hon. Gentleman has suggested that the words "on account of" are not apt. It is proposed to be forbidden to the Irish Legislature to impose disabilities or confer advantages on any subject, "on account of parentage or place of birth." I should imagine that that would be an effectual provision, as between Englishmen or Irishmen, with regard to any action of the Irish Legislature which could be alleged to be due to prejudice and nationality, or preference for the people of their own country. These words are objectionable to the right hon. Gentleman, because they afford a judicial basis—because they refer to facts which, if they were proved, would fairly entitle the tribunal to condemn or annul the action of the Irish Legislature. What words would the right hon. Gentleman substitute? He has not stated what words he would substitute. I presume he would prefer some terms which would leave the matter in doubt, and which would render, it possible, for the Judicial Tribunal to attack the Irish Legislature upon grounds of prejudice and presumption. If the reason for voiding the Act is not to be plainly referred to, the Irish Legislature would have no certainty in regard to its duties. We require plain words, which would leave your meaning beyond all doubt, in order to let the Irish Legislature act with confidence in any material concern whatever. There is a phrase in this Amendment of the Chief Secretary for Ireland to which I would wish to direct the attention of the Attorney General, and I hope for some statement at the proper time on the subject. There is to be no disability nor any advantage conferred upon any individual "by reason of the place where any part of his business is carried on." I had supposed that the words referring to parentage had disposed of the matter as between Irishmen and those who are not Irishmen. Do these words, "or place where any part of his business is carried on," mean the part of Ireland where his business is carried on? There was some suggestion that the Irish Legislature, by reason of the probable predominance of the Nationalist and Celtic element, might legislate or act in a manner prejudicial to the interests of Ulster. I at once admit that the most efficient safeguard against any such result would have my consent. I am desirous that the people of Ulster and the people of the other parts of Ireland, both as to disability and advantage, should be treated with the utmost impartiality by the Irish Legislature. Do these words as to the place mean to differentiate between the people of Ireland and the people of Great Britain? I feel great difficulty in interpreting the phrase "undue preference" when used in this connection. I know what "undue preference" means in the Court of Railway Commissioners. It is plain enough, both in itself and by a long series of judicial decisions, when applied to a Railway Company or a Steamboat Company in regard to their dealings with different traders in different localities. What do you mean by the phrase in the case of the Irish Legislature which legislates for Ireland, and not for Great Britain? If the Legislature legislated both for Ireland and Great Britain, then I could understand the application of the phrase "undue preference;" but the Legislature of Ireland legislates only for Ireland; and when you prohibit the Legislature of Ireland giving any undue preference to the people of Ireland as against the people of Great Britain, I desire to ask what you mean? Why do we want Home Rule for Ireland? In the first place, it is almost a purely agricultural country, and the agricultural industry needs to be developed. The system of agriculture in Ireland is crude in the extreme degree. The fisheries about the coast are decaying, because there are no proper boats or gear for the fishermen. The want of a domestic and sympathetic Government has brought Ireland to the brink of ruin. Why do we want a domestic Government apart from political rights? We want it in order to bring about the material development of the country; and the main function of the Irish Legislature undoubtedly would be to instruct the people, if they had the money, to spend it in a better system of agriculture, in aiding the development of the fisheries, and in generally encouraging the development of Irish industry, so far as their resources may allow. If the Irish Legislature proceeds to improve the condition of the Irish people to enable them to raise better crops, to raise more valuable cattle, to secure a readier market and a better price for their products, is that "undue preference"? If the Irish Legislature helps Irishmen to do what is the main object of Home Rule—that is, to get out of their misery and poverty, to enable them to bring more products into the market, and to command a better price—is that "undue preference" because it may interfere with similar industries in England? If that is your object you had better deny us a Legislature altogether, because it would be worse than useless. It would create a state of feeling the last stage of which would be worse than the first. You would give us an Irish Legislature, and would take away from that Parliament the power to do what is the main function of every Parliament in the world, and that is to improve the material condition of the people of the country. I think the matter of this Amendment is the subject of a great deal of exaggerated solicitude on the part of hon. Gentlemen; and I cannot help commenting upon the mean, jealous, and, I would say, tyrannical and unfair spirit, displayed in Amendments of this kind coming from gentlemen representing the wealthiest country in Europe, with an annual income of £1,300,000,000 sterling, endeavouring to apply these paltry and wretched proposals to the case of the poorest people in Europe—a people steeped in misery—a misery in a great degree the effect of your rule, of your agricultural laws, and of the restrictions by which you jealously prevented us from progressing. There only can be any question of efficient competition between Ireland and you in respect of industries which you have not made your own.

The most that Ireland can do is to eke out the resources of agriculture by the establishment of small industries to which you do not apply yourselves. There can be no real competition there, and when any gentleman rises in this House and suggests that the powerful, wealthy people of England desire to cripple the Legislature of Ireland in the endeavour to advance its people in these by-paths of industry and thrift, in which your great industries are not concerned, he mistakes the sentiments of the people of this country, and is not a true exponent of their minds. I certainly, for my part, desire to be understood as objecting to the insertion of any words in the Bill as will prevent the Irish Legislature from bringing the people out of beggary by instructing them in agriculture and developing the fisheries. I think it against reason that the people of England and Scotland should desire to keep Ireland in beggary in order that there should be no "undue preference." The right hon. Gentleman has referred to my humble opinions upon the subject. He said that I was satisfied with the financial arrangement. I am not satisfied with the financial arrangement; and if the right hon. Gentleman would refer to my speech when the Bill was in Committee he would find that I stated there that not only did I not approve of the financial arrangement in this Bill, but that I stated that when the existing charges of Government have been paid, and the new charges laid upon Ireland by the Bill have been paid, we will have no substantial surplus—perhaps no surplus at all. Irishmen will not pay new taxes for the purpose of developing industries for the benefit of individuals, as there will be no surplus. We cannot raise new taxes, in consequence of the excessive taxes already levied in Ireland. I assure you that the fear of any system—either of bounties or premiums—in Ireland is entirely illusory. It tries our patience in a severe degree to find these Amendments put forward against evils and results of a purely visionary character. I trust that the Irish Secretary will take the first opportunity of informing us whether, in the event of the passage of a Bill by the Irish Legislature to confer some advantage in material concerns upon the people of Ireland, or upon any part of Ireland, to produce better crops or more valuable cattle, or to develop the fisheries—whether the conferring of such an advantage upon the people of Ireland, or any part of them, would be the conferring of such an advantage as is contemplated in this Amendment, or would be held to impose disabilities? We may as well understand the matter now—whether the Irish Legislature will be tied hand and foot, or may apply itself to the material improvement of the people? I would prefer to know the truth now. If it is a welcome truth, so much the better. If it is an unwelcome truth, we had better know it now than hereafter. So far as concerns the Amendment of the hon. and learned Member opposite, I can understand it in no other sense than that anything done by the Irish Legislature which would improve the material condition of the people of Ireland would be held to prejudicially affect the people of Great Britain. Such an Amendment would paralyse the hands of the Irish Legislature in regard to what I consider one of the primary duties of a Legislature.

MR. GOSCHEN (St. George's, Hanover Square): It is fortunate that this very interesting question has turned up rather early in this stage, and not towards the end, because, if this Amendment had stood later on the Paper, in all probability the hon. Member for North Kerry (Mr. Sexton) would not have had the opportunity either of making the very interesting speech we have just listened to, or of extracting from the Government the information which he considers to be extremely important for his purpose. I am very glad the hon. Member for North Kerry has intervened in this Debate, and has put the matter on a footing which we, at all events, can understand. He informed us—and it was a very interesting piece of information—that the real origin of the demand for Home Rule in Ireland was in order to improve the material condition of the country.

MR. SEXTON: I said apart from political light.

MR. GOSCHEN: I did not hear that phrase, but I will not be certain.

MR. SEXTON: If the right hon. Gentleman did not hear it, it was not because I did not say it, but because the right hon. Gentleman did not listen.

MR. GOSCHEN: I apologise for not having heard it, but I can assure the hon. Gentleman that I was listening, I may say, with all my ears, because I considered it a very important speech. However, the question is, what part does the improvement of the material resources of Ireland play in this matter? I understand from the hon. Gentleman that it plays a very considerable part, and that a desire for the improvement of the material condition of Ireland is the origin of the demand for separation from the wealthier country.

MR. SEXTON: Separation!

MR. GOSCHEN: Well, separation of the Governments, so that Ireland may be free to do what it likes with its own resources, instead of receiving any aid from the great resources of the richer country. Now, we understand that the Irish people believe that, from a material point of view, it would be a great advantage to have Home Rule with a Government having a domestic and sympathetic consideration for their interests. I may say that, considering the efforts which the House has made to develop the fish-[Ironical laughter from National Members.]
industries, and other industries, to build schools and other institutions for the teaching of those industries, it is very ungrateful for hon. Members below the Gangway to take up such an attitude. Hon. Members below the Gangway may laugh, but the benefits to Ireland have been immense. It is well to remember that there are two different questions now before us. One is the Amendment of my hon. Friend, and the other is the Amendment of the Chief Secretary. It would, however, be to the convenience of the House if the answer which the Government may have to give in interpretation of their own Amendment should be given when that Amendment is before the House rather than on the present occasion, because there are several matters we desire to be clear about with regard to the language of that Amendment. With regard to the language of the Amendment of my hon. Friend which is now before us, it is clear that the difficulty of interpreting the words "undue preference" has been exaggerated by the Government, and it will be perfectly easy for the hon. Members to interpret them. The Chief Secretary asked us whether we would wish to apply such an Amendment to the work of the Congested Districts Board, and to the grant of £5,000 for horses to the Royal Society of Ireland. I should say certainly not. Such a thing has never been contemplated by any person on this side of the House. It was perfectly unnecessary to make these insinuations. We grudge none of the grants given to assist in these directions the prosperity of Ireland. We have no wish, and it was monstrous for the hon. Member for North Kerry to attempt to put into the mouth of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Birmingham any desire to retard the prosperity of Ireland—

MR. SEXTON: What I considered monstrous was the attempt, by Amendments to this Bill, to prevent the Irish Parliament from doing for Ireland what you have done for yourselves.

MR. GOSCHEN: The hon. Gentleman has no right to say that by Amendments we have attempted to prevent the Irish Legislature from doing that which we have done ourselves. It has not been suggested by the Mover of the Amendment or by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Birmingham; and I say distinctly that there is nothing in the Amendment which would prevent the Irish Legislature from taking such steps as we have taken in the past to develop Irish industries.

MR. SEXTON: Read the Amendment.

MR. GOSCHEN: I have read it. No Court would hold that "undue preference" would exclude grants to the Congested Districts Board, or for the production of a better breed of horses. The same thing is done in England. There is no undue preference in that. Hon. Members below the Gangway wish to force us on this Amendment, as they have tried in many other cases, to accept principles which we repudiate and to put language into our mouths that we have never used. I say again that we have no desire whatever to impede the Irish Legislature in taking any such measures as we have taken in the past. But what does the hon. Member for North Kerry want? It is very right and natural that he should want it. He wants the Irish Legislature to have a freer hand in the development of Irish industries. He considers that it might be the duty of the Government, and would probably be their intention, to develop Irish industries, not only in the direction of establishing better schools for agriculture and fishing, and assisting the Congested Districts Board, but by putting the industries of Ireland on a more advantageous footing than the industries of England and Scotland with the aid of bounties.

MR. SEXTON : The right hon. Gentleman has exactly reversed my argument. I spoke of instruction and practical training ; and as regards bounties, I said it was useless to fear them, as we would not have the money, and the people would not submit to new taxes.

MR. GOSCHEN : We all agree that the Irish people should have instruction. But the whole argument of the hon. Gentleman and his friends was that the development of Irish industries should be raised to a much larger system than now exists, and the Irish Parliament should be free to pass any measure that may be necessary to encourage the Irish people to compete more successfully with other people. That is all perfectly natural. It is one of those difficulties that arises from the subject itself. You give the Irish a separate Government, but you are afraid of your own constituencies, and you will not give them fiscal liberty, and that difficulty will turn up over and over again—will turn up in these Debates and afterwards in practice. Let the Government give the Irish Government power generally to deal with this matter, so that the industries of Ireland may be promoted without regard to the corresponding industries of England. Will they take the line taken by the hon. Member for North Kerry (Mr. Sexton) and say—“England is a rich country ; let us do as we like without fear of competition” ?

MR. SEXTON : I never said so.

MR. GOSCHEN : The hon. Gentleman has not said so ; but his sole argument is that Irish industries should be stimulated, and he distinctly stated that Great Britain is not to be afraid of competition ; that is his general argument, and I think it is not an unnatural one. The whole argument of the hon. Member and his friends is that they know much better how to arrange for the industries of Ireland than the Parliament of Great Britain is ever likely to know ; that they would be able to take those measures with regard to the industries of Ireland, which could not be taken by the Imperial Parliament. That is the creed of hon. Members below the Gangway. But, I say, let us be clear on this point—Will the Government go further in that direction, and say they think they should give more latitude to the Irish Government with regard to finance ? That seems to be the logical result of the steps they have taken, and it is useful to my hon. and learned Friend to extract from Irishmen some light on the question. I myself think, as has been said by the hon. Gentleman, that if the farmers of Great Britain knew that by fiscal means of one kind or another the whole of the butter industry or the whole of the cattle industry was to be favoured in Ireland, they would strongly object to it, and object to it on the same lines as the Prime Minister objects to the separation of the trade between Ireland and Great Britain. I ask the hon. Member for North Kerry (Mr. Sexton) to let us know precisely where we are, and how far the Government are prepared to give a free hand, or at what point they are prepared to say the Irish Government shall not be allowed to assist and endow Irish industry in competition with a corresponding industry in this country ?

MR. JEFFREYS (Hants, Basingstoke) desired to say a few words in support of the Amendment of his right hon. Friend, which he thought was intended to prevent the proposed Irish Parliament giving premiums or bounties to the agricultural industry of Ireland. The hon. Member for North Kerry (Mr. Sexton) said he desired not to be left in doubt on this point. He (Mr. Jeffreys) thought the Amendment was a most intelligent one, as it put clearly before them the dangers to which they were exposed in all the agricultural counties in England. If the proposed Irish Parliament were to be allowed to give premiums, or rather to give bounties upon agricultural produce in Ireland in future, he was quite certain the agricultural counties of England would not return Members to support the present Government. It had been said by the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary for Ireland that already they had a precedent for this, because they gave the Queen's prizes for horses, but so they did in England; they did it all round, and if they were to have these bounties let them have them all round; if it was to the interest of the country that bounties should be given on butter or other agricultural produce, then it should be done all round; but the taxpayers would be averse to paying anything to give bounties only to the farmers of Ireland. He did not say this in hostility to the Irish farmers, but he would call the attention of the hon. Member for North Kerry (Mr. Sexton) to this fact—that many of the farmers in England and Scotland were in great poverty—that they were quite as poor as any farmer in Ireland. He would also like to remind the House that the Irish farmers already had many advantages over the English farmers: the Irish farmers paid less Income Tax than the English farmers did.

AN HON. MEMBER: So they do in Scotland.

MR. JEFFREYS said, that was so; but the farmers paid less in Ireland than the farmers in England or Scotland. ["No, no!"] Yes, they did. This question was fought out on the Budget, and the Chancellor of the Exchequer was obliged to admit that he (Mr. Jeffreys) was right. But, without going into that, he desired to call attention to what the Chief Secretary said—that he did not think the Irish Parliament would be inclined to give bounties on butter; and if they did it would only be for the production of good butter, in order that the production of butter might be better and cheaper. But he (Mr. Jeffreys) thought that the hon. Member for North Kerry (Mr. Sexton) and his friends would be likely to give these bounties. There was an analogous case in their Colonies. In the Colony of Victoria they gave something like 2d. a pound on every pound of butter that was exported to England. The same bounties might be given in Ireland, and though, possibly, the Irish farmers might benefit, yet at the same time they would be taking the bread out of the farmers' mouths in England, and it would be most unfair for this Parliament to pass any law that would give an undue preference to any portion of the United Kingdom. There was only one other matter to which he wished to draw attention, and it was this—the hon.

Member for North Kerry (Mr. Sexton) said that he, and others with him, would like to improve the material prosperity of the people of Ireland. Of course, and they also would like to improve the position of the population of this country. But how could they if they were to be hampered in this way? Not only were they now undersold and hampered by foreign competition, but if they were to have this further bounty-fed competition at their very doors, it would be the last straw that would break their backs. He did not see how the English farmer would get on at all if the Bill passed with this clause in it as it stood. He thought the English, Scotch, and Welsh Members should support the Amendment not out of hostility to the Irish farmers, but out of friendship with their own agriculturists, and in order that every one might be placed on the same footing, and that if any bounties were given they should be given all round.

*MR. CLANCY (Dublin Co., N.) said, the late Chancellor of the Exchequer (Mr. Goschen) expressed surprise that one of the objects of the Irish Legislature was to improve the material prosperity of Ireland. An affected surprise of that character was not wholly inconsistent with some of the right hon. Gentleman's previous declarations, for he remembered the speech of the right hon. Gentleman in 1886 in which he indulged in a variety of prophecies as to what Irish Members would do when they got Home Rule. The right hon. Gentleman excluded the idea of the Irish Members doing anything sensible at all, for he declared they would repeal the laws with regard to murder and theft, and that they would pass a law to change the whole of the Judicial procedure. He did not understand what a Home Rule Parliament would be for if not to improve the position of the Irish people. Political liberty was, in his opinion, the very highest thing they could aspire to, and he would not give it up even for material prosperity; he would rather be governed by Irishmen and governed badly than be governed by this House and governed well. [Laughter.] Those who laughed at that statement showed a very small and slight appreciation indeed of their position as free men. He would like to know what would be their attitude if the case were reversed. Suppose they were asked to link themselves with France on condition that they were better governed; would they submit to that for a single moment? No, they would prefer their insular liberty, even though it might not be so beneficial to them commercially; therefore, he said that, for his part, he regarded personal liberty as the highest thing they could aspire to, and which they did aspire to, in looking for Home Rule. After that he did not know what a Home Rule Parliament would exist for except to improve the material prosperity of the people; a Parliament ought not to exist if it did not do all it could to improve the material prosperity of the people. The right hon. Gentleman said they were ungrateful for the doles and bounties extended to them by the late Administration. In the first place, it was rather extraordinary to ask them to be grateful for getting their own money; every ld. the late Government gave to Ireland was given out of Irish money, and the right hon. Gentleman asked them to be grateful for it. He would remind the right hon. Gentleman there were Irish Members who, during the existence of the last Parliament, and when these grants were under consideration, warned the Government that, although they would not reject these gifts, and would even ask for more, they would never be grateful for them; and, for his part, he said they would never be grateful for any gifts that were obviously and almost avowedly given them to shut their mouths about the question of political liberty. And if the Tory Government should ever come in again, and should propose further gifts—and he believed they would propose further gifts—he told them they need not expect any gratitude for them; on the contrary, they would receive these gifts; they would ask for more and more of them; they would ask for so many of them that there would not be ld. left of the surplus they got from Ireland, and, after all, they would remain perfectly ungrateful. That, at all events, was a plain declaration, and he hoped it was satisfactory. When he saw Amendment after Amendment put on the Paper, and heard speech after speech in support of them, and found that every Amendment and every speech was calculated to deprive the Irish Parliament of every particle of power it ought to possess for advancing the material prosperity of

Ireland, he could only come to the conclusion that those who put them down meant to do exactly what their Amendments and speeches expressed. ["Hear; hear!"] Yes; and what they expressed was that the Irish Parliament should not have the power to do a single thing to improve the material prosperity of Ireland. Let him call attention to the change of front of the late Chancellor of the Exchequer, who said they did not wish to stop the work of the Congested Districts Board and the encouragement of horse-breeding by the Royal Dublin Society. That was exactly the reverse of what the right hon. Gentleman had said up to the present, because up to now the operations of the Congested Districts Board and the granting of prizes by the Royal Dublin Society had been defended on the ground that Ireland now was under the control of the Imperial Parliament, and that Home Rule was not the law of the land, the inference being that if Home Rule were granted these operations would be against the interests of England, and would not be allowed by England. He had never heard anything so mean as most of these propositions and discussions raised by these Amendments. Let them consider the history of Ireland and the way in which England had treated the industries of Ireland. Two hundred years ago the English people began it when they presented a Petition to King William asking him to suppress the woollen industry of Ireland; and ever since then, all through the last century by one means, and all through the present century by another means, they had extinguished the industries of Ireland; and now that Ireland was going to have the management of her own affairs, Member after Member got up and appealed to the trade jealousies and the worst passions of the English people in order to deprive the Irish Parliament of every particle of power of improving the industry of the country. He never heard anything so mean, and he should despise himself, if an Englishman, to use such means to put down the struggling Sister Island. One would imagine that the condition of the two Islands were reversed; that England was the poor, neglected, penniless country; that Ireland was the great overwhelming and monied country; and that if they did not stretch out their hand in this, that, and the other direction, poor, shivering England would be gobbled up by the great and powerful country that lay to the West of it? It seemed to him, he repeated, that all these speeches and Amendments were the meanest things to be found in political history, and he hoped, before the Debate closed, that for the credit of England some Englishman would get up and denounce them as an Irishman would. It seemed to him that all the fears that were expressed were absolutely without foundation. If they had any common sense at all in Ireland they would desire to stand well with the English people, and therefore would not be likely to adopt means to injure the English people; they would try to benefit their own country, but not to injure England. He repeated the demand that had been made by the Member for North Kerry (Mr. Sexton), and he wanted to know whether such operations as could be done now by the Congested Districts Board, by the Royal Dublin Society, or similar undertakings, would be forbidden by the Amendment of the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary for Ireland? [Mr. J. MORLEY shook his head.] Although the right hon. Gentleman seemed to have replied they would not be forbidden, he (Mr. Clancy) did not feel quite certain in his own mind. The Amendment was in very general, very wide, and very far-reaching terms; and though he did not profess to be a lawyer competent to give an opinion on the subject, he could easily imagine that almost nine out of every ten projects which an Irish Parliament might undertake without the slightest intention of giving any undue preference to their own country, might fall within that Amendment and be forbidden. Therefore, before he could vote for it, he should like to have an explanation of its meaning, and he only regretted that the Debate was not upon the Amendment of the Chief Secretary for Ireland instead of upon this Amendment.

MR. JESSE COLLINGS (Birmingham, Bordesley) thought the speech they had just listened to had very little to do with the Amendment of his hon. Friend behind him. From the speeches of the Prime Minister and hon. Members opposite one would think there was no such place as Great Britain; but though the fact seemed to be ignored, there was such a place as Great Britain, and such people as Englishmen; he gave every credit to the hon. Member for North Kerry (Mr. Sexton) for the speeches he made in regard to the Bill, because when he spoke he made clear what the Government ignored, evaded, or concealed. One great advantage of the gag was that the moment it was applied they were favoured with these valuable speeches from the Irish Benches. He did not complain of them, because they learned more from the speeches of the Irish Members, and particularly from the speeches of the hon. Member for North Kerry (Mr. Sexton), as to the meaning and intentions of the Bill, than they learned from the speeches of Ministers. But there was one matter in which the hon. Member for North Kerry was a little hard upon the Opposition speakers; he said their opposition was couched in a mean and tyrannical spirit. The hon. Member must remember that, though they recognised his right to get every sixpence he possibly could out of the pockets of the British taxpayer, yet, as the Representatives of the British taxpayer composed the large majority of that House, they were altogether opposed to the process the hon. Gentleman would like to see carried out; therefore, while they did not complain of the hon. Member being ready to get every sixpence of advantage at the expense of Great Britain, they must be allowed to defend the interests and the pockets of the British taxpayer without being called mean and tyrannical. What was there in this Amendment—for he considered the hon. Member who had last spoken (Mr. Clancy) and the hon. Member for North Kerry (Mr. Sexton) had conveniently or accidentally ignored the Amendment moved by his hon. Friend (Mr. H. Hobhouse). The Amendment did not interfere with any legitimate improvements of the industries of Ireland; and if hon. Members would read the end of it, which contained the governing words, the undue preference was not to take place except it prejudicially “affect any such industry in Great Britain.” These last words would not interfere with any legitimate improvements in Irish industry. From the speech of the hon. Member for North Kerry (Mr. Sexton) they found that though the Bill prohibited Protection, the Irish Legislature intended to get as near to it, by hook or by crook, as they possibly could, and here, again, he did not complain of the speech of the hon. Member. The late Chancellor of the Exchequer spoke of their having full fiscal liberty. Did anyone in his senses believe that the Prime Minister could himself suppose that a Home Rule Bill of this character could be given to the Irish Parliament without full, definite fiscal power to the extent, even, of managing their Excise and Customs? Fancy a Canada without the management of their Excise and Customs! He did not think hon. Gentlemen could conceal from themselves, as was said by the late Chancellor of the Exchequer, that this was only the first step towards full fiscal liberty. He only knew that if he were an Irishman he should ask for that liberty. The Chief Secretary said the Amendment which he had put down would meet every requirement. The right hon. Gentleman's argument was a twofold one—first, that his own Amendment met the point at issue, and next that they could not define what "undue preference" meant. The latter argument had been disposed of by previous speakers. Take a case where premiums or bounties should so lower the price of butter or cheese that it should be found in consequence of this the British producer was driven out of the market. He thought the Courts would say that was undue preference. On the other hand, if money were spent on improving the quality of the breed of horses or cows, the Courts would equally say that was not undue preference. The Chief Secretary asked if they supposed it likely that the Irish Government would give premiums in order that the British people might eat better butter at a lower price. The right hon. Gentleman had only to refer to Continental nations. They allowed us to eat cheap sugar, and the Danes allowed us to have cheap butter, so long as they wished to create that industry. The Irish Government were likely to share the opinion of Denmark, or any other nation, in giving bounties in order to create or increase a particular industry. The Amendment now before the House touched in no way the legitimate improvement of industries; it only aimed at preventing undue preference which would prejudicially affect a similar trade or industry in Great Britain. The hon. Member for North Kerry spoke of the poor in Ireland. They had poor in England as well. The small cultivators and others connected with the agricultural industry were poor enough, and they were struggling hard to make both ends meet. And what was the proposition of Her Majesty's Government? It was to give power to the Irish Legislature—a power which, according to the speech of the hon. Member for North Kerry, they would use to the utmost extent they could—to interfere with the poor and small agricultural producers in this country in the two particular things—cheese and butter—in which they at present were struggling to make both ends meet. It was well to let the country understand what this meant; therefore, he was thankful that that which the Government had concealed from them the Irish Members, in their candour, had abundantly made plain. The small cultivators of this country were, first of all, to be competed with by undue competition—at any rate, an Amendment to prevent such a thing was refused by the Government—and, next to that, they were to furnish £500,000 a year to afford money for that competition. In other words, they were to pay for the rope to hang themselves. The Government, elected to do so much, particularly for the small agriculturists, had done it in this fashion—they had introduced into this Bill the possibility of unfair competition with these poor English cultivators, which might have a grave and oppressive effect on them. It was not an imaginary danger, because they had seen other nations on the Continent who were not bound by Imperial law doing that thing to the detriment of the English producer; and now they should have Ireland, who also would not be bound by the Imperial law, following suit, as they were candidly told by the Irish Members they intended to do as far as they could. He did not wonder at the Prime Minister wishing to shorten the discussions on this ill-timed and misshapen Bill. The more it was discussed the more became apparent the injustice which was being done to the struggling poor producer of Great Britain, and particularly of England, who was to be sacrificed, economically and in every other respect, to the mad proposals contained in this Bill.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: The styles of the speeches of the hon. Member for North Kerry (Mr. Sexton) and of the hon. Member for North Dublin (Mr. Clancy) do not resemble each other; but, at all events, in the matter which they laid before the House, they have both made an appeal to English Members on account of the poverty of Ireland, and they both made a call on British sympathy for the poorer and humbler industrial partner in the partnership which at present exists in the United Kingdom. I think there is a great fallacy underlying this argument. Of course, it is true that in Ireland there is a district in the South and West in which poverty of a very serious kind exists, and has always existed—not poverty which is increasing, but poverty which, as far as I know, is diminishing—but a poverty which, in spite of this diminution, still undoubtedly does require, in my judgment, the fostering care of this House and assistance from the public funds. But, Sir, to quote the congested districts of Ireland as if the whole of Ireland was a congested district—to talk of the North and East of Ireland and of the South-East of Ireland as if they resemble in any economical particular at all those very congested districts, is to play upon the ignorance of the average English Member. It is a grotesque allegation, and this practice of Irish Members coming forward in formâ pauperis, and appealing to our generous emotions in regard to a large part, at all events, of Ireland can only be successful before a tribunal ignorant of the very elements of the problem.

*MR. CLANCY wished to say at once that he repudiated making any ad misericordiam appeal to any part of that House. He had never done so, nor would he ever do so.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I will not dispute with the hon. Member whether the appeal was an appeal in formâ pauperis or not; but, at all events, it was an appeal the basis of which was the extreme relative poverty of Ireland as compared with England. The hon. Member was not content with discussing the existing poverty in Ireland; but he went back to the last century or two, and to the Whig legislation by which Irish industries were dealt with in a deplorable manner, and crushed out of existence some 200 years ago. That, undoubtedly, represents a condition of policy and of commercial jealousy which everybody regrets, but which was universal at the time; and it is no special reproach to this country, of all countries in the world, that they carried out a policy which, of course, their descendants now regret. On the contrary, never has there been a country with large dependencies which, broadly speaking, taking the whole of its history together, has treated these dependencies through a long period of years with more justice and generosity than England.

MR. MAC NEILL (Donegal, S.): What about the woollen trade?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: If the hon. and learned Gentleman had condescended to listen to my speech, he would know that it was the woollen trade which I was referring to particularly. But, Sir, it is perfectly absurd for Irishmen to go back, with regard to the greater part of Ireland, to these ancient wrongs, and pretend they are special reasons for permitting legislation which would now be injurious, not merely to Ireland, but to England also.

*MR. CLANCY: The right hon. Gentleman made them a special reason himself, when he introduced his Drainage Bill a few years ago.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: The hon. and learned Gentleman is perfectly right, and had he done me the honour to follow me, he would know that I made a special exception. I said with regard to these prosperous parts of Ireland that it is absurd to revive these old controversies. But, coming to the present time, what is the contention of my hon. Friend who has moved this Amendment? He says—and surely he says with justice—that there are industries, or may be industries, in Ireland which do compete, or may compete, in future with England, in which those who carry on the industries in Ireland may, in all natural circumstances, be as well-situated as their competitors in England, but where the balance may be altered in favour of the Irish traders by Irish legislation which we should not permit in this country. Now, who can deny that it is a possible state of things? At the present moment, with regard to the great Irish industry of agriculture,

I should say that the Irish agriculturist was and is as well-situated, if not better, in a large part of Ireland as compared with his British brother ; and to say that because England is larger than Ireland therefore England owes specially generous treatment to Ireland is to be guilty of a great confusion of idea. This is not a question of the comparative area of the two countries, or of their comparative population. It is, or ought to be, simply a comparison as between the capacity of the two countries to carry on particular kinds of industries ; and undoubtedly it is the fact that there are, or may be, in Ireland among agriculturists and others cases in which the Irish producer would be, from natural causes, at least as well-situated as his English brother ; and, therefore, it would be a grave injustice on that English brother if we were to set up an Assembly in Ireland with a special endowment, from the point of view of a surplus, which, according to the view of the Government, would be used, as I understand the hon. Member for North Kerry, for the very purpose of promoting those industries which may or may not come into competition with similar industries here. There is only one further point I wish to dwell upon, and that relates to the Congested Districts Board. Hon. Gentlemen have argued as if the result of this Amendment, if carried, would be to prevent any further subventions by the Congested Districts Board of industries in the South and West of Ireland. I do not so read the Amendment. The Amendment reads "giving any undue preference to any trade or industry." I quite admit that the case mentioned by the right hon. Gentleman opposite of giving assistance to a struggling woollen manufacture in a poor district of Connemara is, undoubtedly, a case of preference. But that money being given on account of excessive poverty of a district and in connection with a general scheme for raising it up, I do not think any Court in the world would contend that that was a case of undue preference. An analogous case, I think, was mentioned. I understand if a Railway Company were to give tickets at a specially cheap rate for taking poor children to a pic-nic, that would, undoubtedly, be a case of preference ; but I am also advised that no Court of Law in the world would say it was undue preference. They would say there were special reasons for these special circumstances which, while it left preference, took it out of the category of undue preference ; and the eleemosynary—I do not use the word in an offensive sense—the eleemosynary legislation of the Congested Districts Board would, it appears to me, under no circumstances, by even the most strict interpretation of a Court of Law, who knew its business, be described as a case of undue preference. The whole House is agreed on the policy of the Congested Districts Board. Neither the Government, nor we who are responsible for the creation of that Board, nor hon. Gentlemen below the Gangway, however much they may differ as to particular proceedings, object to the general principles of that Board ; and none of us desire to see that Board hampered in its operations. We think that, by the word "undue," all danger is entirely obviated ; and, therefore, we are left face to face with this simple problem—whether we are, or are not, to prevent the Irish Parliament from dealing with that part of Ireland which is every whit as prosperous as many parts of the United Kingdom, and granting special terms by which the producers in these districts shall have advantages over their brethren on this side of the Channel ?

*MR. EVERETT (Suffolk, Woodbridge) said, that in this rather long Debate a great deal of eloquence and indignation and valuable time had been consumed to very little purpose and for this reason—the Amendment they were discussing, so far as he could see, was simply, in other words, asking for what was provided for by the Amendment which had been put on the Paper a little lower down by the Chief Secretary on behalf of the Government. The Amendment under discussion forbade the Irish Parliament giving any undue preference to any trade or industry in Ireland in competition with the industries of Great Britain, whilst the Amendment of the Government forbade the Irish Parliament doing anything by which subjects of the Crown resident in Great Britain might be placed at any disadvantage in comparison with subjects of the Crown resident in Ireland. It would take a very clever man to see any essential difference between these two points ; and all the endeavours of the right hon. Member for the Bordesley Division (Mr. Jesse Collings) to make capital for the Party which he adorned as against the Party of the Government, as being more desirous to benefit the small agriculturists of Great Britain, fell entirely to the ground. By the words which the Government desired to have incorporated in the Bill, every subject of the Crown residing on this side of the Channel was entitled to have precisely the same treatment meted out to him which was to be given to his fellow-subjects on the other side of the Channel. That being the case, he (Mr. Everett) was of opinion that they had wasted a great deal of time in discussing the Amendment, when the Government had one on the Paper almost precisely similar to it, and which they were ready and willing to accept.

MR. RENTOUL (Down, E.) said, he considered the discussion on this Amendment had been extremely valuable, as enabling the agriculturists of England to see exactly where they stood. Speaking from the Irish point of view, he stood in this position. He was not able to support the Amendment which had been proposed, because, if a Legislature was to be established in Ireland, from the point of view of the Unionists it would be a Legislature that would probably tend very much to damage trade in Ireland. The only one thing left to the Irish people to live by would be agriculture; and if the Irish Legislature, in whatever wisdom they might possess, thought that by giving bounties, or by any other methods they might devise, they could improve the agriculture of Ireland, they were bound to do so, quite irrespective of whether the agriculture of England suffered or not. The Irish agriculturists in the Irish Parliament must, consequently, think of themselves. That Parliament would be returned almost entirely by the agricultural vote. There would also be 80 Irish Members in the Imperial Parliament, and he thought the proper policy for the Irish Parliament would be to grant bounties with regard to agriculture in Ireland, and then for her Representatives in the English House of Commons to vote against the English Parliament granting similar bounties in England, so that the agriculturists of Ireland would be in a more advantageous position than their English brethren. In all human probability, bounties would be largely granted to agriculturists in Ireland; and, representing an Irish agricultural county, he should not object to it. He did not know, as at present advised, that he would not support such a scheme. But with the urban vote in England being so strong the English agriculturists could not, for one single minute, expect to have such bounties granted to them. They would be left out in the cold, the Irish agriculturists standing on a totally different footing. If English agriculturists were satisfied with that state of affairs, he, for one, could not have any possible objection, and he did not think that Irish Members representing agricultural constituencies could feel themselves justified in voting for the taking away of such a power entirely from the hands of the Legislature in Ireland. Of course, the Unionists did not desire any such Legislature to be set up in Ireland; but if it were, as it would have a free hand in so many other matters, it would not be to the advantage of anybody that it should be tied with regard to this particular matter.

*MR. T. W. RUSSELL said, that as he intended to vote for the Amendment he was not inclined to give a silent vote. Had it not been for the speech of the hon. Member for North Kerry (Mr. Sexton), he should probably have abstained from voting; but the speech of the hon. Member had made his course perfectly plain and clear. The hon. Member had told the House that he could not conceive what an Irish Parliament should exist for if not to develop Irish resources and encourage Irish manufactures. He (Mr. Russell) had not much faith in this spoon-feeding process at all. He came from a part of the country where it had not been applied, where they had made their own manufactures, and got on without that spoon-feeding which seemed to be necessary in other parts of Ireland. The hon. Member for North Kerry said, that although this development of resources was to be undertaken, the Irish people would not stand further taxation? He wanted to know how it was to be done if there was not to be taxation? Were loans to be raised? If so, who were to pay the interest on these loans? He could see perfectly well what would happen. The Province of Ulster would be made to pay for this spoon-feeding in the South and West of Ireland; and he had not the slightest notion of encouraging any such system. He quite agreed with the hon. and learned Gentleman opposite (Mr. Rentoul) in desiring to get as much as could be got for Ireland. He believed more could be got from the Imperial Parliament than from an Irish Parliament; and he, therefore, preferred that no Irish Parliament should be set up. He could plainly see what was meant when this Irish Parliament got to work. This development was to take place with money provided by the North of Ireland—a state of things he strenuously objected to.

*SIR R. TEMPLE (Surrey, Kingston) said, he desired to protest against the statement of the hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for North Dublin (Mr. Clancy) that the English Members who intended to vote for this and other Amendments were really anxious to prevent a Home Rule Parliament in Dublin from doing anything to promote the material welfare of Ireland. That was absolutely incorrect. Only a few days ago they on that side of the House supported the hon. and learned Member for Harrow (Mr. Ambrose) in an Amendment to give the new Irish Parliament all the necessary powers for promoting the material improvement of Ireland. If ever an Irish Executive should be established, they were prepared to give it full power over the material improvement of that country under several specified heads, which together comprise every sort of public work and physical development. That far they should go and no further, but to say that they desired to handicap the Irish Parliament so as to prevent the material improvement of that country was a charge as ungenerous as it was incorrect. He was willing the Irish should have as much of local government as should give the ratepayers and electors every legitimate opportunity of improving or extending their industries. But he could never consent to the use of illegitimate methods pertaining to an unsound economic system which they did not wish to have carried out in any part of the British Islands.

*MR. STRACHEY (Somerset, S.) said, he felt bound to vote for this Amendment. He confessed he had some doubt as to the course he should adopt; but he had been decided to take the course he indicated by the views set forth by the hon. Member for East Down (Mr. Rentoul). He would not do anything to prevent the people of Ireland developing their resources by means of technical education, dairy schools, and butter schools, as was done in England; but he could not for one moment assist hon. Members in making protectionist experiments in Ireland. They had heard the hon. Member for North Kerry, who said he attached great importance to the power which it was sought to give the Irish Parliament in this respect. In the part of the country which he (Mr. Strachey) represented, they were not very wealthy—they were suffering from most severe depression, both in trade and agriculture, which it would take them some time to get over, and it was not for them to have premiums put on Irish produce to facilitate competition with themselves. On that ground, and in no spirit of hostility to the Irish agricultural or other interest—on the ground that they should have free and open competition—he would have to record his vote as he had stated.

*MR. BARTLEY (Islington, N.) said, the last speaker said that if he did not vote as he had decided to do he would injure his position in his constituency.

MR. STRACHEY: No, no!

*MR. BARTLEY said, the hon. Gentleman's attitude showed that the supporters of the Government were getting into a dangerous position. If the Amendment did not affect the hon. Member's own case and constituents, he would vote for the Government; but, as it was, he preferred voting the other way with the Opposition. This showed how liberal and generous some people could be in matters that did not concern their own interest. This was a question which he (Mr. Bartley) had raised in Committee, and, acting on the advice of the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. A. J. Balfour), he had not intended saying anything upon it now; but, as they were to have the closing of the Debate next Friday, he thought they had a right to be heard. They did not wish to prevent the Irish having any power that they considered they ought to have in the matter; but they wished to deal with the question, as they were entitled to do, as one that concerned their own people in England and Scotland. The hon. and learned Member for North Dublin (Mr. Clancy) told them that the Irish Parliament would have nothing to do if it did not promote the material welfare of the people of Ireland. They agreed that it must be the duty of every Parliament to promote the well-being of the people who elected that Parliament. But the real point was whether they were going to allow Ireland, at their expense, to so promote industries in Ireland as to injure the people of this country? He candidly said that his first interest was in England—in Great Britain. He had an interest in the welfare of Ireland; but, if it was a question as between the two, he would vote for England. Ireland might look to her own interests; but were they going to allow Protection in Ireland to the injury of the manufactures of their own country? He really must protest against the idea. There was no question upon which the working classes of this country, with whom he (Mr. Bartley) was largely associated, were so keen as that of unfair competition. Yet now, at the end of the 19th century, the Government were going to allow one part of the United Kingdom to have the power of Protection. If the Government were attacked upon this, they would repudiate the idea; but he ventured to assert that, if the Irish Legislature ever had the means and the power to promote industry by bounties, there would soon be no Free Trade in the United Kingdom. He (Mr. Bartley) was a strong Free Trader, and he was not ashamed to confess it, and there was a strong spirit in the country upon the subject; but if this great Liberal Party—and it was not that—was going to allow Ireland to have Protection of Irish industries, it would live in the memory of the British people as the Government that had done its best to destroy the Free Trade of the country. They could not get over it. They were going to allow Ireland to put bounties on her manufactures, especially on the agricultural industries. The Irish Members had said over and over again that they would have Protection. [Cries of "No!"] Yes; for Mr. Parnell distinctly stated it, and he was their greatest Leader, and his memory was still the greatest in Ireland. He said they would have bounties; and it was because of that, and because the Irish said that, that the Government could not resist it. The Prime Minister would agree with the Amendment if he dared, but he was not his own master. As an English Representative, and one associated with the working classes, he (Mr. Bartley) said they would make this known in every part of the country. They would preach it from the house-tops. [Cries of "Oh!"] Yes, they would; they would make it known from one end of the land to the other that the Government were ready to give this power, which would seriously injure the trader, the farmer, and the labourer of this country. Had it been known at the last Election that they contemplated taking such action, not one in 1,000 or in 10,000 would have supported the Government.

MR. P. J. POWER (Waterford, E.) said, he would like to ask the hon. Gentleman who had just sat down whether he was aware that the late Lord Carnarvon distinctly made an offer of bounties—

MR. BARTLEY: Were you there?

MR. POWER said, that offer was made during Lord Carnarvon's famous interview with Mr. Parnell; and he recollected that after that a number of them (the Irish Members) were sent to the North of England to advocate the Tory cause—

MR. A. J. BALFOUR said, he would point out to the hon. Member that Lord Carnarvon was not now able to reply to those statements. He might point out that similar statements had long since been proved to be groundless.

MR. POWER said, he had a distinct recollection of the circumstances. [Cries of "Vote!" and "Divide!"] That was all he wished to say.

Question put.

The House divided:—Ayes 112; Noes 157.—(Division List, No. 274.)

MR. POWELL-WILLIAMS (Birmingham, S.) said, an Amendment stood on the Paper in his name as follows:—

Clause 4 page 2, line 42, after "belief," insert "or to the raising of any tax, or to the appropriation, directly or indirectly, of any part of the Irish Public revenue, or of any tax, duty, or impost imposed by the Irish Legislature, for the purpose of, or in connection with, religion, or for the benefit of the holders of any religious office as such."

It would shorten their consideration of the question which it raised if he said that he was willing to accept the suggestion which had been made by the Chief Secretary. The right hon. Gentleman proposed that, instead of the terms of the Amendment standing in his name, the following words should be inserted in the place indicated by him :—

"Or receive or appropriate directly or indirectly, save as heretofore, any public revenue for any religious purposes."

But he wanted to make an appeal to the Chief Secretary to go a little further, and to accept also the words—

"Or for the benefit of the holders of any religious office as such."

If he was willing to accept these words, it would be unnecessary for him (Mr. Williams) to labour the contentions he had embodied in his Amendment as it stood.

MR. J. MORLEY signified his assent.

MR. POWELL-WILLIAMS said, he was much obliged. On the question of Order, he did not know whether he should move his own Amendment, or move one embodying the words he had suggested?

MR. DEPUTY SPEAKER: The hon. Member can bring up the amended Amendment—his own Amendment, but, of course, in the amended form.

MR. POWELL-WILLIAMS said, he moved accordingly. He wished to say that he should like to know whether the words "save as heretofore" would imply that there was anything in the Bill in front of this Amendment which would give liberty to the Irish Legislature to do anything which the Amendment would keep them from doing? He would direct attention to the proviso in Clause 3 as to the powers of the Legislature. He begged to move the Amendment.

Amendment proposed,

In Clause 4, page 2, line 42, after the word "belief," to insert the words "Raising or appropriating, directly or indirectly, save as heretofore, any public revenue for any religious purpose, or for the benefit of the holders of any religious office as such."—(Mr. Powell-Williams.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

Mr. Powell-Williams

MR. SEXTON: I rise for the purpose of endeavouring to form a just judgment upon this Amendment. We ought to pay careful regard, I think, to the provisions in the clause already dealt with on this subject. It is already provided that the Irish Legislature cannot deal with the question of endowments, or with any disability that may be imposed on account of religious belief. These words, which were more formidable and drastic than those which originally appeared in the Bill, were amended after careful consideration and discussion. Not only was the endowment of religion forbidden, but the conferring of any advantage or benefit on account of religious belief. He had listened to the Debate in Committee, which was conducted by the most competent persons, and he had heard satisfaction expressed at the insertion of those words. He should have thought, therefore, that the House might have been spared any further reference to the matter. The Chief Secretary proposed now to provide that the Irish Legislature should not have the power to make any law, to raise or appropriate directly or indirectly any public revenue for any religious purpose, or for payment to the holder of any religious office as such. He should like to hear from a Minister in what respect the Government judged that the words already included in the Bill differed from the present proposal, because it seemed to him that the words forbidding direct or indirect endowment of religion would apply to the payment of public money to the holder of any religious office as such, the one being a general phrase, the other being a reference to the individual. The appropriation of revenue for religious purposes appeared to him to be covered already, for would not the appropriating of money for religious purposes be conferring an advantage on account of religious belief? It struck him as strange that the Irish Legislature should be forbidden to do what the Imperial Parliament did every Session. It had been found expedient and necessary in Ireland, and would be so after Home Rule was granted. The words, "save as heretofore," were probably intended to guard that which had been done already in the past, and which would probably be continued. It had been found expedient in Great Britain and in Ireland to pay ecclesiastics and members of Religious Orders for services to the State as schoolmasters, chaplains in the Army and Navy, in prisons, in workhouses, and asylums. The payments were made for religious purposes. Would they come within the Amendment? Payments were made to monks and nuns and others for services in the management of reformatories and industrial schools, and those persons were selected deliberately because they were ecclesiastics and members of Religious Orders, and would render service to the State more efficiently and cheaply than other persons. But upon what principle would the payment to holders of religious offices be provided? These persons were specially selected because they held religious offices, and the services they could render to the State might have still further development in the future. At present their services were recognised in the manner he had mentioned, and in connection with education; but why should the Irish Legislature be shut out from any development of the principle? In many ways the services of nuns might be utilised in giving educational training, teaching girls such accomplishments as domestic economy, sewing, cooking, and other matters in which experience had shown that they gave most efficient instruction. Would the Irish Parliament be shut out from making payments on such account? He could see that a difficulty might arise, and he would suggest that the Government should modify the words "save as heretofore," so that it would be clear that the payments might be made according to the same principle as heretofore—for instance, they might use such words as "save on such principle as heretofore," or "save in regard to analogous services," or words that would imply that similar services from ecclesiastics might receive State payment as at present. In that way the right hon. Gentleman would relieve a well-founded apprehension that the clause might prevent the development of a system under which ecclesiastics had done the State good secular service?

*SIR C. RUSSELL said, that payments for the purposes which the hon. Member contemplated would not be payments for religious purposes, and could consequently be made. He confessed he had some doubt whether this Amendment was necessary at all; but the Government thought it would save time to accept it in its modified form.

Question put, and agreed to.

SIR T. LEA rose to move to insert in Clause 4—

"Provided that nothing herein contained shall prevent the Irish Legislature from making grants for the continuance of the Training Colleges as existing at the date of the passing of this Act."

*SIR C. RUSSELL: That is out of Order.

MR. J. MORLEY: I would submit that the Amendment is already covered.

MR. DEPUTY SPEAKER: That is so.

(On Motion of Mr. J. MORLEY, the following Amendment was agreed to:—

Clause 4, page 3, line 1, after "diverting the property," insert "or without its consent altering the constitution."

MR. A. J. BALFOUR rose to move an Amendment to Clause 4, standing in the name of the hon. Member for East Down, to provide that the powers of the Irish Legislature shall not extend to the making of any law—

"Whereby any denominational University or College may be established or endowed, in whole or in part, or subsidised in any way out of public funds."

MR. J. MORLEY handed a communication across the Table to Mr. Balfour.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: Unfortunately, if I give way now I shall not be able to speak again; therefore, I must make my statement on this subject. As hon. Gentlemen who have done me the honour to listen to the utterances which from time to time I have been obliged to make on this subject are aware, I have always held that the circumstances of Ireland were such that it would be a proper thing to establish, I will not say a University, but at any rate a College, under Roman Catholic management. The whole tendency of Catholic views is to prevent the training of Catholic youth in any save Denominational Colleges. I am sorry that the Catholics of Ireland do not follow the example set them by the members of other Religious Bodies, and allow general education to go on under circumstances which bring together all sections of the community, and thus give all the better results of University training. At the same time, I admit that we have to recognise the fact that the great majority of Irish Catholics will not consent to receive University education except in a Catholic College or University. It is absurd to refuse to give to Catholic Irishmen a training in matters outside doctrine simply because of this view. Under the circumstances, I have always held, and still hold, that to deprive Irishmen of a knowledge of mathematics, sciences, classics, and all the other subjects of a University curriculum simply because I do not approve of the conditions under which they will consent to receive it is a policy which we cannot carry on. I have never seen any reason, and I do not now see any reason, to depart from my public utterances on the subject. But when you leave these broad principles and come to the question of permitting an Irish Government to impose taxes in Ireland on Protestants and Roman Catholics alike for this purpose, we change altogether the conditions under which this University or College should be instituted. To ask the population of the United Kingdom to provide the necessary funds that would be required for this object is one thing, but it is a totally different thing to allow an Irish Legislature, entirely dominated by the Roman Catholic vote, to impose taxes upon a population in violent opposition with them to maintain a Catholic University. I should never willingly be a party to giving an Irish Legislature power to do that. By all means let the policy be carried out by the Imperial Parliament, which will retain power to carry it out. It will then be done with the free will of the whole community, and without imposing hardship upon any class; but if it is done by the Irish Assembly the Protestant minority will not consent to it. If their money is taken it will be taken under coercion. This is the broad distinction I draw; the policy may be carried out by the Imperial Parliament, but not by the Irish Legislature. For these reasons, while adhering to all I have said, I move this limiting sub-section upon the particular powers to be given to the Irish Legislature.

Amendment proposed,

Mr. A. J. Balfour

In page 3, line 4, after the word "or," to insert, as a new sub-section, the words—" (4) Whereby any denominational University or College may be established or endowed in whole, or in part, or subsidised in any way out of public funds; or."—(Mr. A. J. Balfour.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

MR. SEXTON said, he noticed with interest the development of the sense of equity and statesmanship in the Leader of the Opposition, who could justify a thing done by the Imperial Parliament, but not the same thing done for Ireland by an Irish Parliament.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: Hear, hear! Out of Irish funds. It would be grossly unjust for the British Parliament to tax Ireland for this purpose, but to tax the whole of Great Britain and Ireland for an Irish University would not be objectionable.

MR. SEXTON said, he should deny that the right hon. Gentleman was entitled to assume that the settlement of a Catholic University by the Irish Parliament would be intolerable to Irish Protestants. It would not be more intolerable for an Irish Legislature to tax a minority of Protestants than for the Imperial Parliament to tax a larger number of Protestants for this purpose.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: With their own free will.

MR. SEXTON: The endeavour would be to bring about such a settlement as the Protestants would accept. No one could deny that the state of University education in Ireland was most unsatisfactory so far as Catholics were concerned. Three years ago in the House the right hon. Gentleman admitted this in language clear and striking; but now he found it his duty to deny the power to the Irish Legislature. Undoubtedly, the present University system was unsatisfactory. The Royal University was but an Examining Board, discharging no other University functions. The Queen's Colleges were but slightly availed of by the Catholics, and Trinity College was a Protestant Institution.

MR. CARSON: No, no!

MR. SEXTON said, it was practically a Protestant Institution. He would not argue the abstract question; but, in fact, it was a Protestant Institution, endowed by the State out of confiscated lands, and it was controlled by Protestant Fellows. Protestant services were held in its chapel, and it had Chairs of Protestant Theology. No one ever supposed that it would be accepted by the Catholics of Ireland. The only effect of adopting the Amendment would be to concentrate the efforts of the Irish Legislature on the reform of Trinity College, so that its endowments should be available equally for Catholics or Protestants. But with freedom in the matter, he was disposed to think that the settlement of the University Question would take the direction of the establishing of a University which, for Catholics, should compare with the position of Trinity College towards Protestants. The condition might be laid down that the University to be established by the Irish Parliament should be such an Institution as would bear to the Catholic community a character corresponding to that of Trinity College for the Protestant community. In that way equality would be established between the Protestants and Catholics of Ireland. What was a Denominational University or College? This was a popular phrase; they read it in the newspapers and heard it in Debate, but would anyone tell him what was a Denominational University or College? Did it mean a College governed by ecclesiastics of one creed or by laymen of one creed, or did it mean that the curriculum included the teaching of theology of any creed, or that a particular creed were excluded? He could give half-a-dozen different definitions, and if they allowed any such words as these to remain the Irish Parliament would not know upon what line to proceed. They would not know what was excluded or allowed by the phrase, whilst it was impossible to say what interpretation might be put upon it by any Judicial Tribunal. He would suggest that, instead of the insertion of such general words, the Opposition should lay down precisely what it was they thought an Irish Parliament might do, or what they thought it should not do. If they would lay that before the House in plain and temperate language they would find the Irish Party ready to consider any reasonable proposal.

MR. J. MORLEY: The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Manchester (Mr. A. J. Balfour) took up a position with reference to this question—not on this Amendment, but previously—in which I confess that I, for my part, although I approach it from a different point of view, am not very much in discord with. He and I will agree that the ideal which inspired those who first inaugurated and brought to completion in Ireland, 50 or 60 years ago, the system of mixed education or places of instruction—both primary and higher and secondary instruction—was that they should be places where students of all the great religious communions might meet, and meet upon the common ground where a love of letters might be laid by which the unfortunate social and religious differences which had sprung up in Ireland might be softened and assuaged. But I agree with the right hon. Gentleman that as things have gone, and as they are at this moment, that is an ideal which must be postponed. Then the only question between the right hon. Gentleman and me is whether, if you are setting up an Irish Legislature, it is fair and expedient that they should be allowed to seek an end which the right hon. Gentleman himself fairly admits to be in the highest degree desirable. I do not wish to press this in a controversial spirit, but let the House note how far the right hon. Gentleman goes. He admits it is desirable that there should be a well-equipped College under Catholic control, and that that College should be supported by public funds. The only difference between us is that, even if an Irish Legislature is to be set up—the right hon. Gentleman will not willingly admit that it will be—that even then it must be only this Imperial Parliament and this Imperial Purse which is to provide for this well-equipped College under Catholic control. I confess I agree with the hon. Member for North Kerry in not being able to see the slightest difference in principle between the proposal which the right hon. Gentleman is not unwilling to see carried—which, perhaps, some day or other he may propose to introduce into this House—I do not see the slightest difference in principle, in the great controversy of denominational education, between his proposal and that which we assume the Irish Legislative Body would desire to act upon. However that may be, I think, so far as this particular Amendment goes, it is impossible for us to accept it in the words in which the right hon. Gentleman has moved it. It would be very easy to show, if it were worth while—but I hope to get to less technical ground—that in its drafting this Amendment is entirely incomplete and misleading. I will give one illustration—

"Whereby any University or College may be established or endowed out of public funds."

How can a Denominational College or University be "established" out of public funds? Therefore, the hon. Member who drew up the Amendment must have meant "established and endowed"; otherwise, if you leave the Amendment as it stands at this moment, it would prevent the grant of a sum of money by the Irish Legislature towards a chemical laboratory in a Catholic College. It would prevent such a grant as, for example, Parliament gives the Royal Society in London for prosecution of researches in meteorology. That is an illustration only of the inadequate form which he has given to the wording of the Amendment.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: It was not my Amendment.

MR. RENTOUL said, he drew up the Amendment, and he referred, rightly or wrongly, to funds given for buildings. It was quite possible to conceive there might be buildings.

MR. J. MORLEY: I do not wish to dwell upon these minor objections to the Amendment at all. I think, after what passed in this House when we discussed this question before, the House will be prepared for the position I now propose to take up in respect to this Amendment, and we shall go upon the lines foreshadowed by the hon. Member for North Kerry, though I admit those are lines which indicate a considerable degree of moderation on the part of the Catholic Party. If they accept those lines which the hon. Member for North Kerry has indicated, and which I shall say in a moment or two are the lines we propose to take towards this Amendment, then I think that the House will have reason to congratulate itself upon having got an accommodation in this most difficult question, which both sides may accept without sacrificing any principle which either side rightly holds sacred. I will now bring the matter to a point. What I shall propose will be this—to leave out the word "denominational" before "University or College," and to substitute for the words "or endowment," the words "and endowment," and to leave out those most dangerous and misleading words "in whole or in part, or subsidised in any way," and then to let the Amendment run in this way—

"Whereby there may be established and endowed out of public funds any University or College in which the conditions set out in the University of Dublin Tests Act of 1873 are not observed."

My hon. Friend the Member for North Kerry was really substantially right, in spite of the hon. and learned Member who represents the University, in his account of Trinity College. You all maintain upon that side that Trinity College is not denominational. What is there in Trinity College? I am not in the least attacking it, or accusing it of narrowness. Nobody has more admiration for Trinity College, or more readily recognises the great part it has played in the history of learning, than I; and therefore I am as far from wishing or intending to give a disparaging description of Trinity College as any hon. Gentleman opposite. Trinity College, first of all, grants degrees in the Faculty of Theology; in the second place, it has Professors and Lecturers in Protestant Divinity, and, as a matter of fact, though not in law, all its Governing Bodies in times past have belonged to, and continue to belong to, one religious persuasion.

MR. SEXTON: There are one or two exceptions.

MR. CARSON: It entirely depends on whether you are speaking of the Senate or the Board. If you refer to the Board I do not think there are any Catholics upon it. If you refer to the Senate there are Catholics upon it, and what I interrupted the hon. Member for was to say that there was nothing to prevent Catholics by degrees from coming up to take Fellowships. There are some Fellows who are Catholics.

MR. J. MORLEY: What I meant was the Board. [MR. CARSON: I agree.] The Board has control over the University, and it is composed of members who belong entirely to one religious persuasion, all being Protestants. I do not intend to labour the matter. The House will see clearly how we stand. If the Irish Legislature is minded to contribute from public funds for such emoluments as would bear to the Catholics the relation which Trinity College bears to the Protestants, then we think that would be a settlement which might be accepted without any sacrifice of principles. That is why I object to the word "denominational." The Amendment which I have suggested does not sanction—on the contrary, the whole of our Bill goes upon the assumption that there is not to be—an endowment of religion. It would not sanction a Denominational University in any narrow sense. But I think hon. Gentlemen opposite who have followed me, and who are sufficiently up in the controversy, will agree that if Trinity College is not denominational then the Irish Legislature ought not to be precluded from setting itself to achieve that great task which the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Manchester agrees would be desirable. I think the modification of the words of the Amendment of the hon. Gentleman which I have suggested will meet the purpose.

MR. RENTOUL thought the settlement of this question on the lines suggested by the Chief Secretary would be a difficult matter. The right hon. Gentleman pointed out that there were Theological Professors in Trinity College, and that Trinity College granted degrees of D.D. in Protestant Theology. That being so, the argument would be, if the Chief Secretary's Amendment were accepted, that then the Irish Parliament might establish a University in which Roman Catholic Theological Professors would be the only Theological Professors, and in which the degree of "D.D." in Roman Catholic Theology would be the only theological degree granted by that University. He was afraid it would be impossible for them to accept that, because if Trinity College or Dublin University had been about to be established now the Presbyterian population might have had as much difficulty as the Roman Catholic population in accepting Trinity College. Trinity College was an established University. It was established before their time, and with it they had nothing to do. They were now referring to something in the future, and he wished from the bottom of his heart that he could agree with the statement of the hon. Member for North Kerry that he believed an amicable settlement of this question between Catholics and Protestants was at the present time possible. There was no man in that House who would desire more than he to meet the hon. Member for Kerry as far as he could on this matter, and to have a settlement of this very difficult question; but when they recollected the difficulties which had beset them before, when they recollected that one of the strongest Governments of the Prime Minister was defeated on the question of Irish University education, the difficulties in the way of a settlement of the question became apparent. He considered that the University education in Ireland was adequate. If it was not adequate now it was certainly perfectly adequate before the old Queen's University was abolished; because the Queen's University was a teaching University, having affiliated Colleges planted in the different corners of Ireland. It was an extremely cheap University to meet the wants of the poor population; it was in every sense a fully-equipped and complete University, and he thought Ireland would have wanted nothing in the matter of University training if that old Queen's University had been allowed to remain. He thought even the hon. Member for North Kerry might have some difficulty in accepting the Amendment of the Chief Secretary in the form in which it was put forward. One of the very first questions that would come before the Irish Legislature was that of the establishment of an Irish University. Archbishop Walsh had said—

"Without running any risk of being set down as a false prophet, I may safely say that an attempt to deal with the Irish University Question will be among the chief proposals to be set before Parliament when it begins its work."

The point to be next considered was in what spirit would the Irish Legislature approach this question? Cardinal Logue, speaking in Belfast, contended that the Queen's Colleges in Ireland and the University of Dublin were godless institutions, and dangerous alike to the faith of Catholic students. Thus they had it that one of the earliest things an Irish Parliament would do would be to approach this question of University education, and that it would be approached in the spirit that both Trinity College and the Queen's Colleges—which were entirely non-sectarian institutions—were dangerous alike to Catholic faith. But if he understood that it was distinctly laid down that it was impossible for the Catholic religion to exist under a system of mixed education he should have great difficulty in pressing this matter upon the House, because if mixing with Protestants in a University would be entirely destructive to the Catholic religion then he thought there would be a good deal to be said on the point that the Catholics could not be expected to tolerate anything that would destroy their religious life or religion. Those of them who did not approve of the Catholic faith might disapprove of the Catholic religion, but they did not want to persecute it or treat it unfairly. Bishop Doyle said before a Committee of the House of Lords 60 years ago that no danger to the Catholic religion might be apprehended from mixed education, so that it turned out that this desire for denominational education on the part of Catholic ecclesiastics was merely a fad or contention of to-day that had no foundation in the past. When the Irish Parliament dealt with this University Question it would have to do so under the control of the ecclesiastics of Ireland. What the Land Question was to the farmers of Ireland the Education Question was to the Irish ecclesiastics, and it was idle to talk about the people of Ireland being able to act as they liked themselves. The day was past when anyone doubted that the ecclesiastics of Ireland were not able to do whatever they liked, as they had proved in the very clearest manner. The difficulty of arriving at the amicable settlement to which the hon. Member for North Kerry referred seemed to be historical. They had first Trinity College or Dublin University, and the Catholics were not satisfied with that. They had then a mixed University—the Queen's—a thoroughly Collegiate University, and they were entirely dissatisfied with that. They had now the Royal University, a mere Examining Board, in which the Catholics enjoyed many important positions—in which Catholics and Protestants were equal in every point of view, and yet they were dissatisfied with that; therefore it did seem to be a difficult task to settle this University Question. They believed that the Catholics were determined to get University education in Ireland into their own hands. The Catholic ecclesiastics of Ireland had, in fact, said so in the most emphatic language. Believing that this would not be right, he asked that some such restriction as he had proposed should be placed upon the Irish Legislature, and that they should not be permitted to establish an exclusively Catholic University such as Cardinal Logue said they desired. At the present time Trinity College was open to the Catholics without any disability whatever. It was true that there were lectures given in Protestant episcopal theology and degrees granted; but those who did not belong to the Episcopal Church found no difficulty in graduating in the University of Dublin because there were these Chairs. That being so, they felt that the Catholics laboured under no disadvantage at the present time. What was the reason that the Protestants of Ireland were so strongly in favour of united or mixed education? They had no desire to proselytise the Roman Catholic population of Ireland; but they believed that the system of secular education which brought all creeds together under the same roof tended to make them all better friends, and that it was one of the most advantageous systems that could possibly be established in Ireland. The entire Unionist population of Ireland, Protestant and Catholic alike, held that opinion; and he hoped, therefore, the Government would see their way to accept the Amendment which he had placed upon the Paper.

*MR. T. W. RUSSELL said, as he held opinions on this question which were different to those held by most of his Colleagues from the North of Ireland, he should like to say one or two words upon it. He had always held, that as regarded primary education, the Roman Catholics of Ireland had no real grievance. But he had always held that, as regarded higher education, owing to the attitude taken up by the Roman Catholic hierarchy, there was a want which ought to be supplied, if it were possible to supply it. That being his position, he had followed in this matter the Leader of the Opposition ever since he made his speech in the year 1888. He frankly admitted he had little or no support in the North of Ireland; that he was not representing the views of the majority of his constituents; and that if he gave a vote of that kind—as he should do—he should have to defend it in his own constituency, and in Ulster generally. He also frankly admitted that he was at issue with nearly all his Colleagues in Ulster, and he hoped the House would bear with him on that account if he ventured to occupy the time of the House for a few minutes. The proposition made by the Chief Secretary that night was, he thought, an exceedingly moderate one on the face of it; but, in his opinion, it ran counter to the 4th clause of the Bill itself. The 4th section declared that there should not be any endowment of religion either directly or indirectly; and what the Chief Secretary undoubtedly did by his Amendment was to endow Theological Chairs, or permit the Irish Legislature to endow Theological Chairs, in any University that might be set up for the benefit of Roman Catholics. His view was that there should be no endowment of religion in any shape or form, and he always regretted that the Divinity School was left in Trinity College in 1869. He thought it ought to have been removed at that time, and beyond all doubt it did give a denominational aspect to that Institution. But let him put this to the Chief Secretary—this Divinity School in Trinity College existed for the training of clergymen for the Protestant Church in Ireland; and because that Divinity School existed the Chief Secretary, so far as he could gather, thought that it would be proper to allow the Irish Parliament to erect a College on the same basis—that was to say, endow Theological Chairs. ["No!"] His answer to that was this—that if the Chief Secretary did not endow Theological Chairs undoubtedly he would not reach the Catholic ideal in education. Whilst Trinity College had its Divinity School, Maynooth had a large endowment out of the public funds for the training of Roman Catholic ecclesiastics, so that the one balanced the other. He thought the Chief Secretary's proposal would be a reasonable one if they could get rid of the endowment of Theological Chairs. He must say he sympathised with the Chief Secretary's argument, which the hon. Member for North Kerry (Mr. Sexton) had rather derided. If a proposal were made in that House to supply a want that everybody admitted existed—he supposed because Roman Catholics could not conscientiously take advantage of the Institutions now existing—if a proposal were made in this Parliament to set up such a College he should support it. At the same time, he recognised the great difference between having the thing done in this Parliament and having it done in an Irish Parliament, simply because the British Parliament would attach conditions which the Irish Legislature, being practically in the hands of the Roman Catholic hierarchy, would not attach. He should be very glad if a solution of the difficulty could be arrived at. He was bound again to say that on this question he spoke only his own views, and that he was in conflict, he supposed, with the whole of his Colleagues from Ulster.

MR. HANBURY (Preston) thought that with regard to University education in Ireland the Catholics had a distinct grievance, and he was sorry that the present Leader of the Opposition had not obtained the support he ought to have received when he tried to remove that grievance a few years ago. He (Mr. Hanbury) was not going to split hairs on this question. He should have much preferred to have had it settled by the Imperial Parliament, but he did not think the Imperial Parliament would have an opportunity of settling it; and, rather than not see it settled at all, he should vote for having it dealt with by the Irish Legislature. He should, therefore, go into the Lobby with the Government, and he thought one or two other Members of the Opposition would do the same.

*MR. D. PLUNKET (Dublin University) said, he did not wish to give any decisive opinion upon this Amendment, as it seemed to him extremely doubtful what its effect would be in consequence of the form in which it was proposed. The Chief Secretary (Mr. J. Morley) had set up some kind of claim for equity on behalf of some future College which was to be in a position corresponding to that of Trinity College, Dublin, and was to have the power of teaching and giving degrees in Catholic theology. The proposal with which the House was now concerned was whether it should be established under the authority and protection of a Legislature which would be distinctly Catholic in its ruling character. When the Unionists proposed that Trinity College should remain under the authority of the Imperial Parliament they were met at once with a negative. There, therefore, appeared to be no reciprocity whatever, and if anything of the kind suggested by the Chief Secretary were proposed he should again claim that Dublin University should be placed under the control and protection of the Imperial Parliament.

*MR. W. JOHNSTON (Belfast, S.) said, he rose to take part in this discussion with considerable reluctance and great feelings of regret, for he found himself at variance with hon. Members whose opinions he respected, and for whose character he had the highest esteem. His hon. Friend the Member for South Tyrone, as he himself had indicated, spoke on this University Education Question for himself, and not for the Protestants of the North of Ireland. Standing there, he (Mr. Johnston) ventured to speak as one of the Representatives not only of the City of Belfast, but of the great Protestant Province which was so distinguished for prosperity and progress; and though he was sure that the sentiments he would utter might seem out of date in that Assembly, he believed he should be untrue to the principles he had held all his life long if he hesitated, even in the face of an adverse audience, to give vent to those sentiments which he cherished in his heart of hearts. There was no question that the subject of education was one of paramount importance in the eyes of the ecclesiastical hierarchy of Ireland. While the farmers aimed at obtaining the land in many cases without paying any rent at all, the ecclesiastics desired that supremacy for their Church and principles which it had been their constant and unremitting aim, century after century, to succeed in obtaining, not only in Ireland, but throughout the world; and he felt that if Ireland were handed over to Romish teaching and to the ecclesiastical supremacy of that Church, there would be an end to enlightened literature; there would be the suppression of all history; the termination of moral philosophy, and there would be a return of the dark ages against which Europe had long struggled on many a field of fight. His hon. Friend the Member for South Tyrone honestly and earnestly advocated any cause that he took up; and on this occasion, as on many others, the hon. Member had shown the courage of his convictions in expressing opinions which were adverse to those of the majority of the constituency which he represented. He trusted that the House would not give its sanction to a proposal for erecting an ecclesiastical supremacy in Ireland. He was perfectly prepared to concede civil and religious equality to all classes of Her Majesty's subjects. It had been the fashion to talk as if they in Ulster were struggling for Protestant ascendancy. No such feeling existed in the minds of anyone. If there was Protestant ascendancy it was the ascendancy of intellect over ignorance—of industry over idleness. It was this that had made Belfast so prosperous, and had given to the fair fields of Ulster that position which they occupied of prosperity in the land. The Romish hierarchy of Ireland already possessed ample educational means for teaching their priests. Amply endowed as Maynooth had been by the generosity of Parliament, they required no further assistance, either from the Imperial Parliament or the Irish Legislature, to teach the tenets of their Church. In former days the ecclesiastics of the Church of Rome were prepared to accept the Educational Institutions that were established in Ireland for the benefit of his Roman Catholic fellow-countrymen. But by degrees they withdrew from those Institutions—from the Queen's College and the University—one after another; and it was impossible to say what would satisfy them in the demands which they made from time to time upon the Parliament of this country. He regretted to differ on this subject of University education from his right hon. Friend the Leader of the Opposition. He should like to have said in the presence of the right hon. Gentleman what he was compelled to say in his absence—that on this question the right hon. Gentleman did not represent the sentiments of the Protestants of Ireland. The Protestants of Ireland were not prepared to see either the Irish Legislature or the Imperial Parliament set up in Ireland an establishment for the teaching of the doctrines and tenets of the Church of Rome. They had already had sufficient evidence of what those doctrines and tenets produced in Ireland. He unhesitatingly and fearlessly said that it was to the teaching of Maynooth and kindred Institutions that they owed all the revolt, the rebellion, the agitation, and the turmoil that existed in Ireland at the present day. He believed that this great Empire owed its position and prosperity to the steady maintenance all down the centuries of those Protestant principles which were established at the Reformation; and the further it receded from them towards infidelity, or indifference, or Ritualism, it was an approach to the Romanism against which he ventured to protest. The further it proceeded in that direction from the great principles of the Reformation, so far would it go back in prosperity and progress, till possibly its glorious sun of ascendancy might sink never again to rise. He would not venture on that occasion to do more than enter this protest. But, no matter from what side of the House it might come, he should resolutely and energetically oppose any attempt to endow out of the funds either of Ireland or of Great Britain an Educational Institution which would have for its object the teaching of those tenets which had produced disorder in Europe age after age, which would remove from its pristine glory this Empire, and which, if carried into effect, would bring to a termination all those civil and religious liberties for which their forefathers had so long contended.

MR. BODKIN (Roscommon, N.) said, it was not necessary to follow in any detail the speech of the hon. Member for South Belfast. But one argument the hon. Gentleman had used was that the Catholics of Ireland were inferior in intellect to the Party and the creed to which the hon. Gentleman belonged. For that inferiority of intellect he supposed there was no remedy; but, surely, the ignorance of the Catholics was an argument for, instead of against, the establishment of a Catholic University. All the Catholics asked was for a University in which their ignorance might be removed. The opinions of his hon. Friend the Member for South Belfast—for he hoped he might call him his hon. Friend—were at least honest, and they had a great respect for honest opinions, however foolish they might be. He did not think there was anything in the speech of his hon. Friend that could be seriously discussed; but he thought the speech of the Leader of the Opposition on the subject deserved considerable attention. The right hon. Gentleman had said that he believed a Catholic University for Ireland was a good thing—he said it, too, four years ago—and that the Imperial Parliament ought to give it to Ireland. It was part of the tenets of the right hon. Gentleman and his followers that everything the Imperial Parliament ought to do it would do. It was the one reason against Home Rule. The Imperial Parliament was able and willing to do justice to Ireland. Then why did it not give a Catholic University to Ireland? The right hon. Gentleman was able to give Ireland a Coercion Act which he considered expedient. Why did he not give it a Catholic University which he also considered expedient? If, as the right hon. Gentleman practically declared, the Imperial Parliament ought to give Ireland a Catholic University, and did not give it, why was the question to be reserved to that Imperial Parliament, and retained from the Irish Parliament which would give it? What was the only argument the right hon. Gentleman found to cover his change of front on this question? That the Protestants of England should be taxed to give Irish Catholics a University, and that the Irish nation should not be taxed for that purpose. If it was right to tax the Protestants of England for an Irish Catholic University, surely it was equally right to tax the Protestants of Ireland, and he would venture to think there would be no serious disagreement on this question. The Protestants of Ireland, as well as the Catholics of that country, were substantially in favour of denominational education. They were in favour of the inclusion, and not the exclusion, of religion from University education. He challenged even the hon. Member for Dublin University (Mr. D. Plunket) to say that he would wish to exclude religion from the walls of Trinity College. He believed the Protestants of Ireland, when they came to consider this question, had fair play sufficiently in their minds to give to their Catholic fellow-countrymen what they desired for themselves. They must be convinced that the real safeguard of Trinity College, the real safeguard of that Institution of which all Irishmen were proud as having given so many great men to Ireland, was to plant beside it a University of the majority of the people in honest and healthy emulation. He did not think there was any Protestant in Ireland who would object to such a course. He was of opinion, therefore, that if the argument of the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. A. J. Balfour) bore any interpretation, it was an interpretation that Home Rule was necessary in order to do justice to Ireland in this matter. The Imperial Parliament had refused to settle this question of University education in Ireland, and therefore it should be relegated to a Parliament that was able and willing to settle it.

*MR. WEBB (Waterford, W.) said, he was entirely in accord with his Catholic Colleagues on the question of University education, and he entirely reciprocated the feelings of the Chief Secretary in his remarks upon the subject. He regretted deeply, however, that it did not appear possible in Ireland, as in some other countries, that education could be carried on in common, and that people should thereby learn to respect and love each other, and to forget those differences which were due to differences of religious education. One of the most interesting institutions to him in Ireland was the Central Model School in Dublin, where there still was an effort being made to carry on that system of education; but he must admit the effort was a failure, because few in Ireland desired its continuance. In no part of Ireland was the system of denominational education extending more than that Northern district from which came so many Members who here opposed it. Statistics proved that the number of denominational schools was increasing, and he could not understand how anyone could put forward Trinity College as being more or less than a Denominational Institution. The Catholics might be said, theoretically, to have equal rights with the Protestants; but in justice they had not, and it appeared to him that the whole influence of the place was Protestant. If they would just turn the case round, and imagine a College in which only Catholic services were carried on, and where the head of it was a Catholic ecclesiastic, would any Protestant say that College was not a Denominational Institution? He thought the Protestants had made a mistake in not being satisfied that Catholics should have equal rights with them. He thought the wisest plan would be to leave Trinity College as it was, where Protestants could receive an education under Protestant influence, and to establish an Institution where they would obtain a similar advantage for Catholics, because if Trinity College were further undenominationalised, the result would be that Protestants would send their children to be educated in England under Protestant influences. It was only fair that Catholics should have a University of their own. One of the previous speakers on this subject used a strange argument, which was that while it would be right to tax 30,000,000 English Protestants for a Catholic University in Ireland, it would not be right to tax the 1,000,000 Protestants in Ireland. For his own part, he was convinced that a more satisfactory solution of the question would be arranged in an Irish Parliament than by seeking to settle it in the Imperial Parliament, where the power on one side alone was applied to effect a settlement. In this as in every other question, he believed, the Protestants would find their influence more effectively used in affecting the minds of their fellow-countrymen rather than in seeking to call in extra power to keep the Protestant minority in its position. He himself had no fear but that the question could be satisfactorily settled in an Irish Parliament, and for that reason he would vote for the Chief Secretary's Amendment.

*SIR R. TEMPLE said, this was a question that excited much interest among his constituents in Surrey; and, as an English Member, he felt unable to give a silent vote upon the subject. He was pledged to vote against the application of public money for endowing, establishing, or supporting a Roman Catholic University in Ireland, or anywhere within the British Isles. It was a very delicate as well as interesting question, and in an Assembly like that he thought it was one upon which they had better state their conclusions briefly. After consultation with his constituents, he felt bound to do whatever he could to prevent a Parliament in Dublin, and he was bound to vote for any Amendment which would prevent it. He hoped his hon. Friends of the Roman Catholic religion would allow him to add that he entertained most kindly, most friendly, and most respectful sentiments towards all Roman Catholics, and he hoped they would forgive him for stating in this very plain manner the conclusion at which he had arrived. He had to ask himself whether the Amendment of the Chief Secretary for Ireland was not a sort of compromise; and whether it might not be accepted by Members who took the view he had expressed? The Amendment of the right hon. Gentleman was open to this objection—that it was not quite clear or conclusive what it meant. He imagined that any layman or non-professional man not acquainted with Dublin might easily be misled. But, from the manner in which the Amendment had been received in certain quarters of the House, he apprehended that it would virtually permit an Irish Parliament to vote public money to establish a Roman Catholic University. With that apprehension—he might almost say suspicion—in his mind, he was bound to vote against the Amendment.

MR. J. MORLEY: I did not catch what the suspicion was.

SIR R. TEMPLE said, his apprehension and suspicion was just this—that, under cover of the Amendment, the Parliament in Dublin might vote public money for establishing and supporting a University which would be really and truly a Roman Catholic University.

MR. J. MORLEY: What do you mean by a Roman Catholic University?

SIR R. TEMPLE said, he meant one that was strictly denominational, and would teach exclusively the Roman Catholic religion. There might be certain rules and conditions under which that University might teach other forms of the Christian religion; but he meant a University that would in practice, and in substance and essence, teach exclusively the Roman Catholic form of Christianity. In the presence of distinguished Members of Dublin University he would not say a word regarding that Institution, nor regarding the Maynooth Vote; but he would say a word or two respecting British Universities, which he understood. The doctrine that public funds ought not to be given to a Denominational University applied throughout

Great Britain. No money was given by the British Government to the great Universities of Oxford and Cambridge. With regard to London University, the money granted by that House was fully recouped by the receipt of the fees; and in the case of the Scotch Universities, to which that House voted monies three years ago, they were absolutely un-denominational. So he assured his Roman Catholic friends that he was endeavouring to enforce no view against their Universities that did not apply in other cases. For the reasons he had stated, he was bound to vote against the right hon. Gentleman's Amendment.

MR. CARSON (Dublin University) said, as one of the Members for Dublin University, he could hardly give a silent vote on this question. He hoped the position he took up on the subject would not be considered a bigoted one; it was one which he took up not for the first time, for he had over and over again, publicly and privately, expressed it in reference to University education in Ireland. He would be sorry to put forward any proposition which might, in the slightest degree, be construed as a desire upon his part to withhold from his Roman Catholic brethren in Ireland any of the advantages which he, as a Protestant, himself enjoyed; it would certainly be his wish, so far as this question was concerned, that Roman Catholics in Ireland—among whom he had many relatives himself—should have exactly the same benefits in reference to University education that Protestants had. He hoped this discussion might be of some use in tending to bring together men of both religions, and to enable them to arrive at a common understanding as regarded the settlement of this University Question. But his first allegiance must be to his own University and constituency, and he would say this—that while he was prepared in the very fullest degree to concede to others of a different faith such advantages as Protestants derived from Trinity College, Dublin, he was not prepared to concede anything more. He certainly thought it was a strong proposition to put forward that the House, having refused to accept from the powers of the Irish Legislature any dealing with Trinity College, Dublin, they should now be asked to concede, in addition to that power given to the Irish Legislature, the power of setting up a Roman Catholic University in Ireland out of public funds. If the Chief Secretary's Amendment were accepted, the right hon. Gentleman should now make the concession that Trinity College should, in terms, be excepted from the powers of the Irish Parliament. He must say he did not consider that the University of Dublin stood at the present moment upon an entirely satisfactory basis. Some misapprehension had arisen in the minds of hon. Members as to what the exact constitution of Trinity College was at the present time. With the exception of the Theological School, every Professorship and office was open to members of any religion, and that, so far as it went, was, he thought, entirely satisfactory. He was prepared to admit that Roman Catholics had not entered in sufficient numbers to give them a fair proportion in the government of Trinity College; but he might mention that last year, or the year before, one body in the College that they were very proud of—their first eleven at cricket—was composed of nine Roman Catholics as against two Protestants. The Fellowships were open, and the Board was elected simply and solely by seniority; and if there were a sufficient number of Roman Catholics winning Fellowships, in the course of time the Board of Trinity College would necessarily become largely constituted of members of their religion. There was in connection with Trinity College a Chair of Theology; there was this Divinity School which supplied clergy to the disestablished and disendowed Church in Ireland; and if the Board of Trinity College was to become largely constituted of Roman Catholic members, it would be an entirely unsatisfactory, if not an entirely unworkable, Board. When they considered that they had the entire regulation of the Divinity School, which dealt with only one particular religion, and having regard to the fact that the Board of Trinity College was entirely open to any religion—just as Protestants were elected not on account of religion but simply and solely in consequence of seniority as Fellows—he did not think anyone would say that was an entirely satisfactory state of things to exist in a Board which might become at any moment the guardians of a Divinity

School which dealt with only one religion—that of the Disestablished Church in Ireland. If they were going to make the concession to the Irish Legislature that they could establish a University which would be more acceptable than Trinity College had been to the Roman Catholic religion in Ireland, surely they ought to except the University of Dublin—which stood in the ambiguous position of having a Board which might become Catholic and which dealt with a Protestant Divinity School—from the power of the Irish Legislature, which would be largely composed of Catholics. While they conceded to the Irish Legislature the power of establishing such University as they thought proper to meet the wants of University education in Ireland, they ought to secure immunity to Trinity College, and leave it under the control of the Imperial Parliament. If Trinity College were excepted from the Irish Legislature, for his part he was not prepared in the slightest degree to oppose a most liberal settlement of this question, and he thought it would be a great advantage to Ireland—whether Home Rule passed or not—that they should come to a common understanding on this question, which he looked upon as one of the most vital questions which had for many years divided the people of Ireland on the subject of education. The Amendment proposed by the Chief Secretary was in one view, he thought, entirely satisfactory. At the same time, it was well the Amendment should be understood. He did not entirely understand it, and he would say why. The manner in which it was framed simply put the question of the tests under the University of Dublin Act, 1873. The tests under that Act were framed in a very peculiar way, and they had to be framed in that peculiar way in consequence of the pertinence of that Divinity School to Trinity College. Of course, it was quite apparent that so long as they had Professors connected with the University of Dublin who would have to teach in these Theological Schools belonging to one religion only, to abolish the tests in relation to these Professorships would create an absurdity. So that this Act made an exception in relation to the Divinity School, and provided that one matter was to stay as it was; and whilst this one test was to continue in existence in relation to all other offices, the matter was to be thrown perfectly open. He did not know, from the way in which the Amendment had been framed, whether it was intended that Theological Schools should be established in the new University. That was a matter upon which they should come to a perfect understanding. For his part—and he knew he did not at all speak the views either of his Colleagues or other Members on that Bench—he had no objection to these Theological Schools, because he really would wish to face this education question—whether primary or University—according to the views that were held by the great body of Roman Catholics in Ireland, and he had long thought it was a fatal mistake upon the part of those who had to do with legislation in Ireland that they should lay down broad theories which, good in principle, for years and years the Irish Roman Catholics had declared they were not prepared to accept. It was really a foolish thing, in his opinion, to go on, year after year, leaving open these bitter controversies as between Parties in Ireland, where, in fact, they were settling nothing, but giving large sums from the State in Ireland, but really were not conceding what were the wishes of the great majority of the people in that country. He dared say he had many constituents who would differ from him, but during his election contest he never hesitated to put forward the views which he put forward now. Speaking for himself, he did not see any objection to a University which had no tests—just as they had no tests in Trinity College—having, at the same time, a Theological Chair, which would help to educate clergy for a Church to which he did not belong. It was well that this matter should be rendered clear in that House. He bound no one by his opinions. He did not know what the opinion of the bulk of his constituents might be, but he regarded this matter of such essential importance that he felt it his duty to express what he felt upon the subject. His views were exactly as he had stated, and he had no objection to these being set up as kindred to the University of Dublin such a University as would give an exactly similar system to the religion of the majority in Ireland in relation to this matter. Then came this question. They had enacted in the 1st and 2nd sub-sections certain restrictions and disabilities on account of religious belief. If they passed the Amendment of the Chief Secretary he did not know how these restrictions were to work upon that Amendment, and certainly if they were to come to a settlement at all he thought it ought to be a settlement which could not afterwards be in any way repudiated by either side. They ought to have an understanding as to how far they were prepared to go, and his vote would be exactly in accordance with the opinions to which he had given expression. He greatly deplored this Home Rule discussion; but long and protracted as that Home Rule discussion had been, and bitter as it had been, it would not have been fruitless if they had come within measurable distance of making in a statesmanlike, liberal, real, and genuine way, one attempt, at least, to settle this question of Irish University education on a broad and generous principle.

MR. DILLON (Mayo, E.): Before the Deputy Speaker puts the Question, I should like the Chief Secretary to state how he proposes to proceed. He will notice there are two ways of dealing with this subject. One would be of moving an Amendment to the Amendment on the Paper, and the other would be for the Government to defeat the Amendment on the Paper and put down their Amendment as an Amendment to the clause. I think before the Amendment is put the House should know which course the Government propose to take. I do not wish to occupy the time of the House, but I would wish to say this: that the speech we have just listened to from the hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for Dublin University (Mr. Carson) is, to my mind, one of the most remarkable and interesting we have heard in the House for a long time. I must say I think it will afford grounds, even in the minds of Conservative Members who sit behind the hon. and learned Gentleman, for believing that the Irish Parliament might not be such a scene of disorder as they think. Here is a question that for 25 years has been constantly before this House, an Irish question which has upset more than one Government, and which this House for 25 years has not even endeavoured to settle so as to satisfy the people of Ireland, and we have now in the course of a discussion on Home Rule a gentleman who represents a Protestant constituency—I might almost say an Orange constituency—at all events a strongly Unionist constituency—standing up and delivering a speech which shows that he and we, if we were shut up in a room upstairs, or, better still, in a room in Ireland, would in the course of a few hours amicably and without difficulty arrange this question which the House of Commons for 25 years has failed to settle. I very much doubt whether, in the whole course of these Debates on Home Rule which have occupied this House for many months, a stronger speech in favour of Home Rule for Ireland has been delivered than the speech of the hon. and learned Member for the University of Dublin. I think that after the speech to which we have just listened the course would be for the Government to move the Amendments which are suggested by them, and settle this matter without committing the House to a second and, perhaps, a longer discussion on this subject, which has been fully debated. Because, if the Government adopt the other course, this inconvenience might arise—that when the Amendment of the Government comes up the whole of this subject might be debated at great length again by Members who did not take the trouble to be in the House when the present Debate was going on. I therefore would ask that before you put the Question the Government would declare the course they would adopt.

MR. J. MORLEY said, he could only speak by the indulgence of the House. In answer to his hon. Friend who had just spoken, his own notion was that the best course would be for the hon. Member to withdraw his Amendment, and then he (Mr. J. Morley) would move his. He had listened with interest to the very remarkable speech of the hon. Member for Dublin University, with the tone of which no one could complain. Then there was the speech of the hon. Member for South Tyrone, who told them that he had always deprecated the preservation by Trinity College of this Divinity Chair. The hon. and learned Member for Dublin University, of course, did not at all deprecate the maintenance of the Divinity Chair, but he indicated that some objections which might be felt, not by himself but by his constituents to the Amendment, which he (Mr. Morley) sketched out before the dinner Adjournment, might be removed if they included Theological Professorships along with those subjects for which the Irish Parliament might not be allowed to provide funds, except in compliance with certain conditions. His own interpretation upon full consideration of the Bill as it stood was, that by the 1st and 2nd sub-clauses of the 4th clause, that would be guarded against; but, in order that their situation might be perfectly clear, he would move the Amendment in these words—

“Whereby there may be established and endowed out of public funds any Theological Professorship or any University or College in which the conditions set out in the University of Dublin Tests Act, 1873, are not observed.”

What were the conditions set out in that Act? The conditions which were referred to in the Amendment he had indicated were—that access to education in the Institution should be open to all without compulsion as to any given religious instruction or to pass theological examinations. The conditions of that Act were that it was not to be an indispensable condition of holding a Fellowship or of earning other prizes provided out of public funds that there should be any subscription to any article or formula of faith; any declaration or oath as to religious belief or profession; nor any act in connection with any form of public worship; nor any compulsion on anybody elected to a Fellowship or other office to be ordained in Holy Orders. He did not think that the provisions in the language he had used in the Amendment would be disagreeable or inconvenient to any of those whose views and aims it was the declared object of all to meet. His Amendment, of course, did not preclude the endowment of Theological Professorships out of funds other than public funds. He thought that the agreement that had been arrived at constituted a very remarkable advance in the troubled controversy with regard to Irish University education, and he agreed with the remark of the hon. Member for East Mayo that that agreement was remarkable as an indication of the spirit in which that troubled Irish Question might have been discussed by fair men whether sitting on these or those Benches, or meeting altogether with a desire to work out the regeneration of their own country.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR said, that, as the technical Mover of the Amendment, perhaps he might be allowed to say that he still preferred that the matter should have been left to the Imperial Parliament to deal with. In those circumstances, he would not withdraw his Amendment, but he should not ask the House to go to a Division upon it.

Question put, and negatived.

MR. J. MORLEY then moved the following Amendment:—

“Whereby there may be established and endowed out of public funds any Theological Professorship or any University or College in which the conditions set out in the Dublin University Tests Act, 1873, are not observed.”

MR. SEXTON said, it was not easy to arrive at an absolutely conclusive judgment upon an Amendment which depended on the interpretation of a complicated Statute; but having paid close attention to the Debate, and having listened to the speech of the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary in moving the Amendment, and being himself one of those Irishmen—the great majority of Irishmen, as he thought—who desired that, under fair conditions, the Protestants of Ireland should be allowed to maintain their present position with regard to Trinity College, if the fair claims of Catholics were met, and recognising in the Amendment of the Chief Secretary a valuable and memorable attempt in that direction, he felt entitled to support the Amendment.

*MR. D. PLUNKET : I desire to say one word on this subject in order to explain the course I intend to adopt. The hon. Member for North Kerry has said it is not easy for him to form an exact opinion as to what may be the ultimate effect of the Amendment suggested by the Chief Secretary. I should think, if any person has had any early information upon this subject, it is much more likely to be the hon. Member for Kerry than anybody else. So far as I am concerned, it comes upon me for the first time, and I must say I am not prepared to give my assent to this Amendment in the form in which it is now submitted to the House, not having had sufficient time to consider it. As far, however, as I understand, it is to give to the Irish Parliament the power, if they should so think fit, to establish and endow as a recognised University in Ireland any College—we will say, for example, the existing Roman Catholic College in Stephen's Green, on one condition only—namely, that that University should in that case supply the funds for its own Divinity Professors.

MR. J. MORLEY : There is a Conscience Clause. It should be open to all students without tests.

*MR. PLUNKET : I assumed that was the intention of the right hon. Gentleman. The view I take of it, quite apart from any consequences that might follow from the adoption of the clause, which, as I say, I have not had time to consider, and to which I am not now prepared to give any general assent, is this—that a broad line being drawn between the University of Dublin and other Institutions in Ireland, because it is said it is mainly a Protestant Institution connected with the minority of the people in Ireland, and those other Institutions in Ireland which it is intended to benefit by this clause and to give advantages to if a Home Rule Parliament should ever be established, there appears to me this palpable injustice. You propose to give over to the Irish Legislature not only the control and direction of the College which is assumed to represent the interests of the majority of the people, and of that class of people who will have an overwhelming preponderance to do practically as they like upon subjects such as this in the Irish Legislature of the future, but you refuse the same privilege to us, the minority, whose College you set apart and tell us it is not a National University because it is confined practically to the minority of the population. You refuse us our request which we made to you on the Committee stage of this Bill, that that College should be left under the care and protection of the Imperial Parliament. I say this is not fair treatment, and I, for one, cannot under these circumstances assent to the proposed Amendment.

Amendment agreed to.

MR. CARSON said, he wished as a corollary to the Amendment just now accepted to move the following Amendment:—

"Or affecting the constitution, endowments, or management of Trinity College, or the University of Dublin."

He said that an Amendment of a similar character was debated and rejected in Committee, but at that time they had had no specific assurance from the Government or the Prime Minister, such as was eventually given, as to what would be the position of the Irish Legislature in relation to the establishment of any University. They had now had an Amendment giving permission to the Irish Legislature to establish another University in Ireland. Hon. Members below the Gangway having got that power—to set up a University in accordance with the sentiments of the people whom they represented—they were entitled to ask, he thought, that the University of Dublin should be left to be dealt with by the Imperial Parliament and according to the sentiments of those by whom that University had hitherto been governed. Fair play demanded this, and they asked that the Bill should contain some expression to this effect. He felt almost certain that hon. Members below the Gangway would acknowledge that they had a complaint if this were not done, and thought he might appeal to them, after what had happened, to support the Amendment which he ventured to move.

Amendment proposed, after the foregoing Amendment, to insert as a new sub-section, the words—

"Or (4) Affecting the constitution, endowments, or management of Trinity College, or the University of Dublin."—(Mr. Carson.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

MR. T. M. HEALY (Louth, N.) said, he would like to ask whether the protection demanded was not already provided in Sub-section 6, whereby the Irish Legislature was prohibited from making any law affecting an existing Corporation and depriving such Corporation of its rights, privileges, or property? Did that not apply to Trinity College?

MR. CARSON said, he might be allowed to answer the question. In his opinion, Sub-section 6 did not cover the point. By an Address from the two Houses of the Irish Legislature, with the consent of Her Majesty, Trinity College might be dealt with. To his mind, this was not so satisfactory as being dealt with by the two Houses of the Imperial Parliament. He thought in a matter of this kind they might be met by hon. Members. He asked that Trinity College should be reserved for treatment by the Imperial Parliament, and, after the Amendment which had been adopted, the request was not an unreasonable one.

Mr. Carson

MR. T. M. HEALY said, that this was a very fair answer; where was the University which had been promised to the Nationalists? Hon. Members had given them "a Castle in Spain," and therefore the concession was of little value, especially in view of the fact that the House of Lords was going to reject the Bill. They thanked the hon. Member for the consideration he had shown, and they recognised the spirit he had displayed that evening, and he would be glad if he could show that there was any substantial concession. They must look at the clause historically, and remember what took place in 1886. The hon. and learned Member had made an offer; he (Mr. Healy) would make another. If it was contended that Sub-section 6 was no protection to Trinity College, and another clause was to be inserted, then he submitted that the sub-section ought to be struck out. If the hon. and learned Member for the University of Dublin wanted his Amendment accepted it would be a fair exchange to knock out Sub-section 6; or, if the Amendment of the hon. Member for Harrow were substituted for that sub-section, he should be very glad to yield to the contention of the hon. and learned Member for Dublin University.

*MR. PLUNKET: I think, Sir, we have had a very fair illustration of the union of hearts which was boasted of as the immediate result of the generous speech of my Colleague. All the concessions have been on one side; and when we want to get something in return we are put off with everything except what we want. If the Irish Parliament is to get control over and have the care and protection of this new College—which is to be the University of the Catholic population of Ireland—are not the minority entitled to protection? The majority will have absolute power in the Irish Legislature, and they will be bound to use it. I claim again what I have claimed before—that Dublin University should remain under the protection of the Imperial Parliament, and I claim it all the more on account of the way in which the concession which my hon. and learned Colleague has urged the House to accept has been received by those on whose behalf it was put forward.

MR. J. MORLEY: I think the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Plunket) has put a misconstruction upon what fell from my hon. Friend the Member for Louth; and I think the union of hearts would be established if Parties could deal with questions of this character as they have been dealt with to-night. We have had shown a rational desire to arrive at a conclusion which would be agreeable to all Parties in Ireland. I can find no fault with the spirit of the speech in which the hon. and learned Member introduced his Amendment. With the spirit of his Motion we agree. But we maintain that Trinity College is amply protected by the 6th sub-section of Clause 4. Trinity College may have Land and Railway Stocks——

MR. CARSON: That does not come within the Amendment. The general law would not be interfered with.

MR. J. MORLEY: We contend that Trinity College is amply protected under Sub-section 6 of the 4th clause. It may consent to be deprived of its property, but that is not likely. There may be an Address from the two Houses of the Irish Legislature on the leave of Her Majesty, which means, in effect, a Secretary of State. Can the hon. and learned Gentleman suppose that in the condition of Parties in this Parliament any of those iniquitous and confiscatory laws against Trinity College which this Amendment is intended to avert are ever likely to be carried?

MR. CARSON: I can.

MR. J. MORLEY: The hon. and learned Member is not long a Member of this House—neither am I. We are not very experienced in the House, perhaps; but I would appeal to the late Chancellor of the Exchequer (Mr. Goschen) whether he can imagine a state of things in which a Secretary of State would be likely to advise Her Majesty to consent to the plunder and robbery of the property of Trinity College? I confess I cannot.

MR. GOSCHEN (St. George's, Hanover Square): Those who would plunder a Church would plunder a University.

MR. T. M. HEALY: You did it in 1869. You were a Member of the Cabinet in 1869.

MR. J. MORLEY: I ask my right hon. Friend was he not a Member of the Government of that day?

MR. T. M. HEALY: A white sheet?

MR. GOSCHEN: I do not admit that we plundered the Irish Church.

MR. J. MORLEY: I submit that the interruption of my right hon. Friend is one of the most futile and irrelevant interruptions that I have ever heard. I asked my right hon. Friend, with his large Parliamentary and official experience, whether he could contemplate such a state of Parties in this House that a Secretary of State would advise Her Majesty to acquiesce in the plunder of Trinity College. And my right hon. Friend said that those who would plunder a Church would plunder a University. He plundered the Church—so far as Ireland is concerned. Well, Sir, I cannot conceive that the hon. and learned Member believes such a result as the plundering of Trinity College would take place. I hope he has not forgotten what has been said by my hon. Friend the Member for North Kerry (Mr. Sexton)—that there is no desire, as there is no danger, of plunder in this case.

MR. GOSCHEN: I am not afraid to meet the challenge of the right hon. Gentleman. I said that those who would plunder the Church would plunder a University, and the right hon. Gentleman assumed I was referring to the Irish Church. I did not say that or anything like it. He misinterpreted. He did not conceive the idea I had in my mind.

MR. MAC NEILL (Donegal, S.): You did it.

MR. DEPUTY SPEAKER: Order, order!

MR. GOSCHEN: These interruptions only prolong the proceedings. I believe that the present Government and their supporters would be perfectly prepared to direct the revenue of many ancient Institutions. [Cries of "You did it!" from the Irish Members.] It is not a question of what I have done. I do not use the word "plunder," but the word "diverting." [Renewed cries of "You did it!"]

MR. DEPUTY SPEAKER: Order!

MR. GOSCHEN: The question is whether there is danger that the revenues of Trinity College will be tampered with, and I believe there are a large number of hon. Members opposite who regard that contingency as perfectly possible—[Laughter and cries of "Hear, hear!"]*—*and that it would be in accord with what has been already done in regard to ancient foundations. [Interruption.] At all events, there is nothing ridiculous in the statement. [Further interruption.] I think it is discourteous to interrupt—

MR. BARTLEY (Islington, N.) rose to call the attention of Mr. Deputy Speaker to a remark of an hon. Member below the Gangway near him. It was a very offensive remark, and he hoped they would be protected from those interruptions.

MR. DEPUTY SPEAKER: I hope there will be no further interruptions. It is most desirable that hon. Members should abstain from interrupting.

MR. GOSCHEN: The question is whether it is possible that that could happen. The right hon. Gentleman says that no Party could find a Secretary of State who would venture to advise Her Majesty to do this: but if a Commission were appointed—we know what opinion prevails among advanced Radicals—if a Commission were appointed and reported upon the question, does the right hon. Gentleman regard that as impossible? I do not say it is probable, but it is possible, and I think the case is one in which precautions should be taken. I do not think it is so entirely remote that the Chief Secretary should refer to it as he has done.

MR. DILLON (Mayo, E.) said, the right hon. Gentleman the senior Member for Dublin University (Mr. Plunket) was under some misapprehension as to the remarks of the hon. and learned Member for Louth, in reply to his colleague in the representation of the University. Speaking for himself, he (Mr. Dillon) had no desire to resist any guarantees which would convey to the Representatives of Trinity College the most perfect sense of security against any action by the Irish Parliament to interfere with the privileges or the revenues of that Institution. He would suggest that Sub-section 6 of Clause 4 should be withdrawn, and that any Institution in Ireland which it was desirable to protect should be named in the Bill—Trinity College, and the Belfast Queen's College, if the hon. and learned Member wished. That would be better, he thought, than—and he would himself prefer it—the vague sub-section as it stood. The hon. and learned Gentleman (Mr. Carson) had been very reasonable, and he, for his part, would be pleased to meet his view as far as he could. In that he might hope that he spoke for those around him; but, at all events, he was personally willing to do as he had suggested.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR (Manchester, E.): The hon. Member who has just sat down has taken the opportunity, as I understood him, of suggesting a bargain. He suggests that the sub-section we are discussing should be withdrawn, and that we should name Trinity College—

MR. DILLON said, the right hon. Gentleman misunderstood him. He suggested that they should drop out Sub-section 6 altogether, and then let them devise a section which would give satisfactory protection to Trinity College and the Belfast Queen's College. They said that this sub-section gave complete protection. It was said by the hon. and learned Gentleman that it did not, and he said they should now provide a section which would be satisfactory to Trinity College; and, to prepare the way for that, he would have them withdraw the present sub-section.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: Very well; I accept the explanation. I did not know that that was the hon. Gentleman's meaning. Then the hon. Gentleman says he would give protection to those two Institutions, and that all—

MR. DILLON: I spoke only for myself—with regard to protecting Trinity College and Belfast College.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: Then all other Institutions are to be deprived of protection?

Mr. Goschen

MR. T. M. HEALY: What are they?

Another hon. MEMBER: We want to know what they are?

MR. DILLON: There are only two mentioned in the Bill.

MR. T. M. HEALY: What are they?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: Hon. Members ask, what are they? I should like to know what the Royal College of Physicians would think of that? It is a proposal to which I cannot give my assent. This is the conclusion of a series of Amendments, in which we have debated the position in which the new Home Rule Parliament will stand towards education in Ireland. As the House knows, the proposal is to leave the question as it is now—in the case of the Imperial Parliament. I still adhere to that. I hold that we are bound to take care that Trinity College shall not be subject to any possible action on the part of the new Irish Government. Trinity College should be left entirely in the hands of the British Minister.

MR. J. MORLEY: The British Parliament.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: It is the same—the British Minister would be subject to the British Parliament. We are entitled to say that Trinity College shall be subject to this Parliament, and not to the new Irish Government. I do not want to go into the question of Subsection 6, except to say that by the Amendment we have passed we give to hon. Members the power to set up a Catholic Institution. We are bound to go a step further. Is it not likely that those who have the control of a rival Institution should use that power for the purpose of injuring a rival Institution? Beyond the Roman Catholic hierarchy there will be a force capable of destroying the older Institution; and what security have we that this force will not be used? I venture to suggest that there can be no objection to the Amendment. The hon. Member who has just sat down has declared that he has no objection to it. He said he spoke for himself; but I suppose, to a certain extent, in what he said he represented the gentlemen sitting around him. At all events, I suppose they have no objection to the principle of the Amendment. Well, if he has no objection, why should the Government wish to go beyond that—why should they have any objection? What possible motive can they have in refusing what hon. Members from Ireland accept? Hon. Members from Ireland admit that this can be done. I confess I cannot understand the attitude of the Government. I do not know how it is that they feel themselves obliged to resist the Amendment, and I hope that even at the eleventh hour they may find it in their power to accept the Amendment, and so help towards the settlement of a question which is a source of great difficulty in Ireland.

MR. SEXTON (Kerry, N.) said, he ventured to say that they had been somewhat unfairly treated in respect of this Amendment. The senior Member for Trinity College suggested that some concession had been made to them, and that they made no concession in return, and that by way of return they were bound to accept the Amendment now before them. He (Mr. Sexton) denied that account altogether. The transaction relating to the last Amendment was not merely a concession from one side. He thought those concerned with Trinity College had received as much as they gave. If the promise upon the question of a future University had not been made at the instance of the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary for Ireland, there was no doubt that Trinity College would continue to be the subject of attack from the Catholics of Ireland. There was no doubt that the Catholics of Ireland would never rest content so long as their right to a University corresponding to Trinity College was denied. If the junior Member for Trinity College had not made his statesmanlike speech, a speech distinguished by a very creditable spirit, the compromise might possibly have been refused, or would have been carried only upon a Division. The result, however, secured was that Trinity College was now safe. No candid man of any creed in Ireland would deny that upon the establishment of a Catholic University the future of Trinity College would be absolutely safe, and that no man in Ireland would think of making or suggesting any attack upon its endowments or privileges, or upon the management of its property. He claimed that the hon. Gentleman, who had conducted his case with skill, had gained so much for Trinity College as would, if he never made another speech, shed lustre upon his representation of Trinity College, and would entitle him to the eternal gratitude of that Corporation. He agreed with his hon. Friends that Sub-section 6 was most objectionable. It shut out many Institutions and Corporations, of which no list was given.

MR. T. M. HEALY: The Toll Bridge at Waterford.

MR. SEXTON said, yes; there was a Toll Bridge at Waterford, and the Irish Legislature would be obliged to leave that wooden bridge there for ever. He feared that there was a great variety of Institutions in Ireland which by virtue of Charters and local general Acts would come within the clause. He thought it would be offensive to the Catholics of Ireland, and he believed that in a little time after the passing of the Act it would become offensive to the feelings of the graduates and of many Protestants in Ireland that Trinity College should be singled out to be protected by the Imperial Parliament. He considered that Trinity College was absolutely protected by the Bill. They could not touch the College unless they got the consent of the College itself, or else upon an Address from the two Houses. Well, one of the Houses would be elected by the 170,000 electors of a valuation of £20 and upwards. It was claimed by the hon. Member for Armagh that the Unionists possessed not only the intelligence but the wealth of Ireland, and surely if that were so the Second Chamber must be, by a great majority, Protestant.

MR. COURTNEY (Cornwall, Bodmin) said, he thought they were a little out of Order in discussing Sub-section 6. As one who had urged in Committee that Trinity College should be reserved under the protection of the Imperial Parliament, he thought the Amendment just adopted on the Motion of the Chief Secretary had made a very considerable difference in the situation. Trinity College could not now be regarded as that exclusively Protestant establishment which it was described by hon. Gentlemen opposite. It had, no doubt, got a great history as a Protestant Institution. It had Protestant Chairs, and the greater part of its present Governing Body was Protestant. But they had heard now that under the Act of 1873 all the prizes and all the educational advantages and benefits of the foundation were open freely to all students, and more than one Roman Catholic had become a member of the supreme Governing Body. So that it was quite open to the Roman Catholics of Ireland to enter upon a contest for Trinity College, and after a time to capture the College. That, at all events, was the Constitutional situation of the College, and that undoubtedly left the College in a very perilous condition if the new Legislature were quite free to deal with the whole matter. But under the present proposition Trinity College would be pretty well protected. The University that might be set up would be a University having its origin in Catholic energy, and to a large extent endowed through Catholic munificence; but it must be, in all essentials, an open University; its prizes must be open to everyone, and its Governing Body open to everyone. That being the case, it would be rather overstraining the matter to attempt to push the Amendment further.

*MR. GERALD BALFOUR (Leeds, Central) said, he would like to remind the House of the fact that in Committee the hon. Member for North Kerry declared that Trinity College was quite safe, but to-night he said that if this Amendment had not been accepted a determined attack on the privileges of endowments of Trinity College would necessarily have ensued.

MR. SEXTON said, the hon. Member had not quoted him correctly. What he intended to convey was that if justice were conceded to Catholic claims Trinity College would be absolutely safe.

*MR. GERALD BALFOUR did not think the purport of the hon. Member's words corresponded to what he now said. This cast a most lurid light on the position of Trinity College, Dublin. Surely the College could not be sufficiently protected under Sub-section 6 of Clause 4 if, in the absence of the Amendment just accepted, a determined attack on the privileges of Trinity College must necessarily have ensued. The Chief Secretary objected to the present Amendment because, if accepted, it would make it impossible for the Irish Parliament to deal with land or railways if Trinity College held property either in land or in railways. A more miserable, wretched, quibbling argument had not been used in the whole course of these Debates. He would do the Chief Secretary the justice of believing that this was not the mintage of the right hon. Gentleman's own mind. A lawyer's hand must have been at work here. Perhaps the hon. and learned Attorney General—

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir C. RUSSELL, Hackney, S.) said, that was not so. His right hon. Friend had used words to that effect, but he withdrew them at his (Sir C. Russell's) suggestion.

MR. GERALD BALFOUR said, he apologised to the Attorney General, and was sorry for the Chief Secretary. The right hon. Gentleman said his object was to protect Trinity College, Dublin. It was clear from what had been said by the hon. Member for North Kerry that Trinity College would not be adequately protected unless this proposal was agreed to; and if the Government were not prepared to accept the Amendment, it would only be one more proof of their subservience to hon. Gentlemen below the Gangway.

MR. BARTLEY (Islington, N.) said, it seemed to be imagined that the Member for North Kerry was entitled to lay down the law upon this question; but the position had changed. When, however, a desire was expressed to protect Trinity College, Dublin, another bargain was struck and an attempt was made to get rid of all the exceptions laid down in the sub-section. It certainly seemed an extraordinary way of promoting harmony in that Assembly to put forward fresh demands whenever a concession was made. If the Protestants of Ireland chose to make use of the new University there was no reason why it should not be as much a Protestant University as Trinity College, which was not a Protestant University but was open to all denominations. If this were the case, however, the Irish Members would find that they had been deceived. He thought it must be acknowledged that the whole condition of University teaching in Ireland was in a somewhat chaotic state, and it would be well to recognise that the Irish Legislature should have the right to establish a Catholic University if it pleased.

*MR. T. W. RUSSELL (Tyrone, S.) said, the demand of Catholics in the past in this matter had been for equality, and, to listen to the hon. Member for North Kerry, one would have supposed that that demand had been conceded. All that had been conceded by the Chief Secretary's Amendment was equality in principle, and the House might depend upon it that the astute gentlemen who managed these affairs in Ireland would demand equality in endowment as well as equality in principle. Trinity College was a very wealthy Body. If the demand for equality were made where was the money to come from wherewith to meet it? Certainly the bankrupt Irish Legislature, as it had been described by the Nationalist Members, could not supply it, and he foresaw an agitation springing up in Ireland in favour of getting a share of the revenues of Trinity College for the purpose of endowing a Catholic University.

Question put.

The House divided :—Ayes 99 ; Noes 144.—(Division List, No. 275.)

MR. J. MORLEY : Mr. Deputy Speaker, I beg to move the Amendment which stands in my name. We have had a considerable amount of discussion upon it in connection with the Amendment of my hon. Friend the Member for Somersetshire (Mr. H. Hobhouse), and I do not know that at this stage I need do more than formally move it.

Amendment proposed,

In page 3, line 7, after Sub-section (4) to insert as a new sub-section the words—

“(5) Imposing any disability, or conferring any privilege, benefit, or advantage upon any subject of the Crown on account of his parentage or place of birth, or of the place where any part of his business is carried on, or upon any Corporation or Institution constituted or existing by virtue of the law of some part of the Queen's dominions and carrying on operations in Ireland, on account of the persons by whom or in whose favour or the place in which any of its operations are carried on; or.”
—(Mr. J. Morley.)

Question proposed, “That those words be there inserted.”

MR. J. CHAMBERLAIN (Birmingham, W.) : I must say that I was surprised at the very few words in which my right hon. Friend introduced this Amendment. He says that on the Amendment of my hon. Friend (Mr. H. Hobhouse) there was considerable discussion. What does he call discussion? There was a good deal of representation made by those who have been in communication with the Government in this matter, but there was absolutely not a single word of reply. This Debate has been carried on up to the present time in the most conciliatory spirit, both by the Government and by those who are generally opposed to them——

MR. J. MORLEY: May I interrupt my right hon. Friend? I thought there was no objection to the Amendment.

MR. J. CHAMBERLAIN: I really do not want to repeat anything I have said before — [Ministerial ironical cheers]—but I will do so at once if it is the desire of hon. Gentlemen who interrupt me. I may say, however, that I think I have already shown conclusively that the Amendment proposed by the Government does not fulfil the pledge given by the Prime Minister. I really must appeal to the honour of the Government. In matters of this kind there always is a very strict feeling of honour which induces a Government to act not only in the spirit, but according to the letter of any pledge or promise given; and I fully admit that, as far as we have gone, that has been the spirit in which my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister and his colleagues have conducted these discussions. I say that the Amendment of the Government does not deal in the slightest degree with indirect preference. The Prime Minister, when dealing with the subject, said there ought to be means of bringing under consideration the question whether indirect preference had been committed or not. Are the Government willing to accept from me an Amendment for the insertion of the words “directly or indirectly”? That would cover the pledge with regard to indirect preference given by my right hon. Friend. All I claim is a fulfilment of that pledge. I am obliged to ask the Government whether they intend to fulfil it. If they do not we have no means of forcing their hands; but in that case I must say there is an end of anything like agreements, even when they are made in the face of the House. My second point is this: My right hon. Friend the Prime Minister admitted that it should be the object of the Government to prevent anything in the nature of preference. He did not limit it to preference on account of birth, or parentage, or place of business, but spoke of any kind of unfair and illegitimate preference. That was the distinct understanding, and I pointed out in a speech which occupied some little while that there were numerous cases—and I gave illustrations of each class of case—in which the Amendment of the Government would not deal with preferences. I am satisfied with it as far as it goes if the words “directly or indirectly” be inserted, except that I say it does not go far enough or cover the understanding entered into by the Prime Minister.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir C. RUSSELL, Hackney, S.): I must remind the House of the history of the proposed Amendment of my right hon. Friend. A suggestion was made when a discussion was taking place on the question of preference on religious grounds——

MR. J. CHAMBERLAIN: I beg pardon for interrupting. In order to make the matter clear I will move to amend the Amendment by inserting the words “directly or indirectly.”

Amendment proposed to the proposed Amendment, to insert at the beginning the words “Directly or indirectly.”—(Mr. J. Chamberlain.)

Question proposed, “That those words be there inserted.”

*SIR C. RUSSELL: During the discussion on religious preference my right hon. Friend suggested that the clause ought to be extended so as to cover preference of any kind. The House will recollect that a very extravagant illustration was given in support of that contention. It was said that some attempt might be made by the Irish Legislative Body to saddle Belfast with some responsibility which did not belong to it. Then there came a further suggestion from my right hon. Friend the Member for Great Grimsby (Mr. Heneage). He said that many of his constituents, being fishermen, occasionally resorted to the Irish coasts, and he desired that they should be secured against any disability which did not apply equally to all persons in Ireland following the same calling. I think I have correctly sketched the argument put forward. We have, as we conceive, met that argument by the clause at it stands, because we believe the effect of the clause will be to put all the Queen's subjects upon the same platform of equality in this matter. No one is to be prejudiced on account of his parentage or place of birth, or of the place where any part of his occupation is carried on, and no Corporation or Institution is to be prejudiced on account of the persons by whom or in whose favour or the place in which any of its operations are carried on. I confess I am not able, as clearly as my right hon. Friend seems to think I ought to be, to see the way in which this Amendment fails to fulfil the contract entered into by the Government, with one exception. My right hon. Friend (Mr. J. Chamberlain) says the Prime Minister undertook to deal with indirect as well as direct preference. I think that the addition of the words "directly or indirectly" would not add any strength to the sub-section at all. At the same time, rather than have any difficulty about it, we are disposed to accept the Amendment. We had a long and interesting discussion on the Amendment of my hon. Friend the Member for Somersetshire (Mr. H. Hobhouse), and he gave us a number of illustrations of what might be done in relation to trade, agriculture, and so forth. The Government have never admitted, and do not desire now to admit, that they wish to tie the hands of the Irish Legislature so as to prevent them doing what they think right for the fair and just encouragement of the improvement of agriculture, and of the manufacture of butter, and so on. I do not think their hands will be so tied under this Bill. The notion that they will interfere with the butter and cheese industry of Great Britain does not seem to me to have much weight. I cannot think that any attempt that may be made to encourage Irish industry will be fraught with the danger to the English manufacturer which some hon. Members think. The Amendment of the hon. Member for Somersetshire is a very ungenerously, framed Amendment. I do not think the great industries of England are likely to suffer at all under an Irish Legislature, for all I am sure that would be done would be to give assistance for the improvement of agriculture and for the development of other kinds of industries.

MR. JESSE COLLINGS (Birmingham, Bordesley) said, that the speech of the Attorney General, coupled with the speech of the hon. Member for North Kerry, informed them exactly where they were—that was to say, there was to be no open preference given on account of parentage or place of birth. Of course, if this preference was to be given at all, it was not likely to be given in an open and direct way. The rejection of the Amendment of his hon. Friend the Member for Somersetshire showed the House plainly that the door was to be left open for all kinds of premiums—that was to say, certain trades were to be fostered out of the Public Purse of Ireland to the detriment of similar trades in England. The hon. Member for the Woodbridge Division (Mr. Everett), in his innocence, had ridden off with the idea that the Amendment proposed by the Chief Secretary would protect the small agricultural manufacturers of Great Britain. The refusal of the Amendment of the hon. Member for Somersetshire showed that such was not the case, or intended to be the case, because that Amendment quite explicitly allowed all sorts of expenditure for the improvement of the industries of Ireland, but barred the giving of premiums for Irish industries when, and only when, they became injurious to the smaller industries in Great Britain. Therefore, they had now proof positive that the Government intended to keep an open door for the Irish Government to vote money to foster those small agricultural industries, which would affect the small agricultural producers of Great Britain rather than the large producers, and particularly affect the butter producer and the cheese producer. The intention of the Government was now quite plain, and there was no protection whatever to be given to the small producers in Great Britain against the unfair and unjust competition by the producers of Ireland. But not content with allowing the Irish Parliament to expend money on premiums for the encouragement of the small agricultural producers of Ireland, to the injury of the small agricultural producers of Great Britain, but the money was actually to be provided by the British taxpayers themselves. It was a monstrous proposition. He regretted the Chancellor of the Exchequer was not present, for perhaps the right hon. Gentleman would be able to inform them how it was he was unable to find money to put down swine fever, and to encourage agricultural training in Great Britain, while he was expected to find money, to the extent, at least, of £500,000 a year—though they said it would be £2,000,000 a year—from the poor producers of Great Britain to enable the producers of Ireland to compete unfairly with themselves! Not content with doing nothing for the small agriculturists of England, to whom they owed their position, the Government were going to increase the fierce competition to which they were already subjected. The Opposition would have a good deal to say about all this in places where the Government could not gag them. This clause would be explained very clearly in the villages of England. The Government had given no reply to the Amendments. Let them give some arguments. If the Government were not permitted by hon. Members from Ireland to accept any Amendment, why did not they say so? The Opposition would then accept that explanation of the inability of the Government to grant them their wishes, and they would know clearly that their suffering industries were being sacrificed to the demands of the masters of the Government on the Irish Benches.

*MR. EVERETT (Suffolk, Woodbridge) said, he formerly enjoyed the advantage of being represented by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Bordesley (Mr. Jesse Collings), and he had always at that time thought him an eminently honest politician; but after his speech that night he began to doubt whether he had rightly appraised the right hon. Gentleman's position in this respect. The right hon. Gentleman had said that the smaller agricultural producers of Ireland would be placed in an advantageous position as compared with the smaller producers of Great Britain. But anyone who read the Amendment of the Chief Secretary must plainly see that that contingency was by it amply provided for. Therefore, if the right hon. Gentleman went to the villages of this country with the argument that the Government were placing the farmers of Great Britain at a disadvantage compared with the small farmers of Ireland, he would go with a distinctly false case.

MR. GOSCHEN: The hon. Member who has just sat down thinks that the attitude of my right hon. Friend the Member for Bordesley (Mr. Jesse Collings) in regard to this Amendment is false. I do not know whether the hon. Member is aware that the hon. Member who sits on his own side for Somersetshire took precisely the same view as was taken by my right hon. Friend the Member for Bordesley. The hon. Member conceived that that was the direct result of the Government's proposal, and he voted accordingly. An hon. Member from Ireland, early in the Debate, made a challenge to English Members. He said that no English Member would get up and say that the Irish Legislature might not give some such preference to Irish farmers, which Ireland, being purely an agricultural country, might fairly claim. "Ireland," said the hon. Member, "is a poor country; England is a rich country"—though he might have added, parenthetically, that it has a very poor agricultural population—"who, then, would object on the part of the English to any preference that might be given to the Irish farmers?" The reply he got was that a Radical Member got up and said he would vote with the Opposition against the preference given by the Government. The hon. Member who has just sat down said it was perfectly right that the Irish should have some preference; that we did not grudge it to them; but that he had been assured by hon. Gentlemen on the Front Bench that everything else was provided for by the Amendment. I should like to know is that true? I should like to know what is the policy of the Government upon this question? Are they, or are they not, of opinion that it would be fair to allow the Irish Government to give some sort of fiscal preference to the great Irish industries? That is a fair question to ask, and there is no reason why the Government should not answer it with perfect frankness. What I complain of is that no one knows the full effect of the right hon. Gentleman's Amendment, nor do we know precisely the policy which underlies it. The policy of the Government, no doubt, is to prevent undue preference being given to Irish industries by the Irish Parliament; but in its present terms the Amendment does not carry out that policy.

MR. J. MORLEY: We have accepted the words of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Birmingham (Mr. J. Chamberlain).

MR. GOSCHEN: Oh, have you?

MR. SEXTON said, the Attorney General had stated that the words of the Amendment added nothing to the strength of the section, and it was, therefore, to be regretted that it was proposed to add it when it would have the effect of increasing the difficulty and uncertainty which the Irish Legislature must feel in the exercise of its functions. The course of legislation in Ireland would necessarily be a course of material reform of legislation upon material concerns. He wished to ask, supposing the Irish Legislature passed a Bill to use the public funds to supply fishermen on the coast of Ireland with better boats and gear, with the means of carrying fish and bringing it to market, or passed a Bill to afford the Irish farmers better instruction in agriculture by the establishment of schools and by giving prizes for the best cultivated farms, or passed a Bill to give prizes for the best conducted dairies with the object of improving the quality of Irish butter and for the purpose of competing with others, be it in England or elsewhere, he wished to ask whether the passing of such Bills would come within the meaning of this Amendment? He should wish to have a picture put before them of some of the acts on the part of the Irish Legislature which would expose them to the action of this clause. He also wished to know what was the meaning of the words "where any part of his business was carried on," also what were the "corporations" and "institutions" which were referred to? He also wished to know what was the meaning of the final words of the clause?

MR. J. MORLEY: I am rather surprised that my hon. Friend the Member for North Kerry has doubts on this question, because I thought we indicated quite clearly, on the Amendment of the learned Member for Somersetshire, that all operations such as he described—the encouragement of fishing, the giving of prizes for the best fishing material, the improvement of dairy management, and all things of that kind, or some of them at least—are included in the work of the Congested Districts Board, and it was admitted by the other side that with those operations no one desired to interfere. The meaning of the phrase "the place in which any of its operations are carried on" is that, as my right hon. Friend the Member for Great Grimsby (Mr. Heneage) demanded, no law should be passed that should place the Grimsby fishermen at a disadvantage as compared with the Kinsale fishermen, or any other Irish fishermen, on account of the place where any part of their business is carried on.

MR. SEXTON: Does it mean locality or all Ireland?

MR. J. MORLEY: It means locality, not all Ireland. The words "corporation or institution" refer to the English and Scotch Insurance Companies which have offices in Belfast and Dublin.

COLONEL NOLAN (Galway, N.) said, he looked with great suspicion on the proposed new clause. There was an idea of protecting the industries of Ireland by preferential duties to be imposed on goods going into the country. Mr. Parnell gave that up in that House, but he got a quid pro quo of £1,400,000 under the Home Rule Bill of 1886. There was no quid pro quo in the present Bill for giving up preferential duties; and as he was afraid the Amendment would prevent them developing their industries in that way, nothing would make him vote for it.

Amendment amended, by inserting, at the beginning, the words "Directly or indirectly."—(Mr. J. Chamberlain.)

Question proposed,

"That the words '(5) Directly or indirectly imposing any disability, or conferring any privilege, benefit, or advantage upon any subject of the Crown on account of his parentage or place of birth, or of the place where any part of his business is carried on, or upon any corporation or institution constituted or existing by virtue of the law of some part of the Queen's dominions and carrying on operations in Ireland, on account of the persons by whom or in whose favour or the place in which any of its operations are carried on; or' be there inserted."

SIR J. GORST (Cambridge University) rose to move, as an Amendment to the proposed new Clause, to insert in line 3, after "birth," the words "or residence." He thought that Amendment was necessary in order to carry out the intention of the Government as expressed by the Attorney General, for otherwise it was clear that disabilities could be placed on some persons by reason of residing in England or Scotland. For instance, it would be possible for the Irish Legislature to pass a law preventing persons residing in England or Scotland from holding certain property in Ireland.

It being Midnight, the Debate stood adjourned.

Debate to be resumed upon Monday next.

WILD BIRDS PROTECTION BILL.

Lords Amendments considered.

Lords Amendment, in page 1, line 10, to leave out the words "except as hereinafter provided," and to insert the words "and 'The Wild Birds Protection Act, 1881,' and those Acts and this Act may be cited together as the Wild Birds Protection Acts, 1880 to 1893," the first Amendment, read a second time.

MR. T. M. HEALY (Louth, N.) complained of the terms in which the Bill had been spoken of in the House of Lords, although it was introduced by a Member of the late Government, and of the remarkable changes it had undergone at their Lordships' hands. The Bill had been made unworkable.

*SIR H. MAXWELL (Wigton) agreed that the Amendments which had been introduced into the Bill in the House of Lords tended to alter its character and make it unworkable. The principal objection he took to the Amendments was that, instead of giving the County Councils power to protect certain species of birds, they only enabled the County Councils to extend the protection to specified areas. He would illustrate the effect of such a provision by a concrete instance. A few years ago an attempt was made to make a raid on the breeding places of the great skua, an interesting species of wild bird, which only frequented a few places in the Highlands of Scotland. If the areas in which the species breed were to be protected under the Bill as amended by the Lords every other species of egg would also have to be protected, and this would involve a great hardship, as the egg harvest was an important industry to the inhabitants. In the same way, if the County Council of Surrey desired to protect the nightingale, by an order prohibiting the taking of nightingale's eggs, they would have to include the eggs of the sparrow hawk and the carrion crow and other mischievous species in the order as well. He must, therefore, ask the House to disagree with the Lords' Amendments.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That this House doth disagree with the Lords in the said Amendment."—
(Sir H. Maxwell.)

VISCOUNT CRANBORNE (Rochester) said, he could not agree with his hon. Friend (Sir H. Maxwell) in this matter. He feared that the power proposed to be given to the County Councils was too extensive; and as his hon. Friend was not inclined to give the Lords' Amendments a more favourable reception, he should object to further proceeding with the Bill.

MR. CONYBEARE (Cornwall, Camborne) rose to Order. He asked was it fair for the noble Lord to get up and make a speech himself, and then preclude others from saying a word on the subject?

MR. DEPUTY SPEAKER: If objection is taken, of course the Bill must go over.

Objection being taken to Further Proceeding, the Debate stood adjourned.

Debate to be resumed upon Monday next.

SHERIFF COURTS CONSIGNATIONS (SCOTLAND) BILL.—(No. 430.)

As amended, considered; to be read the third time upon Monday next.

! House adjourned at ten minutes after Twelve o'clock till Monday next.

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

*Monday, 21st August 1893.PRIVATE BUSINESS.*BLACKROCK AND KINGSTOWN DRAINAGE AND IMPROVEMENT BILL.
[Lords].

THIRD READING.

Order for Third Reading read, and discharged.

THE CHIEF SECRETARY FOR IRELAND (Mr. J. MORLEY, Newcastle-upon-Tyne) said, he begged to move that the Bill be re-committed for the insertion of certain Amendments, which were, through inadvertence, omitted when the Bill was considered on Report.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That the Bill be re-committed to a Committee of the whole House in respect of Clauses 24, 25, 28, 32, 38, 45, 61, 62, 64, 69, 75, 76, 87, 107, and 116, of a New Clause, Fourth and Sixth Schedules, the Preamble, and Title."—
(Mr. J. Morley.)

Question put, and agreed to.

Bill considered in Committee, and reported, with Amendments; as amended, to be considered.

QUESTIONS.*PROMOTION FROM THE RANKS.

MR. HANBURY (Preston): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for War whether the new instructions issued by the War Office, in reference to the Promotion Warrant largely reducing the age at which men who have entered the Army as privates can be promoted to a commission, were intended to be unfavourable to the promotion of the ordinary "ranker," and favourable to the gentleman private, and whether in any case that will be the result; whether the additional new requirement that the candidate for such promotion shall be unmarried is in accordance with the Regulations which sanction the marriage of non-commissioned officers, who would otherwise be eligible for such promotion; and whether it is the policy of the War Office to make it more difficult for the ordinary private soldier to obtain Her Majesty's commission?

*THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR WAR (Mr. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN, Stirling, &c.): The alteration in question reduces the age at which a non-commissioned officer may be recommended for a commission, not that at which he may be promoted. The new Regulation is, in fact, more favourable to the "ordinary ranker" than to the "gentleman private"—to use the hon. Member's own words; and the stipulation suspending the rule in the case of men of specially meritorious service enables good soldiers to receive promotion. It is not considered desirable, in the interest of the Service, to promote married non-commissioned officers to combatant commissions, as they would in almost every instance have difficulty in supporting themselves as commissioned officers.

TELEGRAPHIC FACILITIES IN COUNTY CAVAN.

MR. YOUNG (Cavan, E.): I beg to ask the Postmaster General if he can state the result of his inquiries into the matter of the opening of a telegraph office at Shercock, County Cavan; and if he is aware of the necessity of opening a telegraph office in this place where the coroner of the district resides?

THE POSTMASTER GENERAL (Mr. A. MORLEY, Nottingham, E.): From the Reports which have just reached me, I fear that it would not be possible to establish a telegraph office at Shercock without guarantee; but I am having further inquiry made, and I will let the hon. Member know the result.

GAME LICENCES.

MR. LLOYD MORGAN (Carmarthen, W.): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether his attention has been called to an application made on Saturday, 8th July, to the Magistrates for the County of Carmarthen, sitting at Carmarthen, by one David Owen, for a renewal of a licence to sell game, which he had held for some years; whether he is aware that it was stated by one of the Magistrates that it was refused upon the ground that such licences encouraged poaching, and that no other reason was given for the refusal; and whether he will inquire if there was any sufficient reason for refusing the licence?

THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE HOME DEPARTMENT (Mr. ASQUITH, Fife, E.): I have been in communication with the Clerk to the Justices, and am informed that the licence was not refused on the ground that such licences encouraged poaching, but that having heard the application on its merits and considered all the facts bearing upon the question, the Justices in exercising their discretion did not think fit to grant the application. The discretion of the Justices is absolute, and they are not bound to assign any reason for the manner in which they exercise it in a particular case.

MAGISTERIAL APPOINTMENTS.

MR. HERBERT LEWIS (Flint, &c.): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether Lords Lieutenant of counties excuse themselves from appointing additional Magistrates on the recommendation of the Lord Chancellor, on the ground that, if such Magistrates were appointed, the usual limit of number would be exceeded; whether he is aware that a large proportion of Magistrates never attend Quarter or Petty Sessions in the counties for which they have been appointed; and whether the Lord Chancellor will take steps to remove from the Commission of the Peace any Magistrate who has failed for one year to attend a meeting of Quarter or Petty Sessions, and thereby make room for duly qualified persons who will attend to Magisterial duties?

MR. ASQUITH: Some Lords Lieutenant have represented to the Lord Chancellor that the appointment of additional Magistrates in particular Petty Sessional Divisions would cause an excess over the usual number. The Lord Chancellor is aware that a large number of Magistrates never do attend. It is by no means clear that he has the power to remove from the Commission all Magistrates who have failed for one year to attend a meeting of Quarter or Petty Sessions; but, in the opinion of the Lord Chancellor, the presence of the names of such persons on the Commission is no sufficient ground for abstaining from making other appointments.

Mr. Lloyd Morgan

QUARANTINE.

SIR C. W. DILKE (Gloucester, Forest of Dean): I beg to ask the President of the Local Government Board whether his scientific advisers are of opinion that the system of quarantine is under any circumstances desirable?

THE PRESIDENT OF THE LOCAL GOVERNMENT BOARD (Mr. H. H. FOWLER, Wolverhampton, E.): It has only been necessary for the Local Government Board to determine the question as to the adoption of a system of quarantine in connection with cholera, and the scientific advisers of the Department are strongly of opinion that quarantine in connection with that disease is very undesirable. The administration of the Quarantine Acts now devolves on the Privy Council, and not on the Local Government Board, and quarantine would be enforced only in cases of yellow fever or plague. I am informed that it has been considered desirable to have the power to put in force quarantine in these cases in order to prevent the hindrance to navigation which might arise when yellow fever is prevalent in South America if, in consequence of quarantine not being declared in England, ships coming from England were treated by other countries as liable to quarantine.

EDINBURGH MUSEUM.

MR. PAUL (Edinburgh, S.): I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury whether the Treasury have now considered the claims of the attendants at the Edinburgh Museum to be placed on an equal footing as regards pay, promotion, and leave with attendants doing similar work at South Kensington; and, if so, what is the decision of the Department?

*THE SECRETARY TO THE TREASURY (Sir J. T. HIBBERT, Oldham): Yes, Sir; the decision of the Treasury was conveyed to the Science and Art Department in a letter dated the 27th July, and the rates of pay have been improved so as to approximate to those in force in London and Dublin.

THE ARMY PAY DEPARTMENT.

MR. CLANCY (Dublin Co., N.): On behalf of my hon. Friend the Member for the Harbour Division of Dublin, I beg to ask the Secretary of State for War when the promised Warrant affecting the pay and prospects of the staff clerks of the Army Pay Department will be issued?

*MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: The Warrant for the Army Pay Corps has been issued with the Army Orders for this month.

COLLOONEY AND CLAREMORRIS RAILWAY.

MR. CLANCY: I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury whether it is a fact that it is three years since land was taken in the County of Mayo for the purposes of the proposed railway from Collooney to Claremorris, and that no progress has since been made with the construction of that line; and, if so, what is the cause of the delay in the matter?

*SIR J. T. HIBBERT: There is no foundation for the statement in the question, as is proved by the fact that advances on account of the Government grant have been made to the extent of £71,791 up to the 31st ultimo. I am not aware that there is now any obstacle to the progress of the line, which is in the hands of the contractor.

THE CORK MAILS.

MR. MAURICE HEALY (Cork): I beg to ask the Postmaster General whether any arrangement has now been come to with the Great Southern and Western Railway Company to run the ordinary Cork mails direct to and from Kingstown through Islandbridge Junction without going into Kingsbridge Station?

MR. A. MORLEY: As I informed the hon. Member on March 10, the alteration suggested in the question is one which concerns the Railway Company rather than the Post Office, and I regret to say the Railway Company have not seen their way to adopt the suggestion.

SPECIAL TRAINS FOR AMERICAN MAILS.

MR. MAURICE HEALY: I beg to ask the Postmaster General, with reference to the practice in cases where special mail trains with American mails are sent from Queenstown to Kingstown of keeping the special mails at Kingsbridge until the ordinary mail is being sent to Kingstown, whether on Friday, the 11th instant, a special mail train carrying the mails landed at Queenstown by the Campania reached Kingsbridge at 6.7 p.m., and was kept there until the ordinary mail train left for Kingstown, with the result that on its arrival, in addition to the ordinary mail, 440 sacks of American mails had to be shipped, the mail boat being thus delayed 31 minutes in starting, and there being a general delay of half an hour all through up to London; and whether an arrangement will now be made to send forward such special mails to Kingstown at once without waiting for the ordinary mail, and thus delaying the whole service?

MR. A. MORLEY: The Campania arrived off Queenstown at 30 minutes after noon on Friday, the 11th instant; that is, before the hours fixed for employing the special service through to London (2 p.m. to 7 p.m. on Friday). The mails were in time for conveyance by the ordinary afternoon mail train from Queenstown, and they would, in the ordinary course, have been sent by that train. They were, however, forwarded to Kingsbridge by a special passenger train run by the Great Southern and Western Railway Company for their own purposes. It was not considered necessary to run the mails on by special train from Kingsbridge to Kingstown Pier, whence the Irish Night Mail Packet started only 17 minutes—not 31 minutes—late for Holyhead. There were about 400 bags of American mails to be disembarked, and the train left Holyhead Pier 19 minutes late. Seven minutes more were lost on the journey to Euston, where the train arrived 26 minutes late. I am not prepared to lay down any general rule in the sense indicated in the second paragraph; but it is obvious that, in ordering special trains for postal purposes, regard must be had to the degree of advantage to be gained.

MR. MAURICE HEALY: Is it the fact that in all cases where the special train was not run from Queenstown to Kingsbridge the mails were kept until the ordinary train?

MR. A. MORLEY: I cannot say; but, if the hon. Member wishes, I will ascertain.

MR. MACARTNEY (Antrim, S.): What is the reason for stopping the special mail trains with American mails for eight minutes at Westland Row ? I believe it is constantly done.

MR. A. MORLEY : I think it is the action of the Railway Company, and not of the Post Office.

MR. MAURICE HEALY : Has the right hon. Gentleman entered into negotiations, as promised, with the Railway Company with a view to having the mails sent forward from Kingsbridge direct to Kingstown ?

MR. A. MORLEY : The company appear to be averse to the proposal.

GOVERNING BODIES UNDER THE ENDOWED SCHOOLS ACT.

MR. BARROW (Southwark, Bermondsey) : On behalf of the hon. Member for the Rushcliffe Division of Nottingham, I beg to ask the Parliamentary Charity Commissioner what explanation there is of the fact that in the constitution of the Governing Bodies, under the Endowed Schools Acts, so meagre a recognition appears to have been given to the representative principle, as disclosed in Return No. 244, Session 1893, many of the persons entered in column (b) being nominated by individuals, and the principle only applying "eventually" in a very large number of cases ; and whether he can assure the House that this principle shall now receive full and primary recognition by the Charity Commission in the constitution of these Governing Bodies ?

*THE PARLIAMENTARY CHARITY COMMISSIONER (Mr. T. E. ELLIS, Merionethshire) : The Return appears to have been misunderstood. Column (b) relates solely to Governors appointed as co-optative Governors, and the word "eventually" in that column has no reference to representative Governors. The representative principle, the application of which is set out in column (c), takes effect at once with a single exception noticed in the last column on page 3. The occasional appointment of a Governor, or Governors, by an individual is due to special circumstances, as, for instance, the recent gift of £20,000 by a late Duke of Bedford. The Commissioners believe that the Return, on examination, will show that the representative principle receives full recognition in the schemes comprised within its scope, especially since the establishment of County Councils under the Local Government Act of 1888. The passage of the Parish and District Councils Bill of this year will make the further application of the principle still more easy and sure.

THE SALE OF PATENT MEDICINES.

MR. FRYE (Kensington, W.) : I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury, it having been stated by the Parliamentary Committee of the British Medical Association, in their recent Report on the sale of patent medicines, that the further action of the Public Prosecutor in respect of actions taken by him has been limited by the directions given to the officers of the Treasury by the Attorney General, firstly, to prosecute only in the event of a particular preparation being really poisonous or dangerous on the ground of poisonous ingredients ; and, secondly, that the mere presence of a poisonous ingredient, if not in sufficient quantity to make the article sold poisonous, would not justify proceedings under the 17th section of the Act, is the Pharmaceutical Society justified, in face of this restriction, in continuing to demand penalties from tradesmen throughout the Kingdom ; and, if so, on what grounds ?

SIR J. T. HIBBERT : The directions given by the late Attorney General to the Department of the Solicitor to the Treasury are correctly quoted, and they have been, and are still, acted upon by the Director of Public Prosecutions ; but I am not prepared to give a legal opinion on the action to be taken by the Pharmaceutical Society in the exercise of its discretion, or in accordance with the advice of its own legal advisers.

DUBLIN MAIL DELIVERIES.

MR. W. KENNY (Dublin, St. Stephen's Green) : I beg to ask the Postmaster General if he is aware that letters arriving in Dublin by the day mail steamer from Holyhead are not delivered in the Pembroke township of Dublin until about 9 o'clock p.m., after the city deliveries ; whether these letters are sorted on board the steamer, and are ready to be handed to the letter carriers on their arrival in the city about 5.30 p.m. ; and if he will take steps to expedite the delivery in this township, the more especially as English letters by the same steamer are delivered in the neighbouring township of Kingstown about 6 o'clock p.m.?

MR. A. MORLEY: The day mail letters from England for the Pembroke township of Dublin are not delivered at present until the last delivery, which commences between 7.0 p.m. and 8.0 p.m., and which includes the letters from the Irish Provinces reaching Dublin by up day mail. The question of making an earlier and special delivery of these English letters has been repeatedly considered, but the cost involved has hitherto been found more than could be justified.

THE CORDITE PATENT. ?

MR. HANBURY: I beg to ask the Secretary of State for War what were the terms of the Reference to the Explosives Committee appointed 10th July, 1888, and dissolved in 1891; whether the War Office authorised such Committee to improve upon, or modify, as well as to examine, the private inventions submitted to them; whether, if so, all competitors, before submitting their inventions, were officially informed that their inventions were thus liable to be improved upon and modified, and these modifications be patented against them, or what information was given to them upon this point; how many private inventors sent in their inventions before the date at which Messrs. Abel and Dewar took out the first of their English patents, Nos. 5,614, 8,718, 11,664, and 11,667 of 1889; how many did so before these Members of the Committee, or either of them, took out a patent abroad, and were foreign patents so taken out or applied for in Germany, in Austria, in France, and in Belgium in 1889; were the inventors who submitted samples for competitive trial with each other, and with cordite a year later, in 1890, officially informed that two members of the Committee who were to judge upon them had previously patented cordite in their own names, both at home and in foreign countries; for what reason was the manufacture of cordite specially allowed to be kept a secret in this country, and for what period, after it had been disclosed to foreign manufacturers on the Continent; when did the War Office first become informed as to all the foreign patents, and by what means; what action did the War Office thereupon take with reference to the application for, and the assignment of, foreign patents by its own officials for the manufacture and use abroad of its own secret explosive; and what steps has he yet taken to protect English inventions against any possible unfair competition by the War Office in future, or the War Office against having its secret processes or patents disclosed by its officials or otherwise, by means of foreign patents or other methods, to Continental Powers?

“The Committee is appointed for the purpose of considering questions relating to new explosive agents, or to new applications of or improvements in the production and application of known explosive agents, which will be referred to the Committee by order of His Royal Highness the Commander-in-Chief for consideration or investigation and report,” and full directions were given as to carrying out these instructions. The Committee was appointed for three years, and during that period all explosives submitted to the Department, and all questions which arose relating to explosives were from time to time referred to the Committee for consideration and report. With regard to Questions 2 and 3, it was quite understood that the Committee were to endeavour by every means in their power to develop the science of explosives, and to place the Service in possession of those best adapted to meet its various requirements. The object of the Department was not to decide on the merits of rival inventions, but to obtain the best material for the Public Service. For this purpose the Committee were naturally entitled to suggest improvements and modifications, and no special intimation to that effect was required. In answer to Question 4, before 1888, when the Committee was appointed, many proposals had been submitted to the Department, the records of which were accessible to the Committee. At the time the Committee was formed eight explosives were under consideration, and the investigations with regard to those were taken up by the Committee. Between that date and the date of the first application for patent by Messrs. Abel and Dewar eight others came under their consideration. I cannot give the information asked for paragraph 5. The Department has no particulars in regard to the taking out of the foreign patents. In answer to 6, the actual publication of the specification of the cordite patent was almost simultaneous with the arrangements for competition; but the circumstances, and the fact of a patent having been applied for, were well known to all concerned. It is not accurate, by the way, to speak of the Committee judging the inventions; the Committee carried out the trials and reported the results, but were not the judges. With regard to Question 7, so far as its ingredients are concerned, cordite was not kept a secret. The only specification which was for a time sealed related to the form in which the material was to be produced. This was sealed from June 28, 1890, till May 28, 1892. But, as a matter of fact, the process of manufacture was disclosed in the specification for machinery published in July, 1890. I cannot answer as to the foreign patents, not knowing their dates. As to Question 8, Sir Frederick Abel informed the Director of Artillery, March 25, 1891, that he and Professor Dewar had transferred their foreign patents; but, as I have already said, the Department was not concerned as to those patents, and particulars were not asked for and were not communicated to the Department. With reference to Question 9, it was not considered necessary to take any steps, and the explosive was not a secret. In the last question the hon. Member assumes that there has been unfair action on the part of the War Office, and that its secret processes have been disclosed, neither of which assumptions appear to be supported by fact.

MR. HANBURY: Do I understand the right hon. Gentleman to say, as a matter of fact, the secret of cordite was not disclosed to the German manufacturer when the patent was transferred to him? Is it a fact, too, that the transfer was not made known to the War Office till two years after it had actually taken place? Further, is it a fact that neither in 1888 nor in 1890 was any official intimation given to private inventors that the inventions submitted by them were liable to be improved upon by the War Office or that two members of the Explosives Committee had already taken out patents in foreign countries?

*MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: I have not said that they had already taken out patents. I am not aware of the dates. When my hon. Friend says the secret was disclosed at the time of the transfer of the foreign patents my answer is, You cannot disclose a secret when it is not a secret, and the principles and ingredients of cordite have never been a secret.

MR. HANBURY: Is it not a fact that the patent was taken out in 1889, and transferred the same year, although the War Office were not informed of it till 1891.

*MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: I have quoted the dates given to me. My hon. Friend knows I have no personal cognisance of them, not having held an official position at the time. I do not think, however, the facts bear out the statement of the hon. Member.

THE HYDERABAD PLOT.

MR. NAOROJI (Finsbury, Central): In the absence of the hon. Member for Elgin and Nairn, I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for India whether he is now aware that a person named Jowad Hussain has been arrested in Hyderabad, Deccan, on a charge of plotting to murder the British Resident, Mr. Plowden, or to blow up the Residency with dynamite; and that the arrest is stated to have been in consequence of the production to the Nizam by Mr. Plowden of a letter purporting to warn him that such a plot existed; whether there is any ground to believe in the existence of such a plot; and, if so, are any other persons stated to be implicated in it; what was the cause of the banishment from Hyderabad, on 15th ultimo, of the Political and Financial Secretary, the Nawab Mohsin-ul-Mulk, Mehdi Ali; and having regard to the circumstance that similar designs on Mr. Plowden's life when he was Resident at the Court of the Ruler of Cashmere were attributed to that Ruler, and were without inquiry afterwards put forward as one of the causes officially assigned for his deposition, Her Majesty's Government will direct that a full and careful inquiry be made by some independent authority into the facts connected with the alleged plot, and the other recent events in Hyderabad which have been brought to their notice, so as to insure that no injustice is done to the Nizam's Government?

*THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR INDIA (Mr. G. RUSSELL, North Beds.): As regards questions 1, 2, and 3, the following information has been received by telegraph from the Viceroy:—

"One Jowad Hussain, arrested in Hyderabad, but not on Resident's initiation, is principal person charged with complicity in plot to murder Resident. Facts not yet elicited, but Departmental inquiry is being held by two Judges of Nizam's High Court. Mehdi Ali resigned and left State under Nizam's orders in consequence of implication in one lakh of rupees bribery case. Complete correspondence regarding this incident posted 13th instant."

In view of the fact that an inquiry into the alleged plot is now being held by two Judges of the Nizam's High Court, the Secretary of State thinks it unnecessary, at the present stage of affairs, to order a separate inquiry to be held.

THE HOLYHEAD AND KINGSTOWN MAILS.

MR. SEXTON (Kerry, N.): I beg to ask the Postmaster General when he proposes to act with regard to the expiring contract for the carriage of mails between Holyhead and Kingstown?

MR. DANE (Fermanagh, N.): At the same time, I will ask the right hon. Gentleman has he considered the question of determining the existing contract for the carrying of mails between Kingstown and Holyhead; and, if so, with what result?

MR. A. MORLEY: As stated on the 14th instant, in reply to a question of the hon. Baronet the Member for West Kerry, the time has not yet arrived for considering whether the present contract for the Mail Packet Service between Kingstown and Holyhead shall be determined; but when that time does arrive the whole subject will receive most careful attention. The existing contract has two years to run.

MR. DANE: But must not the notice to terminate be given before the 30th of next month?

MR. A. MORLEY: No. It must be given before the 30th September, 1894.

MR. SEXTON: With a view to securing an accelerated service, will the right hon. Gentleman issue the notices for fresh tenders in good time?

MR. A. MORLEY: That matter is one which will be taken into consideration.

MR. MACARTNEY: Will the right hon. Gentleman also consider whether the train service cannot be accelerated?

MR. A. MORLEY: I think we have done all we can in the way of accelerating that.

MR. DANE: When does the contract expire?

MR. A. MORLEY: In September, 1895.

THE BEHAR CADASTRAL SURVEY.

MR. BARTLEY (Islington, N.): In the absence of the right hon. Member for Cambridge University (Sir J. Gorst), I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for India whether the Lieutenant Governor of Bengal was officially authorised to admit, in his letter to The Times on the Behar Cadastral Survey, that he wished the state of the finances enabled the Government to bear a larger portion of the expenditure; whether the Government of India has finally decided that seven-eighths of the large cost of this survey shall take the form of new land taxation in Behar, levied on the landlords and the tenants in equal shares; whether this decision has been approved by the Secretary of State, as not infringing the permanent settlement; and whether the section of the Bengal Tenancy Act, under which the taxation will be imposed, expressly limited such taxation to a local area?

MR. G. RUSSELL: The Secretary of State is not responsible for the letter written by Sir C. Elliott which appeared in The Times of 12th August. No final decision has yet been passed in regard to the cost of the Behar Cadastral Survey. Yes. Chapter 10, Clause 114, of the Bengal Tenancy Act uses the words "local area."

BOGUS DRINKING CLUBS IN DUBLIN.

MR. MAURICE HEALY: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether, in view of recent disclosures in the Dublin Police Courts as to the mischief being done by bogus clubs, he will take steps to secure the extension to Ireland of the Registration of Clubs Bill now before the House?

THE CHIEF SECRETARY FOR IRELAND (Mr. J. MORLEY, Newcastle-upon-Tyne): Up to the present the Dublin police have instituted 16 prosecutions against these bogus drinking clubs, and the Magistrates have imposed fines amounting to £408, of which amount a sum of £158 has been paid into Court. Nine persons are undergoing terms of from three to six months' imprisonment for non-payment of fines. Two cases were dismissed and five are pending. Five of the clubs ceased to exist after prosecution, and the remainder have shown a great decrease in business, to the consequent benefit of the general public. In the event of its being found that there is a prospect of the Bill becoming law, I shall be prepared to consider whether its provisions should be applied to Ireland.

THE ARMY MEDICAL SERVICE.

MR. JACKS (Stirlingshire): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for War if he has received a Memorial from the Senate of the University of Glasgow concurring with a joint Memorial presented to him by the three Scottish Corporations who confer licences to practise medicines, surgery, and midwifery, in respect of the action of the War Department confining the selection of medical and surgical examiners for the competitive examinations for admission to Her Majesty's Army Medical Service solely to the past and present Examiners of the London Colleges of Physicians and Surgeons; and if, having regard to the dissatisfaction and irritation aroused by such a course, the War Office can see their way to reconsider their decision?

*MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: Yes, Sir; such a Memorial has been received, and an answer has been sent to the effect that there is no intention whatever of conferring upon any Medical Corporation such a monopoly as that alluded to. The Examiners have, in the present instance, been selected from the Examiners to the Royal Colleges in London; but it is quite open to the Secretary of State to replace some of them as vacancies occur by members from the Examining Bodies in Scotland and Ireland.

Mr. Maurice Healy

DR. MACGREGOR (Inverness-shire): Cannot the present arrangement be terminated at the end of one year? Has my right hon. Friend contemplated such a misfortune as his not being in power four years hence?

*MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: I can contemplate such a misfortune with perfect equanimity. The present appointments have been made for four years, and cannot be interfered with.

PROPOSED FRENCH CANAL ACROSS THE MALAY PENINSULA.

MR. CURZON (Lancashire, Southport): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether he can inform the House if it is true that the French Plenipotentiary to Bangkok has been instructed to demand a French concession for a canal across the Malay Peninsula; and whether, if he has no information, Her Majesty's Government will address an inquiry to the French Government on the matter?

*THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR FOREIGN AFFAIRS (Sir E. GREY, Northumberland, Berwick): I quite agree with the hon. Member as to the importance which any such proposal would have as regards British interests; but it is not desirable to address a formal inquiry to the French Government founded only upon an unauthorised report in the Press.

BRITISH GUNBOATS OFF BANGKOK.

MR. CURZON: I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether any British gunboats still remain at Bangkok; and, if not, why they have been removed?

*SIR E. GREY: According to the latest information received by Her Majesty's Government the Linnet is still at Bangkok; only the Pallas and Pigmy have left.

MR. CURZON: I saw in the papers the statement that the Linnet also had been removed. Perhaps, therefore, I may be allowed to put the question again on the Paper, in order to enable the hon. Baronet to ascertain a little more accurate information another day.

*SIR E. GREY: Our latest information is that the Linnet remains. If it has been removed it is only because the authorities on the spot were quite sure that there was no further danger.

THE CARRYING TRADE BETWEEN ALGERIA AND FRANCE.

MR. CURZON: I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether from 1st October next the carrying trade between Algeria and France will be exclusively confined to French vessels, Great Britain, in common with other Foreign Powers, having surrendered her right of participation; whether he is aware that the bulk of the trade is carried in British ships; whether, had any single Power withheld its sanction, the trade must, in virtue of existing Treaties, have remained open to all flags; and for what reasons the above concession has been made?

*SIR E. GREY: We have not been informed that the change as to the carrying trade between France and Algeria is to take effect on the 1st October. In 1889, the French Legislature passed a law which restricted this navigation to vessels under the French Flag, and the French Government intimated most positively that they must terminate any Treaty which prevented the application of it. Under the circumstances, Her Majesty's Government agreed to modify one clause of the Treaty of 1882 to the extent required rather than to terminate the whole Treaty. The figures for 1890 show that, so far from the bulk of the trade being carried in British ships, 93 per cent. of the shipping engaged in the trade was French, and only 2 per cent. was British.

THE ARMENIAN PRISONERS.

SIR R. TEMPLE (Surrey, Kingston): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether any representations can be made to the Porte in the cases of the Pastor of Gemerek, sentenced to imprisonment, and believed to bear a high character, also of Dikran Gulbankian, a student, awaiting trial at Angora; and whether the Sultan's clemency can be solicited on behalf of several graduates of the Marsovan College, who are understood to have arrived at Constantinople, before they are scattered and sent to distant prisons?

*SIR E. GREY: The sentence on the first-named prisoner has been reduced already from 15 years' penal servitude to six years detention in a fortress. Inquiry will be made as to Dikran Gulbankian. Representations on behalf of some of the prisoners already sentenced have been made to the Porte. Further efforts must depend upon subsequent information.

THE INDIAN CURRENCY QUESTION.

MR. EVERETT (Suffolk, Woodbridge): I beg to ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether he has taken notice of the fact that the new currency arrangements in India, intended to secure steadiness of exchange between the sovereign and the rupee, while not having done this, have been followed by a widening of the divergence between the values of silver and of gold, by the opening of new difficulties between India and other silver-using countries, and by an increase of the difficulties of British trade with those countries; whether he is aware that on Wednesday last Senator Gray stated to Members of both Houses of Congress of the United States that he violated no confidence in stating that President Cleveland is in favour of securing a par of exchange between gold and silver moneys with free coinage for both; and whether, in view of this favourable disposition of the United States Government towards securing a par of exchange, and in view of the common interest the two kindred nations have in the re-establishment of such a par on a durable basis, our Government will open negotiations with that of the United States in order to learn whether common action between the two Governments to secure such re-establishment can now be taken?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EX-CHEQUER (Sir W. HARCOURT, Derby): I must remind my hon. Friend that on February 28 a Resolution was moved "urging Her Majesty's Government to use its utmost influence to procure the re-assembly of the Monetary Conference in order to find some effective remedy, in concert with other nations, in view of the serious evils resulting from the growing divergence of value between gold and silver."

That Resolution was defeated by a majority of 81, and, in its place, an Amendment was carried declaring "that any interference with the single monetary standard now by law established in this country is open to the gravest objections," and

"this House thinks it inexpedient that the Government should take any steps to procure the re-assembly of that Conference."

That the Government of the United States is favourable to a bimetallic system has always been well-known; indeed, they made a formal proposal at Brussels to that effect, which was, however, withdrawn from want of support from the European States. The Government find nothing in the existing state of things, or in anything which has recently occurred in India, to alter the Resolution already announced by them, and approved by the House of Commons, not to interfere with "the single monetary standard now by law established in this country."

MR. EVERETT: Is the right hon. Gentleman aware of the circumstances under which the majority of 81 in the House of Commons was obtained? Did not many hon. Members favourable to an International arrangement vote in that majority because of the severity of the discipline of the Party Whips; and has not the result of the recent action in India somewhat altered the complexion of affairs?

SIR W. HARCOURT: I really cannot give any information on that point. I have not myself been subjected to the severity of the Whips.

MR. CHAPLIN (Lincolnshire, Sleaford): Is it not the fact that since the period referred to by the right hon. Gentleman, and very much owing to the action of Her Majesty's Government, the divergence between the values of gold and silver has enormously increased, together with all the difficulties arising from it, and, under those circumstances, are the Government not prepared to modify the opinions they have expressed, and to accede in some respect to the terms of the hon. Member's question?

SIR W. HARCOURT: I have already answered that question, but I will repeat the answer. It is—

"The Government find nothing in the existing state of things, or in anything which has recently occurred in India, to alter the Resolution already announced by them, and approved by the House of Commons, not to interfere with the single monetary standard now by law established in this country."

Sir W. Harcourt

MR. CHAPLIN: Then, in the opinion of Her Majesty's Government, there are no steps which can be taken to modify the difficulties of the present situation, except to alter the standard by law established?

SIR W. HARCOURT: I have not said that.

MR. CHAPLIN: What was your answer?

*MR. SPEAKER: Order, order!

WELSH INTERMEDIATE SCHOOL SCHEMES.

MR. EGERTON ALLEN (Pembroke, &c.): I beg to ask the Parliamentary Charity Commissioner whether the clauses in the Intermediate School Schemes of Carnarvon and Merioneth relating to religious instruction and observances in hostels of a school will exclude the reading of collects as a part of family worship?

*MR. T. E. ELLIS: A similar question was asked a few days ago by the hon. Member for Islington, to which, under a misapprehension as to its purport, I gave a reply which I desire to modify. It would appear, from a consideration of the provisions of the two Schemes to which the hon. Member refers, that they do not exclude the reading of collects as a part of family worship, provided that those collects are not formularies of any particular denomination.

MR. BARTLEY: Do I understand that the answer given to me by the hon. Gentleman last week was given under a misapprehension, and that these Collects are allowed under the Scheme to form part of religious worship in these hostels?

*MR. T. E. ELLIS: Yes, with the provision inserted in the Scheme that they are not formularies of any particular denomination. The matter will first be decided by the local Governing Body, and if they have any further difficulty a further application will have to be made to the Charity Commissioners under Clause 106 of the Scheme for Carnarvonshire and Clause 101 of the Scheme for Merionethshire.

MR. BARTLEY: Is it not somewhat difficult to say that a portion of the Church of England Liturgy and Collects are not part of denominational teaching? Surely, inasmuch as they form part—[Cries of "Order!"]—of a religious service, are they not fairly—[Renewed Cries of "Order!"]

*MR. SPEAKER : Order, order ! The hon. Gentleman is arguing now that they are part of denominational teaching.

BALLYCOTTON PIER.

CAPTAIN DONELAN (Cork, E.) : I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury whether he is aware that the large fissures which opened some time since in the sides of the Breakwater lately built at Ballycotton, County Cork, are becoming gradually widened by the action of the sea ; whether he is aware that the Grand Jury of the County Cork continue to decline the responsibility of taking over charge of this pier, owing to its imperfect and defective construction ; and whether some arrangement could be made in order to save the outlay upon this costly work from being absolutely wasted ?

SIR J. T. HIBBERT : I am informed that the statement in the first paragraph is groundless, there having been no change since July, 1892, and only one crack having opened half-an-inch in a period of five years before that date. The work is, I understand, sound, and is already legally vested in the Grand Jury, who have no power to repudiate charge of it. No steps such as are hinted at in the last paragraph are called for.

CAPTAIN DONELAN : Will the pier be placed in proper repair before it is handed over ?

SIR J. T. HIBBERT : I must ask for notice of that question.

SERIOUS FIRE AT LIMERICK.

MR. O'KEEFFE (Limerick) : I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland if his attention has been drawn to the serious fire in the City of Limerick on Saturday, 13th August instant, at which damages to the extent of over £20,000 are stated to have occurred ; whether it has been reported that 2,000 barrels of petroleum oil were stored on the premises forming part of the burnt concerns ; and if, considering the danger to life and property, he will direct rigid enforcement of the law in the preventing of the storage in large quantities of petroleum or other inflammable material in valuable and thickly-inhabited districts of Irish cities and towns ?

MR. J. MORLEY : My attention has been drawn to a report of this fire and to the fact that a large quantity of petroleum oil was stored on premises adjoining those burnt down, though, fortunately, the fire did not reach the oil. I am informed that the oil was not of the description to which the Petroleum Acts of 1871 and 1879 apply, and that it was not, therefore, subject to statutory control. In the cases of other descriptions of petroleum of such strength as to bring it within the scope of the Acts of Parliament on the subject, the Local Authorities are armed with full powers in regard to its detention and storage, as well as the enforcement of the statutory penalties, and there is no reason to think that the provisions of the law in this respect are not carried out.

IRISH PRESBYTERIANS AND HOME RULE.

MR. DANE : I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury if he is at liberty to publish the address recently received by him from a number of Presbyterians in Ireland ; and, if so, will he do so ?

THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY (Mr. W. E. GLADSTONE, Edinburgh, Midlothian) : All I have to say is that I am at liberty to make the Memorial public, in any convenient form, if the memorialists desire me to do so. But the memorialists did not ask me to make their names public.

MR. RENTOUL (Down, E.) : I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether he is aware that the three Presbyterian ministers who signed the letter to him enclosing the address purporting to be from Presbyterians are not themselves in favour of Home Rule ; and that the Rev. Mr. Armour, whose name heads the list of three, is the author of the most violent manifesto ever published against Home Rule ; and whether Professor Dougherty—even when a Liberal Parliamentary candidate—failed to express himself openly and clearly in favour of Home Rule ?

MR. W. E. GLADSTONE was understood to say, in reply, that if Professor Dougherty had been earlier in the field he would have been elected.

MR. W. JOHNSTON (Belfast, S.): Will the right hon. Gentleman recommend him to try again?

[No answer was given.]

THE WELSH COAL STRIKE.

MR. KEIR HARDIE (West Ham, S.): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department, to whom I have given private notice of the question, whether the mine-owners of South Wales communicated with the Home Office on Friday last, requesting that troops should be sent to the strike districts; whether, in response to this request, 1,100 soldiers were sent; whether any disturbance has occurred in South Wales which the police have been unable to put down; and, if not, what was the justification for sending the soldiers?

MR. ASQUITH: The hon. Member has altered the form of his question since he gave me notice of it, but I will answer it. It is not the fact that the mine-owners of South Wales telegraphed for 3,000 soldiers; they did ask by telegram for the instant presence in the two Counties of Glamorganshire and Monmouthshire of a larger military force of horse and foot than was then in the district. In reply, applicants were informed that it was the duty of the Local Authorities and police to take all proper steps for the preservation of the peace, including, in case of necessity, application to the Military Authorities for such military assistance as might be required; and by a further telegram they were expressly informed that applications for military aid in case of riot could only be received from the regular authorities—namely, the Chief Constable or Magistrates—and should be addressed to the General Officer Commanding Western District, Devonport. Copies of the telegrams from applicants were forwarded to Chief Constables for their information, and to the War Office with a request that if troops were called for by the proper authority they might be readily available. So far as I am aware, no troops have been sent on the application of anyone except the Local Authorities. The reason for sending the troops—the total number of which does not, so far as I am aware, exceed about 1,200—was that, in the opinion of the Magistrates, from which I saw no reason to dissent, the available police force on the spot was insufficient to protect persons and property and to prevent the outbreak of disorder. The troops have been and will be used for no other purpose, and they will be withdrawn as soon as the necessity for their presence ceases.

*MR. KEIR HARDIE: Can the right hon. Gentleman the Home Secretary state how many persons occupying the position of Magistrates are mine-owners or persons interested in the mines?

MR. ASQUITH: I have no information on the subject.

THE SECOND CHAMBER OF THE IRISH LEGISLATURE.

MR. SAUNDERS (Newington, Walworth): I beg to ask whether the Government intend to withdraw the property qualification proposed in Clause 6 of the Home Rule Bill for Irish electors to the Second Chamber of the Irish Legislature?

MR. W. E. GLADSTONE: Since the time when the Government last declared their opinion with respect to this provision, we have had no opportunity of obtaining further information or of hearing further argument; and, under the circumstances, as the question stands near the point at which we have now arrived on the Report of the Government of Ireland Bill, I hardly think that this is the moment at which I ought to enter into it. I think the duty of the Government is to wait, in the hope of hearing what further contributions the House may have to make for the settlement of the question, if any, when we arrive at that point in the Amendments on the Report.

SUSPENSION OF THE TWELVE O'CLOCK RULE.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR (Manchester, E.): With regard to the Notice on the Paper for the suspension of the Twelve o'Clock Rule, in respect of which no public notice was given on Friday, I should like to ask the right hon. Gentleman the Prime Minister whether he put it down upon the Paper for the purpose of carrying out the ordinary object of such a Motion—namely, to prevent the inconvenience which might arise from the sudden interruption of the Debate at 12 o'clock? I shall myself not divide against the Motion if I receive a satisfactory answer from the right hon. Gentleman. I think that there will be no disposition to prolong the Debate beyond this evening.

MR. W. E. GLADSTONE: At the time when I gave the Notice of my Motion, undoubtedly it never occurred to me that it was likely to be the subject of any prolonged Debate, even to the extent of a single evening. When, however, my right hon. Friend the Member for West Birmingham (Mr. J. Chamberlain) gave Notice of his Amendment in the form in which I heard it, it occurred to me that it was a remarkable Amendment, and it was listening to it and to the terms in which it was couched that induced me to think that the Debate might be somewhat prolonged upon that Amendment, and that, therefore, it might be prudent to move the suspension of the Twelve o'Clock Rule. That was the way in which the matter arose. I had no reason to suppose that this was likely to be one of those very prolonged Debates which have made previous Sittings of the House of Commons famous in other times, and I sincerely join in the hope, which I think was conveyed in the language of the right hon. Gentleman opposite, that this Debate will be closed to-night.

VITU.

SIR C. W. DILKE: May I ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs if he has any information with regard to the continued fighting in Vitu, and the circumstances under which it is being carried on?

*SIR E. GREY: I did not know before I came into the House that the question was going to be asked, and, therefore, I cannot give any details. There has been one telegram to the effect that a further engagement has taken place with a native chief, it having been provoked by him. It stated, further, that Mr. Rodd hoped to leave Vitu for Zanzibar on the 22nd. The casualties, apparently, were few, and I think, as Mr. Rodd expects to leave Vitu so soon, the operations must have been effective.

MOTIONS.

SITTINGS OF THE HOUSE (EXEMPTION FROM THE STANDING ORDER).

RESOLUTION.

MR. W. E. GLADSTONE: I beg to move the Motion that stands in my name.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That the Proceedings on the Motion, 'Business of the House (Procedure on Report of the Government of Ireland Bill),' if under discussion at Twelve o'clock this night, be not interrupted under the Standing Order, Sittings of the House."—(Mr. W. E. Gladstone.)

Question put, and agreed to.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE (PROCEDURE ON REPORT OF THE GOVERNMENT OF IRELAND BILL.)

RESOLUTION.

MR. W. E. GLADSTONE moved the following Resolution:—

"That, at Eleven o'clock p.m. on Friday the 25th day of August, if the proceedings on the Consideration of the Report of the Government of Ireland Bill be not previously concluded, the Speaker shall put forthwith the Question, or Questions, on any Amendment, or Motion, already proposed from the Chair. He shall next proceed to put forthwith the Question on any Government Amendments of which notice has been given, after which he shall put forthwith the Question on the Motion appointing a day for the Third Reading of the Bill. Until the Report is disposed of, no Motion of Adjournment under Standing Order 17 shall be received, nor any dilatory Motion on the Bill unless moved by one of the Members in charge of the Bill, and the Question on any such Motion shall be put forthwith. Proceedings under this Order shall not be interrupted under the provisions of any Standing Order relating to the Sittings of the House."

The right hon. Gentleman said: In bringing forward the Motion of which I have given Notice, I certainly shall make no such contribution to the coming Debate as is likely to lead us into difficulty, for it appears to me that the Resolution which I now move will be recognised, even by those who oppose it, as almost a necessary sequel to the Resolution moved by me on a former occasion, and then made the subject of large discussion. All the general considerations bearing upon a Resolution of that kind were then so sufficiently debated that it does not rest with me, I think—indeed, it is not within my power—to add anything of an original or novel character to the Debate which then took place. The only change is this: that at the time when the Resolution was moved we had spent 44 days on the various stages of the Bill, and that now we have spent 74 days—to which my Resolution proposes to add five more, bringing the number up to 79 days, and that without any reference to the Debate on the Third Reading. That is not very far from double the amount of time that has ever been occupied in the discussion of any of the most important Constitutional measures that have ever passed through this House. I do not wish to re-argue the case; far less do I wish to urge a single word that could possibly be interpreted into censure upon those gentlemen who sit opposite. They have taken undoubtedly a very unusual course, and that, I think, no one among them will be prepared to deny; but their allegation is that they have taken it in consequence of circumstances and in consequence of being called upon to act upon motives that are likewise altogether unusual. Thereby a very great issue—not only a great Parliamentary issue, but a great historical issue—is raised between us and gentlemen opposite. I do not intend to enter upon any discussion of it at this time. All I wish to do now is to say that the Motion I make is a Motion absolutely required by the iron chain of consequences after what has taken place. If the Motion which I formerly made for the application of the Closure in Committee on the Bill was justified by the circumstances in which we then stood with 44 days of the Debate behind us, I think that in the latter part of the month of August, and with 74 days of debate behind us, it is still more obviously called for and exacted from us by a sense of our public duty. We believe that a vast question is undoubtedly raised as to the provisions of the Home Rule Bill, but outside those provisions there is a question still larger which underlies this and every subject coming before Parliament—namely, the question of whether a minority, even though a large and powerful minority, can legitimately, by the augmentation of the bulk of the Bill and the bulk of Amendments, create discussion apart from the simple discussion of the merits of the case—though, no doubt, gentlemen opposite think that those 74 days have been spent in discussion on the merits. [Opposition cheers.] That is a very thin cheer—if it were an expression of a general sentiment it would have been more emphatic. Our view, however, is that a large portion of the discussion has been unnecessary, and we notice with surprise that it is an allegation made by the Opposition that it has not been in their power to obtain any discussion on the greater part of the clauses of the Bill. When I look back over those 74 days—I will not say anything about the 16 days before we went into Committee, because I am under the impression that the Debates on those 16 days were not very unequally divided—but if I take the 74 days, minus the 16, that leaves 58 days for Committee and Report. I do not hesitate to say that out of those 58 days more than 40 have been expended by the speeches of the opponents of the Bill. Therefore, it appears to me that in the course of 40 days they have not been able so to adjust their argumentation and eloquence as to discuss a large portion of the most important provisions of the Bill. That is certainly a part of our case. It may be said very truly that this is a case of which the nation at large will be the only final judge. [Opposition cheers.] That cheer from gentlemen opposite expresses their confidence as to that judgment. Well, Sir, we are very strong also in our belief as to that judgment; and, moreover, I think we have this confidence: that the favourable judgment which the nation, as a whole, did form and did express upon the most solemn of all Constitutional engagements will be much enhanced by what has since taken place, and especially by what has taken place respecting the manner in which, under the influence of our conscientious convictions, we have felt ourselves compelled to treat this Bill. I have been faithful to my promise not to trespass largely on the attention of the House, and I hope also that I have not said a word which can be offensive to anyone. I have made the largest admissions to which hon. Gentlemen opposite are entitled. We must contend for the broad proposition, on which we take our stand, and we must maintain the legitimacy and necessity of the Motion that I now make as absolutely essential for securing in any real and Constitutional shape the liberty and the efficacy of Parliamentary discussion.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

“That, at Eleven o'clock p.m. on Friday the 25th day of August, if the proceedings on the Consideration of the Report of the Government of Ireland Bill be not previously concluded, the Speaker shall put forthwith the Question, or Questions, on any Amendment, or Motion, already proposed from the Chair. He shall next proceed to put forthwith the Question on any Government Amendments of which notice has been given, after which he shall put forth with the Question on the Motion appointing a day for the Third Reading of the Bill. Until the Report is disposed of, no Motion of Adjournment under Standing Order 17 shall be received, nor any dilatory Motion on the Bill unless moved by one of the Members in charge of the Bill, and the Question on any such Motion shall be put forthwith. Proceedings under this Order shall not be interrupted under the provisions of any Standing Order relating to the Sittings of the House."—(Mr. W. E. Gladstone.)

MR. J. CHAMBERLAIN (Birmingham, W.) moved the following Amendment:—

"That the proposal of the Government to curtail Debate on the Government of Ireland Bill is calculated to degrade the House of Commons to the position of a voting machine, and to deprive the British majority in this House of its Constitutional right to discuss a policy by which British interests will be seriously and injuriously affected; and that this House, recognising no necessity for the course proposed by the Government, and believing that it is dictated by motives of Party expediency, declines to accept a Resolution by which the Government arbitrarily claim to limit Debate on a measure of the highest National importance, the greater part of which has already been forced through the stage of Committee without any discussion."

He said: Mr. Speaker, in answering a question just now, my right hon. Friend referred to the fact that the Amendment which is now upon the Paper in my name differs somewhat from that of which I gave notice on Friday last. I owe it to him to state that that difference is not owing to any change of opinion on my part, but is due to a suggestion I received that as the Amendment was originally drawn it went beyond the subject-matter of the original Resolution, and might, therefore, be held to be out of Order. Under those circumstances, I of course felt it undesirable to submit it in that shape to the House. I am afraid I cannot promise to be as brief as my right hon. Friend, who has treated the Motion—which I venture to say is one of the most important ever made in this House, both in regard to its immediate effect and the precedent it sets—as though it were a mere subject of formal discussion to be disposed of in a few minutes. Yet I will promise to say what I have to say in as short a time as I possibly can. In the first place, I should like to clear the ground by making a statement which I hope will meet with no opposition in any quarter. In dealing with any proposal to curtail Debate in this House I imagine that we shall all agree that such a proposal must be considered and judged upon its merits, and without reference to any previous proposal. No one will say, not even hon. Gentlemen opposite, that closure or curtailment of Debate is justifiable in every case. I shall not say that closure is not justifiable in some cases, and, consequently, it appears to me that any one who makes a Resolution of this kind has to show that the particular circumstances with which he has to deal justify the particular measure which he proposes. I think that that will be generally admitted, and it follows from that that it will be very difficult to deal with the matter by reference to precedents, because it is almost impossible to find any precedent which shall exactly agree with the present situation. My right hon. Friend on a previous occasion referred to precedents. He referred to the precedent of 1887. I will refer both to the precedents of 1881 and 1887, and I say in regard to both of them that they are absolutely and in toto different from the present situation. There is absolutely no comparison between them. They differ essentially in the importance and magnitude of the measure which is under consideration, and discussion upon which is to be arbitrarily cut short. They differ in the character of the positions, they differ in the number of the minority, and they differ—and that is not the least important difference—in the state and drift of public opinion. I am afraid, however, in making that statement I cannot count on agreement from my right hon. Friend, because on the previous occasion he spoke of the precedent of 1887 as if it were practically and substantially on all fours with the present case. That was, I think, the view on which he founded himself in claiming the action of the Conservative Government in 1887 as justifying the action of the Liberal Government in 1893. Under these circumstances there is an issue between us, as to which I will only say that I do not think we can fairly be accused of inconsistency in supporting the Closure in 1887 and opposing it now, so long as we believe that the circumstances are entirely different. On the other hand, 1887 is a precedent which ought to guide us as to the course which should be taken by my right hon. Friend. He says that the circumstances are practically and substantially the same. Under the circumstances, the view which he took in 1887 ought to be the view which he takes now.

MR. W. E. GLADSTONE: I never said that the circumstances were the same.

MR. J. CHAMBERLAIN: Were similar. My right hon. Friend quoted the case of 1887 as substantially justifying him in taking it as a precedent and in governing his own action by it. Now, before I part with 1887, let me say a word about the precedent of 1881, because that also was a suggestive case and well worthy the attention of the House. That was the first occasion on which the Closure was introduced into the House of Commons, and I am of opinion now, as then, that the circumstances called for such a proposal. But in speaking of that proposal, my right hon. Friend, no longer ago than in 1890, said—

“We proposed a plan of Closure of Debate which was never intended—and we made it known it was never intended—to be used by the majority against the minority in the ordinary sense, but was only intended to enable the House, when it was possessed, irrespective of Party, with a concurrent feeling to put a stop to the occasional obstinacy, or, I might almost say, impertinence—at any rate, importunity—that is a better word—of some particular member not gifted with as much wisdom as zeal.”

That was the interpretation which my right hon. Friend gave of his own intention, and that statement is justified by a reference to the Debate and his speech in proposing that Resolution. He said that he was asking the minority of the House to “Place some reliance upon the spirit of equity and the sense of honour of the majority.”

My right hon. Friend was then of opinion that no majority was justified in dealing with a minority in the ordinary sense of the word, and that the sense of honour and equity of the majority would itself be sufficient to restrain them. Sir, I am afraid that the situation has changed since then. We can no longer count on the sense of equity and the sense of honour of the majority, and we have to trust, and we do trust, to that dominant inflow of influences from every part of the country, which, sooner or later, will bring home, even to this majority, a sense of the abuse which they are perpetrating on the forms of the House. That was the opinion of my right hon. Friend in 1881. In 1887 the late Government introduced a much more drastic form of Closure, for which they thought they had good warrant, and my right hon. Friend, although I believe he did not vote against it, expressed his serious objections to it. Speaking of it in 1890—only three years ago—my right hon. Friend said—

“A system of coercion has been imported, not only in Ireland, but into the House of Commons, and an endeavour has been made, with a large amount of success, to substitute the system of coercion for the ancient spirit which left in the House of Commons an atmosphere free and pure, worthy of Britons to breathe, consecrated by the recollections of 600 years, and, if we could have had our way, to be handed down as free and pure as we received it to those who are to follow us in life and in political action.”

Now you have your way, why do not you hand down the spirit of freedom to those who are to follow you in life and in political action? Sir, my right hon. Friend may have been perfectly justified in his condemnation of the Conservative Government. At any rate, he has put on record the view he took of their proposal; he said it was a proposal for coercion. He said it destroyed the pure spirit of freedom in the House of Commons, and yet he now comes down to this House and proposes a still more drastic Resolution than that which he himself condemned. In 1881, as I say, he defended a Closure Motion, because he said it was irrespective of Party, and not to be employed by the majority against the minority, as that word is generally understood. In 1887 he repudiated a Closure Motion as being coercion, as destroying the atmosphere of freedom which ought to prevail in the House of Commons. I say the situation is practically the same now. What the Prime Minister thought in 1890 ought not to be a cause for Closure, has not become a cause for Closure three years afterwards in 1893, and I must say it is a strange form of political morality which first condemns in the strongest language an offence and then makes that offence itself an excuse for committing a greater. Now, let us look at the circumstances under which this Motion is being made. My right hon. Friend in his few remarks said that the House would see that this was a necessary sequel to his previous guillotine Resolution, and that he was bound by an iron chain of consequence. Sir, I entirely agree with that. The present Motion does not, in the slightest degree, surprise us. Tyranny grows by what it feeds upon. My right hon. Friend is, under that iron chain of circumstances, quite willing to go further, and we shall very shortly see him rising to closure Supply, which has never been closed in this House before, and we shall see him closing the Bills which he brings forward in the autumn. We shall have legislation by gag substituted for legislation by discussion. The Report stage of this Bill—the greatest constitutional change which has ever been proposed in the House of Commons—has occupied 10 days. Of that number seven days were occupied with new clauses, most of which dealt with entirely new matter, clauses which were so important and so valuable that the Government have accepted no fewer than six of them. The three remaining days have been occupied by the discussion on the Preamble and on the 4th clause of the Bill. The discussion on the 4th clause is not quite finished, but had there been no Closure it would not have lasted much longer. My right hon. Friend has professed in the course of our Debates that the discussion upon the Report stage has been a mere repetition of the discussion upon the Committee stage. That is not the case; the facts do not justify any such allegation. We have taken only four days over the first four clauses, the most important clauses of the Bill—those which are generally called the “operative” clauses—and over the Preamble. In Committee we took 27 days. I will come to that directly, but for the moment I merely put these two figures in contrast to show that a Debate which took four days cannot be a repetition of a Debate which took 27 days. On the contrary, the fact distinctly proves that the Opposition have followed the policy which they publicly avowed of reserving their efforts for new matter which had not been discussed, and only reviewed over again what had previously been discussed, but which had either been insufficiently explained, or as to which there was some hope that even at the last moment the Government might not be indisposed to make some concession. Twenty-seven days were spent upon the first four clauses of the Bill. [Cheers.] The right hon. Gentleman ironically cheers the efforts we have given to a measure which has practically occupied the whole of his attention during the last seven years of his life. He complains that we pay too much attention to this measure—that we treat it too seriously; but it is not open to him to say that there has been frivolous or unnecessary discussion. Again, the facts are against him; and what are they? What was the nature of this discussion that occupied so long a period? We discussed in that time 331 lines out of 1,495 lines in the Bill—less than one-fourth. Of these 331 lines 176 remain of the original text, and 155 have been amended; and if you add the subsequent Amendments by the Government, which have been added during the Report stage, and add the new clauses which have been accepted by the Government, I am putting it very moderately indeed when I say that more than half of that portion of the Bill which has been discussed is new matter introduced in Committee in consequence of the discussion which my right hon. Friend deprecates with so much warmth. I say that every one of these Amendments must have been carried with the consent of the Government and with their goodwill. We have not been able to persuade any of their followers ever to vote with us when there was the slightest chance of their defeat, even upon a trivial Amendment. Every Amendment, therefore, is an Amendment to which the Government are parties, and it is not open to them to say that these Amendments are frivolous, or that they are Amendments which were intended to destroy the Bill—although if they had been Amendments to destroy the Bill, I see no ground whatever for the argument that we were not entitled, opposed as we are to the principle of this Bill, to put down Amendments which might have that effect. Well, Sir, the figures which I have quoted show clearly that there never was a measure whose authors have been convicted of so many blunders and so many omissions. Who is there to say that what has happened in regard to the fourth of the Bill which has been discussed would not happen if you gave us the opportunity of discussing the remaining three-fourths—that by some extraordinary skill we have been able to take up only those parts of the Bill which require amendment, and that the parts which we have left undiscussed are all perfect in their original form? One-fourth of this Bill has been amended, as I have said, to the extent of one-half its total capacity. The remaining three-fourths of the Bill will be sent up to another place unhouseled and unanealed, with all its imperfections on its head. I think I have shown that the discussion which has taken place has not been without profit—profit to the Bill, profit to the Government, who have accepted those Amendments; and I say that that is a strong argument for securing that the remainder of the measure shall be submitted to the same ordeal. And yet it is under these circumstances that the Government bring forward now a second guillotining Resolution which surpasses in stringency even the one to which they last invited our attention. We are told that it is not usual on Report stage to occupy a very long portion of the time of the House. That is perfectly true; but to what great Bill can you point in the history of this Parliament—I will not say of similar importance, for there is no such Bill—but to what great Bill of magnitude and importance only one-fourth of which has been discussed during Committee stage? There was good reason, even if the Government felt themselves bound to closure the Committee stage of the Bill at the time they did, why they should have been very tender and very patient before they closed the Report stage, leaving so large a portion of their measure entirely without discussion. What is the reason which the Government vouchsafes to us for introducing into the House of Commons coercion which they themselves condemned—for committing a crime which they themselves denounced? The Government tell us, and they appeal to the House to say, that there was no alternative open to them; that absolute necessity, and absolute necessity alone, has brought them to this condition. The great Lord Chatham said that “necessity was the argument of tyrants and the creed of slaves.” We can see that this is the argument of tyrants. Whether it will be the creed of slaves we shall know after the Division. What is this necessity, this dire necessity, to which the Government appeal, and in consequence of which they commit an act which they themselves loathe, and which they know will be followed by consequences fatal to the dignity and credit of the House of Commons? The necessity has been stated by my right hon. Friend; it is that this Bill must be passed during the year of the Parliamentary Session. I would say, in passing, that I do not admit even that to be a necessity. When you are dealing with a Bill of this transcendent importance, a Bill which raises vast issues, which affects enormously the honour of Great Britain, which endangers, as we think—which, at all events, touches—the best interests of the United Kingdom, which may menace the existence of the Empire—[Laughter—I do not imagine that hon. Gentlemen opposite (the Irish Members) care about the Empire, but that there is risk has been admitted again and again by the Government in our Debates; in dealing with a Bill of this kind, that will be irrevocable if it be passed into law, a Bill which you cannot repeal except at the risk of civil war, I should have thought that time, and ample time, and all the time which an Opposition representing one of the great Parties in the State could demand, would have been willingly conceded by the Government in charge of the Bill, even if it should have been necessary in these circumstances to transfer the consideration of some portion of the measure to a second Session. But I do not believe—and I think I have some right to speak in this matter—that it would have been necessary—indeed, I am perfectly convinced, had the Government proceeded as, I believe, any other Government would have proceeded, in dealing with this matter—had they not irritated the House and made the Opposition indignant by introducing this drastic Closure, by shortening Debate upon such a measure—had they not used their temporary power to ride roughshod over the minority, I believe the discussion upon the Bill, which we ourselves should have admitted to be a full and fair discussion, might have been completed within the year. I have said before, and I say again, there never was any idea of killing this Bill by time. [Laughter, and shouts of “Oh!”] I wonder what my right hon. Friend (Mr. W. E. Gladstone), who has had this long experience of courtesies of the House of Commons, thinks of that interruption. It is not usual, it is not courteous, when a Member in his place states, as I state on my honour, that there never was any idea on the part of any responsible Member of the Opposition of killing this Bill by time—it is not usual, at all events, to disbelieve him. Why should we kill the Bill by time? We had hoped at one time, if we had not been silenced, to kill the Bill by argument. Again and again we have had the best of the argument—and the worst of the votes. We had hoped at one time to defeat the Bill by argument, and, if we could not do that, we wanted nothing more than to be able to expose the Bill, its dangers, its risks, and its weaknesses to the people, who have hitherto been kept in the dark, who know nothing of its principles and provisions, and when we had done that there would have been nothing more to do than to come to a straight issue with you. I say, then, there was no necessity for closing this Bill? You might have had your Bill. Possibly you would have had to take your Autumn Session for its consideration. But you would have had it before Christmas; and we should not then have been able to say that the Bill goes to the House of Lords three-fourths of it absolutely without discussion. No, Sir; that is not the true necessity. The real necessity lies in this—that the Government dare not stand on the measure which they have submitted. We have had reference made to the Reform Bill of 1831. It is an interesting history to compare with the history of this Bill. The Bill of 1831 was a simple measure; it dealt with one question only; it had been discussed and canvassed in every town, in every village, in every hamlet throughout the land; it was backed by the enthusiasm of a great people; and yet what would have happened if the Government of that day—if Lord Grey—had tried to pass in a single Session, not only the Reform Bill, but a Bill for local government in England, and Bills for the emancipation of slaves, for the removal of Jewish disabilities, and half-a-dozen other objects which were at that time in the programme of the Liberal Government? No, Sir; Lord Grey, when the Bill was defeated in the House of Commons, dissolved Parliament.

MR. STOREY (Sunderland): No, no!

MR. J. CHAMBERLAIN: Really, Sir, I shall have to teach my hon. Friend below me English history. When the Bill was defeated in the House of Commons Lord Grey dissolved, and he came back with a great majority; he brought in his Bill again; he devoted the whole Session to that Bill, and to no other measure of the slightest importance. It was under these circumstances, under that pressure from the country with that declared mandate, that the Bill went up to the House of Lords and was finally passed. What is the position of this Government? Have they made their great measure the one measure of a Session? No, Sir, for a good reason. Unlike Lord Grey, they know there is no enthusiasm behind it; they know there is no one in the country, or in this House, hardly anyone except the Prime Minister and, perhaps, the Chief Secretary, who believes in this Bill. I say if it ever had a chance—which I do not believe it ever had—that chance has been destroyed by the alteration of the 9th clause; it has been destroyed by the financial arrangements, which propose to mulct Great Britain in order to secure a permanent surplus to the Irish Government. For the second time the right hon. Gentleman at the head of the Government has used a majority which he obtained under other pretexts to attempt to carry a Home Rule Bill, and for the second time the publication of his proposals has destroyed his majority and discredited him in the country. If they were to go to the country to-day, they would meet with a more overwhelming defeat than they did in 1886; and it is because they know this, because their agents tell them the same thing—I should like to see the confidential reports from Hereford and from 100 boroughs and counties in the United Kingdom—it is because they know this that they want this Bill, this damnosa hereditas, hustled out of the way in order that they may patch up a damaged reputation with the Parish Councils and Local Veto Bills. We are to have an Autumn Session, not in order to carry anything—I do not believe the Government themselves are sanguine enough to believe they will get any of their measures through—but they must make a great show of doing something, or else the heterogeneous sections of their majority will soon fall to pieces. They know that every one of these great Bills which they have proposed in the same Session as the Home Rule Bill requires, and deserves, and must have, careful and elaborate criticism and examination. A short Session is not enough for any one of them, unless, indeed, encouraged by the extraordinary success which waits upon their present efforts, they should once more resort to the Closure—that they should declare that during the dictatorship of the Prime Minister there is to be no Debate in the House of Commons. Then, Sir, the Prime Minister will be able to say, in the words of an historical character to whom at one time I myself was compared—“My mouth shall be the Parliament of England.” I suppose their object will be accomplished. If they can make a great show of Bills, that is enough for their English and Scotch supporters. It is only the Irish who demand their pound of flesh. The rest of the Party are satisfied with more moderate concessions. The Government know this, and they treat them accordingly. They know that the Irish will stand no nonsense, and that the rest of their supporters will stand anything. The Prime Minister says—and nobody will dispute the proposition in its simple form—that the majority must rule. He claims for this majority a mandate from the country which he was bound to fulfil. I propose to examine this pretended mandate and this alleged majority. I deny that the Government have any mandate at all, and I say that the majority has been so much discredited that it has no moral weight whatsoever. You pretend that the Government has a mandate from the country to gag Debate in this House. When did you tell the country you intended to carry this vast change without hearing the Representatives of Great Britain on the subject? Did you tell the country you intended to destroy Parliamentary Institutions as well as the Empire? I do not remember it in any of the addresses I had the pleasure of reading. You pretend that you have a mandate for this Home Rule Bill.

MR. CHEETHAM (Oldham): Yes; so we have.

MR. J. CHAMBERLAIN: The hon. Member for Oldham answers in the affirmative. Will he answer a second question? For which of these Bills did you have a mandate? Perhaps for both of them, although they are absolutely inconsistent. You say you have a mandate for this Bill. Did you have a mandate, not only to give a Parliament to Ireland, but to enable that Parliament to control your Parliament? Why, we had the pledge and promise of your Leader—it was upon that the Election was taken: it was upon that that the country gave you whatever mandate you can boast; and now, forsooth, we are told that that mandate extends to allowing the Irish Members to be summoned here at times when they are least wanted, and to come like public executioners to guillotine the political opponents of the Government. You had a mandate! You may have had a mandate for the creation of a subordinate Legislature in Ireland, a Legislature which was compared in your utterances and your speeches to Home Rule in the villages and in London; but you had no mandate for a Parliament over which the supremacy of this Parliament will be an empty sham, and a veto which will be, as the Chief Secretary himself has admitted, a mere Court sword. Where is your mandate to tax Great Britain in order to relieve the pockets of the Irish taxpayers? These are questions upon which you want a mandate, and we beg of you to apply for it. You have confidence in the Party which returns you to power, although you have broken the pledges which you gave to them, although you have produced and are forcing through the House of Commons a Bill totally different from anything you promised. If you have that confidence, and if you will not allow us to discuss your measure, at least you might yield to an appeal, and go again to the country whom you have deceived and trampled upon. Now, what is the majority by which the Government is supported? On the last occasion it was a majority of 29 in this House, and I think it was not altogether a light-hearted majority. I am quite sure many of those who voted voted with the greatest possible reluctance. [Cries of “No!”] Did they vote with joy for the destruction of the liberties of the Parliament of which they are Members? No, I do not believe it; I think better of them. But I ask you, is this the majority which you count upon to silence a majority in Great Britain and the educated minority in Ireland? Why, Sir; it is a majority which is made up, and more than made up, of those Irish votes which you purchased by a surrender of the best interests of Great Britain. It is a majority largely returned by priests and illiterates and moonlighters. It is a majority convicted by a judicial tribunal of conspiracy to destroy the United Kingdom. It is a majority which at first forced their policy upon the Government, and which the Government are now employing to force their policy on the House of Commons. And yet, Sir, it was in regard to those gentlemen that the Prime Minister said that it would be unsafe and unsatisfactory and a danger to the Empire to deal with Home Rule unless he could have a majority independent of their votes. In any true sense of the word, I do not believe there is a majority on any single item of the Government's programme. This Government is the creation of a system which is carried further than anything similar has ever been carried before in political log-rolling. Here you have the Welshmen voting for Home Rule because they want Disestablishment for Wales. You have the teetotalers voting for Disestablishment, it may be, because they want the local veto. You have the independent Labour Party voting for everything because they want the eight hours day. And I do not believe that any of these sections cares very much for the proposals of any one of the others, and I am quite sure that there are none of them that care at all for Home Rule. And so I say that your majority is not a homogeneous majority, and I believe, such as it is, it will be swept entirely away when once more an appeal is made to those who returned them. Well, now, Sir, I will just summarise what I have put before the House. Here is a Bill which is admitted to be vital to the interests of the United Kingdom, which contains proposals of the greatest importance, most of which are absolutely new to the country, and were never discussed by the country or in the country before the Bill was brought in. Under these circumstances, I should have said that never was there a case where there was a greater necessity for close criticism and careful examination. That necessity has already been proved even by the partial Debates which in your generosity you have allowed us. The Government have altered some of their most essential proposals in important particulars and at short notice. The Bill of which this can be said is also the great main issue between the two Parties in the House. And yet the Government are unwilling to give a Session to its consideration; and, knowing it is unpopular, finding that discussion is making it more unpopular still, they trample on the liberties of the House of Commons, and they gag the opponents they are unable to answer. The result is that three-fourths of the Bill will go up to the House of Lords exactly as it left the hands of its author, without consideration either by friend or by foe. Questions of the deepest import to Great Britain will not even be voted upon, for by this last form of Closure, for the first time in the history of these proceedings, the Amendments are not even to be put from the Chair; they are not even to be considered or decided by a vote of this House, and this unparalleled, this unprecedented act of tyranny is being carried out because time is wanting for full discussion, not of the Home Rule Bill, but of those other measures which the Government is advised they must do something to promote in order to conceal and confuse the issue before the country. In the course of his long career my right hon. Friend has often exercised an influence which has been fatal to some of those great institutions which from time to time he has taken under his special protection; this night will consummate and crown his work. To destroy an Empire, to punish England for not having given to him a majority, to break up the Party to which, after all, even his fame and reputation owe a great deal—these are not enough for the First Lord of the Treasury; he must also stifle discussion and humiliate the House of Commons, which has always honoured him as one of its greatest figures. We appeal against the Prime Minister to what is greater and more powerful than he is. We appeal to the country against this political dictatorship, against the policy by which the interests of Great Britain have been surrendered and betrayed, against the tactics by which the House of Commons has been insulted and degraded.

Amendment proposed,

To leave out from the word "That," to the end of the Question, in order to add the words "the proposal of the Government to curtail Debate on the Government of Ireland Bill is calculated to degrade the House of Commons to the position of a voting machine, and to deprive the majority in this House of its Constitutional right to discuss a policy by which British interests will be seriously and injuriously affected; and that this House, recognising no necessity for the course proposed by the Government, and believing that it is dictated by motives of Party expediency, declines to accept a Resolution by which the Government arbitrarily claim to limit Debate on a measure of the highest National importance, the greater part of which has already been forced through the stage of Committee without any discussion,"—(Mr. J. Chamberlain), —instead thereof.

Question proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Question."

*MR. S. WHITBREAD (Bedford): Sir, I ask permission upon this occasion, following immediately after the right hon. Gentleman who has just addressed us, to say a few words upon this subject, and I promise one thing, and that is that I will not take advantage of this opportunity to make a Third Reading speech, and I will endeavour not to imitate him in heat of language. I will further endeavour not to imitate him in that exhibition of affection for his former Leader and for the great principle of Home Rule, to which he was a convert long before the Prime Minister, and which he has maintained—ah! how faithfully! ever since. I have never concealed from my friends my reluctance to adopt the Closure until a positive and over-mastering necessity for it has arisen. I do not think Closure is the natural weapon of Liberalism. We must always hope to advance our views by discussion. It may be a weapon good enough for those who desire to let things remain as they are, and for their Liberal allies; but it is not a good weapon for those who desire to make new ideas prevail. Another reason which makes me more chary of setting any example of voting for Closure is that the Liberal Party are unequally matched in this respect. Closure to us at the best means the passing of a measure through this House; with the Conservative Party it means the inscription of a measure on the Statute Book. We have no allies or a majority in another place upon whom we can depend. Moreover, if Closure comes to be frequently and upon too light grounds resorted to, it is quite certain that the laws we pass would lose their sanction, and would cease to be accepted as hitherto they have been by the people. With that reluctance, however, there is one other consideration that must govern, and it is this—that in the last resort it is necessary—absolutely vital—to insure that the will of the majority shall have its way. If once you break down that, the whole legislative action of Parliament is gone. The right hon. Gentleman has in the most solemn way given his assurance that there never was the least idea amongst Leaders of the Opposition of killing this Bill by time. I am bound to accept that assurance; but will the right hon. Gentleman assure me with the same confidence that there never was any intention to consume the time of the House on this Bill for the purpose of killing other Bills? Our complaint is that, in order to prevent the Government from introducing or carrying anything else, time has been so consumed on this Bill that the Government have been taunted that they will not be able to carry any of their measures for the public benefit in an Autumn Session. We shall see. The right hon. Gentleman said that the precedents in 1887 and before for the use of the Closure do not apply to this case. No; and I imagine that there is no conceivable Bill upon which the Closure could be moved that the same argument against its application could not be used. No two Bills ever have been, or ever will be, on all fours in that respect. But though the precedents are not on all-fours there are other things to be considered. Principles have been laid down by very able exponents of Parliamentary practice, and I think the right hon. Gentleman will find it rather difficult to say that their arguments do not apply in the present case. My right hon. Friend's attitude now is something new. Since I have known the right hon. Gentleman, I have believed that his leaning was to have measures for the benefit of the country fully discussed outside, and then registered after a short discussion in this House. I have been evidently quite mistaken. I do not know whether it made any difference in the view of the right hon. Gentleman that the headquarters of the Caucus migrated from Birmingham to London. Possibly there is something in the fact that the right hon. Gentleman is now in Opposition and that he was then supporting the Government. The right hon. Gentleman claimed that the whole of the Debates on the Bill have been relevant, and the whole of the Amendments in Order. No doubt they have. If they had not been they would have been stopped by the guardian of Order in the Chair—no thanks to my right hon. Friend for that. But a man may never offend against the Order of Debate; his Amendments may be all strictly relevant; he may never incur the censure of the Chair; and he may, at the same time, be guilty of flat treason against the representative system. My right hon. Friend may hold himself out as the zealous champion of free speech and of liberty of Debate, and the whole time he may be sucking the very lifeblood out of this Assembly. I do not understand what the right hon. Gentleman meant by a British majority. There is no such thing. I only know of one majority. [Mr. J. CHAMBERLAIN: The Irish.] I know of no term such as the British majority. I suppose the right hon. Gentleman means the majority of those returned from England. [Mr. J. CHAMBERLAIN: And Scotland.] Have they rights superior to those of the Members returned from Ireland? If not, there is no use, as far as this House is concerned, in talking of the British majority. Matters in this House will be decided by the votes of those who are entitled to vote. The right hon. Gentleman said that this proposal degraded Parliament. Did it degrade Parliament in 1887? What does degrade Parliament is unseemly conduct, idleness, and neglect of the public welfare. The corruption of Members, as in times past, degrades Parliament. But all these things can be cured as long as there is a vital energy left in this House which is able to ensure the coming to a decision. But can you picture a lower depth of degradation than a House not instructed by debate, but so overlain by the everlasting flow of words that it fails at last to be able to come to any decision at all? That would be paralysis; that would be the end—the very reason for the existence of this House would be gone. I think it is now time to avert the danger which has threatened the House and to come to its rescue. The right hon. Gentleman says we have no mandate from the country. If at the last Election we had a mandate for anything under the sun it certainly was for Home Rule. [Mr. J. CHAMBERLAIN: Which Home Rule?] The right hon. Gentleman says “Which Home Rule?” He knew very well the main outlines, the main features, of the Bill. [Mr. J. CHAMBERLAIN made a gesture of dissent.] My right hon. Friend dissents from that. Why, he complained of the exclusion of the Irish Members very skilfully in 1886. The right hon. Gentleman himself was the main cause of the change of attitude on that point. He looked in 1886 like a child crying for the moon, but he has got his moon, and he is no more satisfied now than he was then. The only thing that will satisfy the right hon. Gentleman, ardent Home Ruler as he is, will be a Home Rule Bill introduced by himself—one that would not provide for Home Rule. This contest has not been a hole-and-corner affair; it has been watched with the keenest interest by the whole country. It has brought Members in larger numbers and kept them in closer attendance than has happened on any question in my recollection. It has excited feeling more deeply than any question in Parliament of late years, even to such a point that in a moment of madness some have forgotten what was due to the great traditions and honour of this House. The right hon. Gentleman even made it a matter of reproach to the Government that some of the Amendments accepted by them have been made at the suggestion of himself and his friends. The conduct of the Bill on the Ministerial side has been mainly in the hands of half-a-dozen men. [Opposition cheers.] Yes; but the supporters of the Bill were not going to assist gentlemen in consuming time for the purpose of preventing the Government from doing anything else. We have seen in one whose services and years might have well excused him this tremendous labour—we have seen such skill, such energy, such temper displayed in the conduct of the Bill as has compelled the respect of opponents as well as friends, and extorted their admiration. And now do hon. Gentlemen really tell the House that they honestly desire more time for the discussion of this Bill? What a shadow of blank dismay would fall upon those Benches if the Prime Minister got up and said that he had changed his mind and would not move this Resolution! The aspect of the House during the last week has not looked as if there is any overweening desire for more time. Would hon. Members themselves say that they would give more than 80 days to the discussion of any measure? Has the House of Commons at any period ever given such a length of time to the discussion of a Bill, however important? Would any Assembly in the world give half the time to it? The answer to every one of those questions must be "No," and therein lies the justification of Her Majesty's Government. I have no doubt when the question is decided you will go down to the country and proclaim the iniquity of the Government. [Mr. JESSE COLLINGS: Hear, hear!] Oh, yes; my right hon. Friend the Member for the Bordesley Division cheers that. He is never tired of telling us that on leaving this House he will go through the villages. Let him go through the villages. He will go in at one end of the village and go out at the other, and when he has gone the villagers will be asking themselves the same question as now, and that is—"Why did the Government not do this long ago"? I have not the slightest fear as to what the verdict of the country will be. My right hon. Friend, and those who go with him to the country, I know, will tell the truth; but I want them to tell the whole truth. Do not let them say that there are 26 or 30 pages of Amendments that have not been discussed yet, and that a large portion of this Bill has never been discussed at all, without saying that the House of Commons gave nearly twice as much time to the fair discussion of the Bill as has ever been given before; and if my right hon. Friend will tell the whole truth that way, then I think, Sir, we need not trouble ourselves very much to ask for a reply.

Mr. S. Whitbread

MR. GOSCHEN (St. George's, Hanover Square): Mr. Speaker, I am sure that we may welcome the intervention of my hon. Friend the Member for Bedford in this Debate. My hon. Friend told us he was not going to make a Third Reading speech; and if I recollect rightly the hon. Member—who is one of the oldest Members of this House—has neither made a First Reading nor a Second Reading speech, and I think he has not guided us in the slightest degree in Committee. And why? Because he did not wish to occupy the time of the House. But to-day, when the Government wish for a kind of Constitutional argument, the hon. Member intervenes for the first time in order to prevent "treason," as he says, to representative institutions. This is the occasion when the hon. Member thinks that he must intervene. Those who know him would have thought that the probability was that he would intervene in order to protest against that which, whatever he may say, we, at all events, consider to be the degradation of the House of Commons. The hon. Member pointed with some triumph to the fact that during August the attendance in this House on this Bill has not been as considerable as it might have been, his inference being that the interest taken in the Bill has diminished. I say, on the other hand, that it is perfectly marvellous that in August there should have been such large Houses during the greater part of the month, and I affirm that such exceptional attendance proves how great an interest is taken in this measure. The hon. Member speaks of the waning interest of the Bill. I will throw out a challenge—he has made several to us. Let the Government devote the Autumn Sitting to the remainder of this measure instead of to Supply, and then the hon. Member will see whether there is any diminution of interest in this Bill. But the hon. Member is prepared to vote for the Closure, which he detests, rather than have an Autumn Sitting for the continuation of our proceedings on this Bill. That is the extent of his objection. He dealt with some of the arguments of my right hon. Friend; but he took good care not to reply to the question why it is necessary to complete this measure now. Why do the Government think it necessary? Because they wish to pass other measures, or, rather, to show other measures to the constituencies. Just as at the beginning of this controversy they wasted time in moving Bills as to which there was no belief that they could be passed, so towards the end of it we are again to go through the same process. The Government declare that to pass the Home Rule Bill is an iron necessity. But the iron necessity, as my right hon. Friend pointed out, was not to present this Bill alone to the country—this Bill for which the hon. Member for Bedford said they have a mandate. That is an argument with which hon. Gentlemen opposite are unable to deal. Then, will this Bill satisfy the constituencies? If it represents the union of hearts, if it is the crowning glory of the career of my right hon. Friend opposite, if it is to end the controversies of 100 years, is it not a sufficient present to make to the constituencies? Why do the Government think it insufficient? Because they are aware that the constituencies do not value the Bill as much as they value some of the other Bills which the Government wish to pass. It is hypocrisy to say that there is any iron necessity. The Prime Minister and the hon. Member for Bedford have spoken of the number of days that have been devoted to this Bill, and have asked whether any previous Bill has ever occupied anything like the same time. What is the answer? Why, that this is not one Bill, but an assemblage of Bills. I could count, at least, 16 Bills here, every one of which would deserve a month's consideration. The Prime Minister said, on one occasion, that a Bill dealing with the Death Duties would require a whole Session to pass. But upon this Bill, which contains so many different issues, we are not to bestow even a whole Session. The Bill deals with such difficult and complicated subjects as the constitution of a Second Chamber, the relations between the Executives of England and Ireland, the establishment of new Courts, the separation of the Exchequers of England and Ireland, the Land Question, the Irish Civil Service, and the re-constitution of the Constabulary. I do not understand how hon. Members opposite, and such an old Parliamentarian as the hon. Member for Bedford, cannot see that it is impossible to treat a measure of this kind like any other

Bill which has ever been before this Parliament. Do they not see that the interlacing of interests between England and Ireland are so close that the whole machinery must be taken to pieces with the greatest care before you can adjust the interests of the one or the other? The hon. Member for Bedford says that there has been everlasting talking. I say, on the contrary, that, speaking generally, the speeches in Committee have been remarkable for brevity, and that the privilege of speaking more than once has been seldom used. The length of the discussion on this Bill is by no means excessive when we examine the vast number of propositions it contains. Hon. Members opposite have not attempted to point out where there has been that waste of time which they allege. I say that as much time has been spent by the Prime Minister and others in personal attacks upon the right hon. Member for West Birmingham as we have spent on the discussion of some Amendments which have been vital to the interests of the country. Another reason why the discussions have been long is found in the frequent alterations that have been made in the Bill. Thus a great deal of time spent on the Second Reading in discussing the finance of the measure was wasted because the financial proposals were afterwards changed; and similarly, in connection with the 9th clause, a great deal of time was wasted. That is a question upon which we might have been entitled to hear the views of my hon. Friend the Member for Bedford. I think he might have given us his views upon the proposal to put the whole of our Parliamentary proceedings under the control of the Irish Members; but he remained silent on that point, as many other hon. Members on his side of the House, waiting for the signal to be given from the Treasury Bench. And here we can illustrate the methods followed in these Debates. The important speeches made on the Government's own side—such as that of the hon. Member for East Edinburgh (Mr. R. Wallace), for instance—were left as entirely unanswered and without reply as the speeches that were made on this side of the House. A third reason for the prolongation of these Debates has been the manner in which we have been treated by Her Majesty's Government, and the way in which the Debates have been conducted by them. Sometimes they have been altogether silent when we have asked for explanations. It has been necessary sometimes for four or five of us to rise in succession before we could get any explanation. Then, again, quite unexpectedly and on some minor Amendment, the Prime Minister would rise and make an interesting excursion into old Irish history, or entertain the House by most interesting reminiscences, or make a violent attack upon hon. Members sitting on these Benches, conceived in the style which illustrated the calm temper attributed to him by the hon. Member for Bedford; and in that way the time of the House would again be occupied. I would also point out a very curious fact, and that is this—that whenever the guillotine has been moved, and whenever hon. Members opposite knew the precise point at which it would be reached, there was immediately a commencement of interesting speeches from hon. Members from Ireland and hon. Members opposite. They felt, as we feel, that discussion was necessary, yet they repressed discussion; but whenever an opportunity was given, when, without trenching on the time of the Government they might have their say on the Bill, then many interesting revelations were made. I need only point to what happened within the last two or three days, when there was a most interesting discussion on Irish Universities. Was the time spent upon that wasted? If we had not raised the Amendment, that discussion would not have taken place. Then, again, there was the question of bounties. So soon as we raised the question and the Government made it known that these proceedings were to be brought to an end at a given time, hon. Members on their own side got up and spoke of the danger of bounties being given. I quote this to show the necessity and wisdom of discussion even from the point of view of Her Majesty's Government. Their complaint is that the discussions have been too long. My right hon. Friend called attention to the Amendments that had been accepted, and said that their acceptance had been made a matter of reproach to the Government. Not at all—there has been no reproach in what has been said. What was said was this—that it showed the necessity for discussion. The fact is that it is a crude Bill, and its crudeness has been exhibited during the whole of the proceedings upon it; and hon. Members opposite cannot persuade me that they do not recognise that there must be a strong motive on our part to show the country the character of the problem the Government have proposed, and the character of the solution they propose. We believe that these discussions will, to a large extent, show the insoluble character of the Home Rule problem. No one denies the great ability of the Prime Minister and his colleagues; but what the country will see—and what, perhaps, the agricultural labourers will see—is that the Government, with all their cleverness and with all their resources, have not been able to submit a Bill that will hold water after argument; that so soon as it was argued, even hon. Members from Ireland began to expose the weak points in the Bill; and that it was only by the use of the gag that they are able to meet the arguments of their opponents. Have we not a right to hope that we shall hear the Irish Members on this Bill? Does not the future of the Bill—does not its finality—depend a great deal on the opinion of it held by the Irish Members? It was important, therefore, that we should hear their criticisms; and if the Government have given any sort of intimation to the Irish Members that time should not be spent in discussion, I say they have defrauded the people of the country of the proper opportunities of ascertaining the light in which this Bill would be regarded by them. I say that whether you look at the importance of the Bill, whether you look at the number of the issues contained in it, whether you look at the changes made in the course of our proceedings or at the extraordinary manner in which the Government have thought it right to conduct these discussions, you will find that the responsibility for bringing this discreditable gag upon the House lies at the door of the right hon. Gentleman opposite and his supporters. Hon. Gentlemen opposite boast of not having taken part in these discussions. They did not begin to discuss it even in Committee. It was a premeditated conspiracy of silence. It was not that they thought that we were spending too much time on the Bill, and that, therefore, they would refrain from intervention. From the beginning there has been a conspiracy of silence. My hon. Friend the Member for Bedford taunts the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Bordesley (Mr. Jesse Collings), and says that if he went through one of the villages to which he alluded from one end to the other the agricultural labourers would not know much of this question. Well, there was a Colleague of the right hon. Gentleman's, the hon. Member for South Tyrone, who made an expedition, not through a village, but through a town, and we do not observe that that journey was so barren of results as the hon. Member for Bedford thinks it will be. We think the country will understand this method of proceeding. Hon. Members opposite seem, many of them, not like the hon. Member for Bedford. The hon. Member for Bedford, at all events, has the feeling to say that he dislikes this Closure, and he told the House that it was a painful moment for him to rise and speak with regard to it; but other hon. Members seem to revel in the composition of the gag. Whether you hold it is our fault, or whether it is yours, at all events we should have thought that those right hon. Gentlemen who have been long responsible for taking a leading part in this House would not like the violent cheers of hon. Members below the Gangway and of their younger supporters behind them, who, perhaps, have whipped them into the necessity of proposing this Motion. The right hon. Gentleman the Prime Minister said, towards the close of his speech, that this was a question whether the minority should have its way or the majority. He said that was a matter as deeply important even as the Home Rule Bill itself. I am inclined to share that view with him. This proposal, as was shown by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Birmingham, is made in absolutely different circumstances to that of 1887. This proposal is certainly one of the most momentous ever submitted to Parliament. The Prime Minister said that it was a necessary sequel to the last. I should have thought it possible that the experience of the last step of this sort that he took might have warned him against the present. Are he and his supporters perfectly indifferent to the fact, or do they rejoice in the fact—and, to judge from the cheers with which they met his Motion, they rejoice in it—are they indifferent to the fact that under this proposal it will be impossible to discuss the financial relations between the two countries? Are they glad to escape from the discussion of the 37th clause relating to the land? Are they glad? They may be glad in one sense, but in another they must feel that they are delivering a blow at the efficiency of Parliament and the morale of Parliament, from which they may never recover. Supposing that it was our precedent which prompted you to set up this further precedent, then with what terror must we not look upon the future and the further action which may be taken on the strength of the action you initiate to-day, if, in a Bill of this kind, with the question of finance undiscussed, with the question of the land undiscussed, with all these vast questions undiscussed, you are content, though you have the opportunity of an Autumn Sitting before you in which they could be discussed—you are content to impose this gag on the House of Commons to-night? What are we to hope for the future of this Parliament? It is a far greater question than the political issue now between us, grave as that issue is. At that fair play which has always been valued so much throughout the whole of Great Britain and Ireland you are striking a blow from which it may never recover. If Parliament sets such an example it will affect the whole public life of this country. In these strong measures that you are taking to-night I see future political trouble—I see a change in the whole spirit in which public affairs may be approached in every part of the country, unless, indeed, as we hope and believe, the country will condemn you for this step you are taking to-night. They will condemn you for having introduced into Parliament a slavery against which I trust the public will revolt. We, at all events, are prepared to go to the country on such an issue as that. We do not envy our political opponents at the next Election their cry of "Gladstone and the gag!" I honestly and profoundly sympathise with some of my right hon. Friends on the Treasury Bench. They have been driven into these proceedings. They must feel with me that this new principle may not only affect the Home Rule Party, but may have consequences on the future public life of England which we should all deeply regret. The Government have so little confidence in their Home Rule Bill, especially now that it is to be forced down the throat of the country with the gag, that they cannot—they dare not—go to the country upon it. They dare not spend the Autumn Session upon it, because they must have some other measures which will sweeten the dose the country is asked to swallow. The hon. Member for Bedford (Mr. Whitbread) said, in the most solemn tones—"I do not know what is the British majority." Of course, he was cheered by the Chancellor of the Exchequer (Sir W. Harcourt), who always says, when the question of the British majority is brought up—"That is a nice argument to come from you, who are Unionists." Yes; but there is another term which has sometimes entered the ears of the hon. Member, and which certainly ought to have struck the ears of the Chancellor of the Exchequer, and that is "the Irish majority." If there is no British majority, of course there is no Irish majority. It is the Irish majority to which my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister always appeals, as having given the decisive and last voice on Home Rule. Home Rule was determined upon when the Irish majority spoke at the Election of 1886. The British majority, however, is never to be heard alone. We may have as large a majority as we like, but it is always to be tempered by the Irish majority. I ask whether that is reciprocity? Of course, we have ceased to look to the Treasury Bench for any kind of reciprocity in this matter. There does not sit on that Bench a single right hon. Gentleman who ever rises to protest on behalf of the British majority. When they know the British majority is against them they say—"You must throw in our Irish allies." How strange it is that they cannot hear the separate voice of Great Britain when their ears are so open to the separate voice of Ireland! I think that the British majority, when it is brought face to face with the question of the disavowance of the old partnership, the old association, the old union, will say that such disavowance cannot take place without having a ma-majority in its favour in Great Britain as well as in Ireland. The country will not permit this question to be solved simply by a majority which would be a minority if the 80 Irish Members were not included in it. [Ministerial ironical cheers.] Yes, the Irishmen shall have their full voice with us while we remain a united Parliament. The cheering of right hon. Gentlemen opposite induces me to ask, in the language of the Prime Minister, how must that intellect be constituted which cannot conceive that if the Irish majority counts for something the British majority must also count for something? We do not make the separation. We say, let us all continue to act together. The point, however, I wish to submit to the House is this—that it is the country which must decide between us. You do not wish to take an issue on this Bill, even associated as it is with your changed method of Parliamentary procedure; but our Parliamentary traditions are to be broken in order that the Government may find time to pass other measures on which the majority of their own supporters are not united. You rob us of the necessary time for discussing this Bill, because it would have been perfectly possible to have debated the Bill to the end. I do not believe that you will be forgotten by the country for that which I consider to be the greatest inroad upon Parliamentary liberty which has ever been made by a Government.

*MR. T. W. RUSSELL (Tyrone, S.) said, the hon. Member for Bedford (Mr. Whitbread) had been good enough to tell Unionists that when they went to the country they ought to be careful to tell not only the truth, but the whole truth. Speaking for himself, he should certainly take the advice tendered by the hon. Member, and he hoped the hon. Gentleman would allow him to tender him a little advice also. On that night week the friends of the hon. Member were engaged in the City of Hereford in circulating a leaflet from house to house declaring in plain black and white that under the Home Rule Bill 80 Irish Members were to be retained, but that they were not to have the power to vote on British subjects. The friends of the hon. Member for Bedford would, therefore, be all the better for a little looking after in matters of this kind. He had another thing to say to the hon. Member for Bedford. The Unionists were not afraid of going to the country on this Bill. The Gladstonian Party, on the other hand, were afraid of discussing it in the country. The best proof he could give of this was that at the recent Hereford election the Gladstonians did not discuss the Bill at all. Directly the son of the Prime Minister appeared on the scene he dragged a Railway Committee three years old across the track in the vain hope of getting some 300 railway votes. The Government maintained that they had a mandate from the country with regard to this Bill. He could understand them saying that the constituencies had the Home Rule Question in the abstract before them at the General Election. Covered up as it was, dodged by many as it was, he was willing to admit that in the abstract the question was more or less before the country at the General Election. If anyone, however, said he had a mandate in favour of the Bill, he (Mr. Russell) was bound to ask in respect of what Bill was the mandate given? The House had had before it two or three Home Rule Bills this Session. Would any British Member say he had received from his constituents a mandate for the subjection of England to the Nationalist Members? There was not a Member in the House who did not know that that was a matter which was incapable of defence on a public platform in Great Britain. If the Government thought they would cram such a monstrous proposition down the throats of the British electors, as they had crammed it down the throat of the House of Commons, they were entirely mistaken. The Prime Minister could gag the House, but he could not gag the electors. Fortunately it was the country and not the right hon. Gentleman that would have the last word. The argument that the Government had a mandate would not justify them in destroying the liberties of the House of Commons. He wished to refer to the subjects that had been left totally or partially undiscussed in Committee. Clause 5 set up an Executive Authority in Ireland and defined its powers. This was a totally new thing. Grattan's Parliament had no Executive responsible to it, and yet, important as the subject was, it had only received one or two hours' discussion in Committee. Clause 6 defined the constitution of the two Houses of the Irish Legislature. Not a word had been said in regard to that clause. Clause 9 provided for the representation of Ireland in the Imperial Parliament. That clause, which he ventured to call the "subjection of England Clause," and which was a perfect revolution in itself, was passed after six hours of discussion, having previously been kept secret. Clauses 10 to 20 contained the financial proposals of the Bill. Hon. Members all knew their history, frequently they had been altered, and how slightly they had been discussed. Clauses 20 and 21 dealt with the transfer of the Postal and Savings Banks Service, and had not had a word of discussion. Clauses 22 and 23 set up a Supreme Court for the decision of Constitutional questions. That was a thing which had never before been done in the history of this country, and yet it had been passed without a syllable of discussion. Clause 24 opened the office of Lord Lieutenant of Ireland to Roman Catholics, and ought to have been discussed. Clauses 30 to 41 contained miscellaneous and transitory provisions, many of them of great importance, including the reservation of the Land Question to the Imperial Parliament for three years. The Land Question lay at the bottom of the whole Irish trouble, and yet the clause had been passed without a word of discussion. Seven Schedules had also been rushed through the House without discussion. One of them was a Reform Bill in itself. He ventured to tell the Prime Minister that no greater outrage had ever been perpetrated upon any people than that for which the right hon. Gentleman was responsible in regard to the Second Schedule.

MR. W. E. GLADSTONE: Yes; there is one greater outrage.

MR. T. W. RUSSELL: What is it?

MR. W. E. GLADSTONE: The Schedule proposed by the hon. Member himself.

*MR. T. W. RUSSELL said, it was quite true that he had brought forward a Schedule. Would the right hon. Gentleman give him time to discuss it? He would tell the right hon. Gentleman what his (Mr. Russell's) proposal was, and what was the Government proposal.

The right hon. Gentleman had declared his anxiety to give the Irish minority fair play in every way, and to protect them as much as possible. The Government Schedule would leave the Irish minority in this House represented by 14 or 15 seats out of 80. ["Oh, oh!"] Let the hon. Member for North Kerry take up the Schedule and examine it for himself?

MR. SEXTON: I have.

MR. T. W. RUSSELL: I say that from that you may calculate that the Unionist representation would be 14 or 15.

MR. SEXTON: More likely 20.

*MR. T. W. RUSSELL said, that if it were in Order he could show that the Schedule would give a representation of 14 or 15. His (Mr. Russell's) Schedule would have abolished the representation of the wretched Nationalist boroughs of Newry, Galway, and Kilkenny——

MR. W. REDMOND: No more wretched than County Tyrone.

*MR. T. W. RUSSELL said, he did not mean that the boroughs themselves were wretched, but that the constituencies were wretched in point of numbers as compared with the counties. The right hon. Gentleman had carefully given three Members to each of the counties in the South of Ireland with 20,000 electors, whilst he reduced the number of Members for Northern Counties with 26,000 electors——

*MR. SPEAKER: The hon. Member is not entitled to go into the Schedule.

*MR. T. W. RUSSELL said, it was because it had been impossible on every occasion to discuss the Schedule that he was tempted to violate what he knew to be the Rule of Order in the matter. At any rate, he ventured to say that the Prime Minister in forcing the Schedule through the House without a word of debate had been guilty of one of the greatest outrages ever perpetrated upon Ireland. He did not care what the right hon. Gentleman called his Schedule. He had the whole of the Protestant population of Ulster behind him in the matter; and so long as he had that, he cared little for what the right hon. Gentleman thought of his language. That was the position they were in at the present moment. And what was all this done for? Was it because there was any urgency for the Bill? Why, in the very text of the measure it was provided that it was not to come into operation until September 1, 1894. What was the hon. Member for Bedford so anxious about? Did he desire the Local Veto Bill to come on—a Bill which he (Mr. Russell) approved of, but in connection with which he could not help noticing the accustomed methods of the Government. They were going to the country with a cry of local option, but they were bringing in the Irish Members to coerce the people of England—it might be, to deny them their right of local option. These things were done for Party expediency. The Government knew that their Home Rule Bill would not carry them through the General Election, and they desired to pad out their case with other measures. That, and that alone, was the cause of these extraordinary proceedings by which the liberties of Englishmen were being destroyed, and precedents were being set up which the Party in power would live to regret. He protested against the Bill, and against the procedure by which it was being thrust through the House. He maintained that that procedure was unprecedented. It was useless to say that the procedure on the Crimes Act of 1887 was a precedent for the present procedure. The precedent did not lie in a single particular. As a matter of fact the Bill was being pressed on not because it was required by the people of England, but in the attempt to rush through other measures which would have a better chance of keeping the Members of the present Government on the Front Ministerial Bench.

*SIR G. CHESNEY (Oxford) said, that hitherto he had but seldom intervened in this Debate which had been conducted with so much efficiency on the Opposition side of the House; but as a private Member he should like to be allowed, in discharge of his duty to his constituents, to record his protest against the manner in which the voting upon the Report stage of the Bill was being forced upon the House. The present attitude of the Prime Minister showed how rapid was the course of political degeneracy when once an evil path was entered upon. The wonder to him was that the indignation which so many private Members felt at the high-handed action of the Government was not more loudly expressed than it had been. As a new Member, he sometimes found it hard to think that they were sitting in the famous House of Commons, the birth-place of liberty and free Debate. When he saw the course pursued by the Prime Minister he asked himself whether this was, indeed, to be the outcome of 250 years of free Debate—that this Bill, which had been thrown before them with hardly a word of explanation, with all its complicated, confusing, and often contradictory clauses, should be pushed through on a specified night, while a great part of it still remained without any discussion or Debate whatever. As a precedent for his proposal the Prime Minister ventured to refer to the Crimes Act of 1887; but to say that what was done in connection with that Act was any precedent for what was being done now was simply to trifle with the intelligence of the House. The Crimes Bill was a short, simple measure. [Laughter.] The right hon. Gentleman opposite (Mr. Mundella) laughed. Well, the measure was a simple one. It was framed to deal with one particular class of crime, and, moreover, before the Closure was introduced all the essential clauses of the Bill have already been passed. The Closure was only introduced when there was most obvious and plain obstruction in connection with the details of the Bill, which were really of no essential importance. [Laughter.] Yes; but what was the case with the present measure? Every clause was a Bill in itself, and to pass any one of them without fair Debate and discussion was a great Constitutional revolution; nothing less. But, nevertheless, it was the will of the Prime Minister; therefore, that was the procedure adopted by a small and unwilling, and certainly very uneasy, majority. Take only one clause—that under which the Irish Members were to come back in full power, if not in full numbers, to the Imperial Parliament. It brought about an entire change in the character of the Bill. Not only that, but the whole of the financial arrangements had been entirely changed since the Bill was first introduced. Possibly the supporters of the Prime Minister might find comfort in believing that the political degeneracy observable in the Government extended to the people, and that, therefore, the latter were prepared to accept a demagogue Dictator. But it was the solace of the Opposition to believe that a very different issue would arise. For his own part, he believed that the English people were slow to withdraw their confidence when it had once been given; but when they found out that they had been misled and deceived; that the measure which was passing through the House was an altogether different one from that which had been put before the country, and that, so far from getting rid of the Irish Question, and being able to turn their attention to all the pressing reforms which had been so long neglected, they would still have the Irish Question before them, in a new, and more acute, and more embittered form, he believed that they would execute judgment upon those who had abused their trust. He hoped and believed that then they would get rid of Home Rule for ever. Home Rule would be looked upon as a bad dream. But what would be the effect upon the political future of the country—would the House of Commons recover from this degradation? This was by no means equally certain; and, therefore, in this last act of the Constitutional drama—rather he would say of this political farce—he desired to put on record an expression of his dislike for the proposal of the Government, and an expression of opinion that the verdict of the House and of posterity in the long run would be that no one had done more than the present Prime Minister to degrade the House of Commons and to bring Parliamentary Institutions into contempt.

MR. BODKIN (Roscommon, N.) said, he would wish to remind the House of the remarks of a great statesman and great orator whom they had heard that day. He wished to appeal from Philip Tory to Philip Radical—he presumed it would be unparliamentary to use another Christian name. He wished to remind them of a speech delivered in 1885 by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Birmingham (Mr. J. Chamberlain) under somewhat similar circumstances, but when there was no such suggestion of obstruction as on the present occasion. The right hon. Gentleman then said—

"By the abuse of its Rules and of the liberty of free speech this great historic Assembly has been reduced to a condition of impotence and inability for which we ought to find an immediate remedy. When this great implement of the national will is rendered powerless the whole of our Constitutional system is brought into disreput, and it would be of very little use for us to plume ourselves on the reforms in the representation that we have just accomplished, if, after all, Parliament is not to regain its full power over its own Debates and its own legislation."

Then the right hon. Gentleman went on to speak of obstruction by the House of Lords ; but bearing in mind Mr. Speaker's ruling in connection with that question, he (Mr. Bodkin) would not quote the right hon. Gentleman's remarks in that connection. The right hon. Gentleman, however, concluded—

"Obstruction, whether in the House of Lords or in the House of Commons, plays the game of the Tories."

That was as true, or more true now than it was then, and the right hon. Gentleman who now declaimed against the Closure was the gentleman who advocated it so strongly. He had not the exact reference to this speech of the right hon. Gentleman, but it was delivered in 1885, and the right hon. Gentleman and his friends would be able to identify it by certain expressions. It was in that speech that he alluded to

"the oracular persons who sit on the fence and slang the man at the plough."

It was in that speech also that he alluded to the right hon. Gentleman the ex-Chancellor of the Exchequer as "the skeleton of the Egyptian feast," and as "being more Tory than the Tories themselves." Possibly those more candid views of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Birmingham might have some effect on the minds of the Tories who now followed his guidance in the House of Commons. They were told that 1887 was no precedent for the present case. It was not an exact precedent, but it was a precedent that not merely covered but overlapped the present case. If the implement was good enough to take away the liberties of the people in 1887, it was good enough to restore them now. A man was once attacked by another with a life preserver and knocked down. He got up again, however ; took the weapon from his assailant, and struck him in return with it, when the latter exclaimed that it was a shame to strike a poor fellow with a thing like that. The Closure was a weapon forged by Tory hands, and it could not now be helped if they did not like the taste of their own medicine. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Birmingham, in a moment of unusual candour, had himself admitted that the Bill might have been discussed in an ordinary Session if he and his friends had not been irritated. The right hon. Gentleman himself was responsible for the irritation. There had been ample time to discuss the Bill fairly. The function of the House of Commons was to give effect to the will of the people, who had declared in favour of an Irish Legislature, with an Executive dependent upon it. The question was whether they were to be permitted to carry out this mandate, or whether the time of the House was to be wasted with the eloquence which had flowed so freely, and which, if permitted, like the brook in Tennyson's poem, would have flowed on "for ever" from the Tory Benches ?

MR. RADCLIFFE COOKE (Hereford) said, that as he had had the honour of being just returned to the House with an undoubted mandate, he thought it was not unlikely that his constituents would like him to inform the House what that mandate was. He had listened with attention to the hon. Member for Bedford (Mr. S. Whitbread), and he was pleased to notice that the hon. Member still pursued the course he used to follow when he (Mr. Cooke) was in the House before, and threw the glamour of his respectability over matters of doubtful character. The hon. Member had challenged the right hon. Member for Bordesley (Mr. Jesse Collings) to go through the villages and test the opinion of the inhabitants on Home Rule. Well, he himself had just been through the villages—for Hereford was more or less a county constituency ; he had had to canvass the villages, and the answer that he got from the inhabitants of Hereford and the surrounding villages was that they would have nothing whatever to do with the Bill. But he had learned something more. He had learned that the opinion of those who had stated in the House to-night that the country had not been fully informed what the real nature of Home Rule was at the General Election was the true one. The late Member for Hereford, whose seat he (Mr.

Cooke) so unworthily filled, did not know, and the electors who voted for him did not know, what was the nature of the Prime Minister's Home Rule. It was only since discussion had taken place in the House—discussion which had never been permitted in the country—that the electors of his and other constituencies had come to know what the scheme was, and now that they knew what it was they did not like it at all. The hon. Member for Bedford had taunted the right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Birmingham with speaking of the British electors, and himself professed to be unable to distinguish between British and other Representatives; but he should have asked his great Leader the Prime Minister to teach him, for in 1885 that right hon. Gentleman had said that there was this distinction between British and Irish votes—that the votes of British Representatives ought to be independent of the votes of the Irish Representatives. If there was no difference, why did the right hon. Gentleman draw a distinction between them on that occasion? He was not going to trouble the House with any lengthy observations now, but he wished to say that it had struck him in the course of the Debate that if the Bill engrossed the attention of the people as deeply as the supporters of the Government claimed it was strange that they should find it necessary to bolster it up with a great number of other measures. Why did not the Government go to the country and say that this Bill was the measure of the Session, and one of first-rate importance, altering, as it did, the Constitution of this country? The Bill was one which ought to be discussed at enormous length in the House of Commons. It was a Bill which ought to occupy the time of Parliament for a whole Session. Surely it could not be said that a Bill altering the Constitution of the country in a way that this Bill altered it was not a measure of the first magnitude. If they had devoted a whole Session to the Bill in a straightforward way an Autumn Session would not have been required. Members representing the labouring classes, railway servants, and so on, were all desirous of bringing forward Bills affecting their interests, and those measures were to be brought forward at an Autumn Sitting. Surely if the matter had been plainly put before those hon. Members they would have consented to hold back their smaller interests in deference to the greater one of Home Rule. But the right hon. Gentleman knew that neither the constituencies nor his followers cared for the Bill, and, therefore, he had to supplement it with various other measures. The hon. Member for Bedford referred to the possible action of the House of Lords. He had said that when the Tories were in Office they could apply the Closure with effect, as the measures to which it was applied would be invariably passed by the House of Lords. Well, it occurred to him (Mr. Cooke) that there were hon. Members opposite who were looking forward with a great deal of hope to the House of Lords. Their want of independence had been referred to by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Birmingham. They were longing for a more independent Body to do what they would not do for themselves; and then, when that independent Body had saved the Empire, those same hon. Members would turn round and denounce it, and say they were going to mend it or end it.

*MR. T. D. SULLIVAN (Donegal, W.) said, the hon. Member for South Tyrone (Mr. T. W. Russell) had been speaking about the Prime Minister bringing 80 Irish Members into the House of Commons. Were the Irish Members not there at the present time, and what brought the Irish Members at all to the Imperial Parliament? The Act of Union brought them there, and if the Act of Union remained and continued as it now stood 80 Irish Members, and more, would continue to be in the Imperial Parliament. Why speak, then, of the Prime Minister bringing 80 Irish Members into the Imperial Parliament, as if there were no Irish Members there at present, and as if Irish Members were not to continue to remain there whether they had Home Rule or not? If there were to be 80 Irish Members in the Imperial Parliament, and there was to be no Home Rule, he should like to know where the relief was to come from? The relief would come in if Home Rule were granted to Ireland, because, although they would still have the right to return 80 Members, his belief was—and he had no reason to doubt it was the belief of every Irishman who knew anything about Ireland—that the Imperial Parliament would not be troubled, except upon very rare occasions indeed, with the presence of the Irish Members. The rejection of Home Rule would mean that the Irish Members would continue to be here early and late, day and night, and would stick to their work. He did not want to indulge in any threat or menace; but he might say that if the Irish Members had to remain in the Imperial Parliament after the rejection of Home Rule, the action which they might be disposed to take under such conditions would not tend to the smooth progress of legislation.

*MR. SPEAKER: The future action of the Irish Members, so far I can see, has nothing to do with the Resolution before the House.

*MR. T. D. SULLIVAN said, he would not refer to that matter further; but his point was that, Home Rule or no Home Rule, the Irish Members would continue to remain in the Imperial Parliament. He believed that they had in Ireland the right to look after their own affairs—

*MR. SPEAKER: Order!

*MR. T. D. SULLIVAN said, he would not pursue that point; but when they were told that there was an Irish majority in that House, they should remember that this was an Imperial question, and that they had a right to speak and vote upon it as such. He would remind hon. Members who wished to separate nationalities in this way that for many years Irish questions had been decided by British majorities. Many very useful measures had been brought in by the Irish Members and had been rejected by British majorities. As to the appeals to outside opinion, he knew something of the English electors, and he looked with absolute confidence to the result of the next General Election. He said for the Irish Members—and the Liberal Members could say it for themselves—that they believed the English people were in favour of the great measure now before the House. He relied upon the British people. It was said they did not vote upon Home Rule. The implication was that Home Rule was objectionable to the great mass of the British electors. That was not so. It was not objectionable, but the electors claimed, and fairly claimed, that they should do something more than pass a Home Rule Bill before going to a General Election. The Government were alive to the fact that they were returned not simply on Home Rule, but on Home Rule and other questions. They had a mandate for that, but they had a mandate for the other things as well, and it was their duty to do their utmost to fulfil that mandate, and they were going, he hoped, to do so, so far as it was possible to do it. Having done that—having dealt with other useful and necessary measures—they could then go to the constituencies, who, he believed, would send them back there with renewed and re-invigorated powers to complete the great work committed to them.

*SIR J. GOLDSMID (St. Pancras, S.) said, he did not think that it was necessary to follow the hon. Member opposite (Mr. T. D. Sullivan) in his experiences of the feelings of the British electors. The hon. Gentleman had not always entertained the very high opinion of England and the English which he now felt himself able to express.

MR. T. D. SULLIVAN: Hear, hear!

*SIR J. GOLDSMID said, however that might be, he was anxious to say a few words on a more important matter. He had often listened with pleasure and pride to the speeches of the hon. Member for Bedford (Mr. S. Whitbread), but he had heard him that evening with shame and regret. The hon. Member had hitherto always stood up for free speech in that House; to-night he had risen to support a very different policy. There was no precedent for the course the Government were taking. The Bill before the House altered the whole Constitution, not only of Ireland, but that of England and Scotland as well. They had had no such Bill as this since 1800, and no such measures were adopted on that occasion. Then they were told there was a precedent in the case of a Bill to put down crime. To say that the procedure on a Bill for the suppression of crime was a precedent in this case was to put honest, straightforward citizens on the level of criminals. The Prime Minister ought to go to the country now as he did in 1886, if his Bill were rejected by the House of Lords. That was the real precedent. But the right hon. Gentleman knew that his Bill would not be approved by the country, and therefore he wished to prepare some legislative sugar-plums to sweeten the dose to the electors. He (Sir J. Goldsmid) had had opportunities in many parts of the country of ascertaining the feeling of the English electors; he knew something more about the English electors than the hon. Member who had just spoken. He knew that the one thing which they prized above all others was the free speech once enjoyed in the House of Commons. The people of England would never accept the Bill; but, at any rate, the Government would not gain by their policy of Closure, which set up a precedent that would be most injurious in the future of Parliamentary procedure. The hon. Member for Bedford used to have a doubt upon these questions; but he had now laid down the doctrine that the Government had the right to say how much time was to be spent on the discussion of each of the measures they submitted to Parliament. This Bill, the hon. Member told them, had occupied more time than any other Bill. He (Sir J. Goldsmid) was not surprised that it had occupied more time than any other measure. One of the Schedules was in itself a Reform Bill; and he remembered a Reform Bill—it was a small, but a very important one—the Ballot Act—which took up two whole Sessions, and he said the Bill was a better one as agreed to in the second Session than it was in the first. Again, this Bill raised the question of establishing a high Constitutional Court; and such a new principle, so widespread and far-reaching in its effects, if adopted at all, should only be adopted after most careful consideration. In America there was a method of preventing any great Constitutional change, and there was also a method of a two-thirds majority. Therefore, he repeated, they should have full opportunity for discussion of this measure. For himself, he had taken very little part in the Debates. He had spoken only twice on the Committee stage of the Bill, though he had been present throughout the discussion, and he had never heard a Bill discussed with more care to avoid repetition and to keep to the point before the Committee. Every clause of the Bill raised many questions, and every clause should have been properly considered. They should have had liberal discussion. It was not unreasonable that in such a case any course open to the Government should have been considered. It would, he thought, have been only reasonable that the Government should have brought in the Bill at the beginning of the Session, and had it discussed from day to day. But they hampered the proceedings of the House by introducing many other Bills included in the Newcastle Programme, in order to get credit with the electors. The Resolution already passed at the instance of the Government had seriously injured the Government and the House of Commons, and this one would do so all the more, because it came from the Prime Minister—he who used to be the proud defender of British liberties, but who had come to this! His descent must be bitterly regretted by his admirers past and present. The hon. Member for Bedford said that, because the attendance in the House was somewhat slack last week, the “gag” was justified. The hon. Member did not mention that last week was the hottest week of the year. He himself spent two-thirds of the time on the Terrace, because the atmosphere of the House was so oppressive. It would be discreditable to the House of Commons if this Gaggling Resolution were adopted, and he hoped that even at that eleventh hour the Government would determine not to press it upon a powerful and a reluctant minority.

MR. W. AMBROSE (Middlesex, Harrow) said, he had considered very carefully the reasons given by the Government for forcing this Motion upon the House. He did not for one moment deny that circumstances might arise when it might be necessary that a Resolution of this kind should be adopted, in order that the measures of the Government might be pressed forward and have fair play. But he took it that, unless they were prepared to sacrifice all freedom of debate, they were not willing that any Minister should be allowed to make a proposal of the kind without giving reasons for his action and showed justification for it. It was said that precedent was justification. He thought they wanted a great deal more than precedent. They ought to have facts to justify the course they were taking. There might be a precedent which it was not desirable to follow, and each case, he thought, ought to be judged on its own merits. But there was no precedent for this proceeding. The Crimes Act of 1887 had been mentioned; but they had heard nothing, so far as the Debate had gone, to show that there was any analogy between the two cases. What were the circumstances of 1887? The Bill then before the House was a small procedure Bill. Crime was at the time triumphant in Ireland. The criminal classes and secret associations were triumphing over the Government and defying them. Large classes of the people were suffering as a result of this; and juries could not be got to find verdicts owing to the intimidation that prevailed. Therefore, it was necessary for the Government to take some measures to strengthen the hands of those who were responsible for the administration of the law. The fact was that the Bill brought in on that occasion was a very simple Bill, dealing with a very simple matter—giving the Magistrates certain power to deal with crimes of a certain character, without going to juries. Well, the Bill was introduced; then they had most flagrant obstruction, but 30 or 35 days were occupied before the Closure was necessary. They had a small minority, making speech after speech, moving no genuine Amendments, but very obstructive Amendments. But even the Closure, as then applied, differed widely from the Closure as adopted by the present Government. If the Closure had not then been adopted they never would have been able to get that Bill through at all, and the result would have been that crime in Ireland would have gone on triumphing over the authority of the Government and of Parliament. Those were the circumstances of 1887. He asked any Member was there any analogy to the present occasion? In the first place, they had the necessity of getting through a very simple Bill—it was alleged there were one or two new crimes in it; he did not know, but, at all events, it was a very simple Bill, and he asked could anyone say that it was a Bill to be in any way compared to this one? It was rightly said by the ex-Chancellor of the Exchequer (Mr. Goschen) that there were as many as 14 Bills in the present Bill. He had endeavoured to bring to mind any Bill that was so important as this that ever was before the House, and he could not think of any Bill to compare with it. Those were the circumstances under which they had to deal with it. If there was obstruction, they were, at least, in a different position from that of 1887. But there had been no obstruction. They had had, in the discussions on this Bill, the application of the Closure with very great freedom, but there had been no objection. They on that (the Opposition) side could not, of course, always undertake to stop the fluency of hon. Members around them; but the Government would remember that where there had been Closure they had allowed it to be carried without a Division. What was perfectly plain was that the Government had not realised the real difficulty of the Bill which they had introduced. He did not think the Prime Minister would venture to say there had been obstruction in the course of the Debates. It was a matter of opinion, but he (Mr. Ambrose) had seen no obstruction whatever. He had seen Amendments moved—he had moved some himself. He thought those that he had moved were necessary. They had fairly and honourably done their duty in bringing forward these Amendments, and he must deny the charge of obstruction. He moved an Amendment the other day which he had attempted to bring up in Committee, but it was then ruled out of Order; he explained the merits of his Amendment, and the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary (Mr. J. Morley) thought it consistent with his duty to charge him with the modesty of his appearance! The Amendment he moved would be the main point before the country at the General Election. He spoke for 100,000 people—for 14,000 electors—and because he occupied half-an-hour on that Amendment he was told he was to be congratulated on the modesty of his appearance! Evidently the right hon. Gentleman thought Members on the Opposition side had no right to speak at all. But they were only doing their best to give effect to their Amendments. What would be the result of the course the Government were now taking? He asked right hon. Gentlemen opposite to consider what it would be. Did the Prime Minister think he was going to gain by gagging the House of Commons? What was the fact? This Resolution would destroy the character of the House of Commons as a deliberative Assembly. They must remember that if they gagged the House of Commons they could not gag the House of Lords. They would have this Bill before them, and, in proportion as the Government degraded this House and destroyed its power to deliberate—as a deliberative Assembly—in such proportion they increased the power of the House of Lords. What was the reason that the House of Lords had not hitherto been able to hold out against the House of Commons? Because of the confidence of the people in the Commons, and its freedom and independence in matters of deliberation. But by carrying this Resolution they made the House of Lords—the First Estate in the Realm—more powerful. The hon. Member who spoke a short time previously (Mr. T. D. Sullivan) said the Government desired to pass other Bills as well as the Home Rule Bill, and he charged the Opposition with having talked against this Bill in order to prevent other Bills being passed. But surely they had a right to protest against any attempt on the part of the Government to bring in a number of Bills for the mere purpose of catching votes, or for show purposes. The object of the Government, of course, was clear. They could not get a mandate from the country for Home Rule pure and simple, and they therefore wanted to create a conglomeration of interests. But the Opposition were opposed to a scratch majority for Home Rule being obtained by these means. The voice of the nation spoke in 1831 in favour of the Reform Bill pure and simple; and if the electors of this country were to give an equally direct and unequivocal mandate in favour of the present measure of Home Rule, the Opposition, both in that House and in the House of Lords, would have to bow to it; they would be bound to yield to the will of the people. But they were not bound to yield to what was really a scratch vote secured at the General Election, a vote given upon the various questions with which Home Rule was intermixed—upon Local Veto, Parish Councils, and various other subjects. He implored the House to consider its present position. He did not deny that there might be a cause for the Closure, but he could not justify the claim put forward on the part of the Government to prevent the Amendments of the Opposition being put when the Division came on. That was a most unreasonable piece of work. Why should the Government have their Amendments put from the Chair and prevent the Amendments of Members of the Opposition being put, as well as being spoken upon? He could understand the reason. It was to prevent some of their own supporters from so acting as to reduce the majority. But the device would not deceive the electorate, and the House of Lords would never pass a Bill which had been forced through the House of Commons by a tyranny unknown before in the history of this country, and, he hoped, never to be again experienced.

MR. HENEAGE (Great Grimsby) said, he wished to enter his protest against this revolutionary, gagging, and degrading Resolution, for which not the slightest ground had been made out. The Prime Minister, in moving it, had not even hinted at direct obstruction, but the hon. Member for Bedford (Mr. S. Whitbread) had suggested that there had been indirect delay. He ventured to say that if there had been any delay at all that had been on the part of Ministers themselves, who had not endeavoured to economise time.

MR. W. E. GLADSTONE: What?

MR. HENEAGE said, the delay had been caused by Ministers themselves. This was the first Bill that had ever gone through the Committee stage in which no single Member who had moved an Amendment had even made a second speech upon it. In Committee it was usual for the Business to be conducted in a conversational manner, and Members often spoke two or three times on the same Amendment, but that had not occurred in this instance. The Government themselves by their action had not endeavoured to economise time by accepting necessary Amendments. His right hon. Friend the Member for Bury (Sir H. James) on the 2nd clause moved an Amendment in regard to the supremacy of the Imperial Parliament, and the Government accepted it in principle, but only after a long Debate.

MR. W. E. GLADSTONE: I was perfectly ready to accept that Amendment at 8 o'clock, but I could not get an answer from my right hon. Friend.

MR. HENEAGE said, that no doubt the right hon. Gentleman accepted it in principle at 7 o'clock, and the only question was where the Amendment should be introduced. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Bodmin (Mr. Courtney) came to the rescue of the Government, and suggested that it should be inserted in the 2nd clause on the understanding that on the Report stage it should be transferred to the 1st clause, and the result was that that was only agreed to after a discussion lasting from 8 o'clock until midnight.

MR. W. E. GLADSTONE: The whole view of the Government was stated long before 8 o'clock. The delay was entirely owing to the Opposition.

MR. HENEAGE said, the difficulty of the Government had been that while they accepted the principle of Amendments they could not make up their minds as to words.

MR. W. E. GLADSTONE: Nothing of the kind.

MR. HENEAGE said, the fact remained that a suggestion made by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Bodmin was accepted at midnight when it might have been accepted four hours earlier. Then there was a second Amendment as to the suspension of habeas corpus, on which at least two hours was wasted by the delay of the Government in making up their minds; and a further instance was to be found in the action of Ministers in reference to bills of exchange, on which the Chancellor of the Exchequer—that great financial authority—gave the House advice which the Law Officers of the Crown later on controverted. He therefore submitted that the Government had no right to complain of what they called indirect delay. The hon. Member for Bedford had stated that if one person was responsible more than any other for the retention of the Irish Members at Westminster it was the right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Birmingham. Could anything be more absurd? Why, it was not until after he had both spoken and voted for their total exclusion that the Prime Minister came down to the House and declared that he intended to retain them for all purposes. The Government would have to accept the entire responsibility for Clause 9. This was the second time they had come forward with a proposal to stifle the voice of the Representatives of the people. Freedom of Debate had been one of the most cherished rights of Parliament since the time of Henry VIII. It was a very curious coincidence that the gag should have been moved at exactly the same point in the Bill both in Committee and on Report—namely, previous to the 5th clause. But that was easily explainable. The Government did not object to discussion on the first four clauses, because they knew that the clauses which would not be discussed would render those that were absolutely nugatory. No such Bill had ever been submitted to Parliament during the present century. It was a most comprehensive Bill—an Omnibus Bill. It reminded one of a ton of compressed hay, and it might be said to contain at least seven compartments of clauses, each of which was comprehensive enough to be made a separate Bill. There was the first compartment of four clauses, which were rendered absolutely nugatory by the 5th clause. The second compartment—the 5th clause—was sufficient for a Bill in itself, for it dealt with the power of the Executive. The third compartment—the 6th, 7th, and 8th clauses—constituted a Reform and Redistribution Bill; then there was the 9th clause, which the English people never would submit to; next, there were the Financial Clauses, which had never been discussed by the House; then there were the Land Clauses, sufficient for a Bill in themselves; and, lastly, there were the Schedules, not one of which had been discussed in any shape or form. It was said the other night that the handwriting was on the wall. Since the Bill was introduced the Leader of the House had had three opportunities of appealing to the people. The electors of Grimsby, of Linlithgow, and of Hereford had given a decided answer which entitled the House to discuss the Bill in every shape, and the Government had no right to silence the Opposition by means of the gag. Was it to be supposed that any Second Chamber in the world, much less an ancient Second Chamber like the House of Lords, would for one moment entertain the idea of passing a Bill of which only about one-tenth part had been discussed in that House? They could not prevail against a majority in that House, but they could protest against that House being degraded, and they could declare what had been the policy of the Government—namely, a policy of concealment and gag. He believed the country would respond to that appeal, and that the Government would find that the Chancellor of the Exchequer was not far wrong when he said that the Government which stewed in Parnellite juice would stink in the nostrils of the country.

MR. RENTOUL (Down, E.) said, that the only Irish Member who had intervened in the Debate was singularly unfortunate in his quotations from a speech by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Birmingham—words which the right hon. Gentleman never used; and he had admitted that he was unable to say when and where the speech was delivered, or in what paper it had been published. The most important speech delivered in support of the proposal of the Prime Minister had been that of the hon. Member for Bedford (Mr. S. Whitbread), who had contended that the will of the majority should be allowed to prevail. But the point to be borne in mind was that the Home Rule Bill was not desired by the majority of the people of Great Britain; it had simply been brought in because the majority of the Irish people desired it. The hon. Gentleman suggested that many of the Amendments which had been proposed were irrelevant. But he ventured to submit that every Amendment brought forward had been absolutely necessary, and it was to be remembered that none of the salient points of the Bill were before the constituencies at the last Election. What were the salient points of the Home Rule Question? The first was the composition of the Imperial Parliament, the second the composition of the Irish Parliament, the third the power of Irish Members in both Houses of Parliament, and the fourth the question of finance. Yet not one of these points was clearly before the constituencies at the time of the last General Election; and he believed that if the electors had been told that it was intended to keep 80 Irish Members in the Imperial Parliament for all purposes, and if they had known that the Government in the course of the Debate would change their minds on the financial question two or three times, very few Members pledged to such an absurd Home Rule would have been returned to Parliament. But it was suitable that the Closure should be proposed at the present time, because it was just what had been done in Committee. It would prevent these difficult questions from being discussed at all. The gravest and most important questions were those of finance and the land. They were questions, they were told, which would be settled by this Imperial Parliament. Certainly, they understood that the Land Question would be settled before the landlords were handed over to an Irish Legislature. But this Resolution would prevent the discussion of those questions. They were asked by the Prime Minister whether this House had ever given so much time to a Bill. The answer to that was—Had the House ever before had under consideration such a Bill as this? The hon. Member for Northampton (Mr. Labouchere), whose position and influence as a Radical they all knew, had declared that there were 20 Bills contained in it. That being so, where did the analogy come in? There had been no discussion on the Schedules. The hon. Member for North Kerry (Mr. Sexton) spoke of 15 Unionists being returned to the Upper Chamber in Ireland.

MR. SEXTON: Twenty.

MR. RENTOUL said, he was glad to have that admission. The Unionists would be in a minority still, for they would have only 20 out of 48. Then they were referred to the Rules made for Closure in 1887. The facts at that time were totally different. The Act then before the House was a small and simple one dealing with a point that was very briefly dealt with in this Bill—that of habeas corpus. The Government of that day had a majority of 98. This Government had a majority only of 38. The Resolution of the former Leader of the House, the late Mr. W. H. Smith, was passed by a majority of 152, or 22 per cent. of the whole House. The former Resolution of the present Government was passed by 32, or 5 per cent. They knew that Mr. Smith's majority was composed of British votes, and that the present majority—the majority on the last Resolution of this character—was not, for there was on that vote a majority of 19 British votes against the Government. So that if the question were dealt with as Mr. Smith dealt with it, there would be a majority against the Government. Therefore the case was totally different. If, again, they took the stages of the Bill closed by Mr. Smith—his majority on the votes on First and Second Readings, on the four most important clauses, and on the Report stage and Third Reading—his highest majority was 162, and his average was 117 over the entire majorities on that occasion, whereas the Prime Minister's majority on all the important questions on this Bill stood at about 40. He therefore applied the Closure by a majority of 40, and that majority included the Irish Members. The Home Rule Bill as printed had 1,495 lines, 1,164 of which had not been dealt with. They had only dealt with 331 lines; and of those 331, 155 had been substituted for those originally introduced. The Government had admitted that those 155 as they stood when introduced were pure nonsense, and that they required to have others substituted in order to make sense at all. If they (the Opposition) had succeeded in showing that 153 lines of the Bill required alteration—that they were utter folly, and that others should be substituted—they only required time to put their case before the House and the country to make it stronger than it now was. It was remarkable to notice the opinions that were held by some of the Prime Minister's supporters on this point. The hon. Member for Northampton (Mr. Labouchere) had said in the columns of Truth that the Closure in this instance was one of those measures which might be enthusiastically cheered by certain persons, but that it was a measure that more moderate people would rather not see used at all; and The Irish Independent newspaper—the Independent Party having nine Members in the House, a Party which would be 29 if they had proportional representation in Ireland—took even a worse view of the matter, for in its issue of 14th July it said that a serious consideration arose, that yet another substantial portion of the Bill had been passed without Debate, and, possibly, without amendment. The Independent went on to say—

“That may be pleasing to the Tories, but it is not satisfactory to the Irish people.”

Mr. Rentoul

Therefore, they saw that one section of the Irish people—men of great intelligence and independence—did not regard this as a satisfactory way of dealing with the Bill, and thought it was highly dangerous that this Bill should become law without discussion or amendment. They had had it from every part of the House—they had had it from prominent Leaders of the House and from the Irish Party—that the very strongest protest should be entered against the action that had been taken by the Government. This was not an ordinary Bill; it was not a Crimes Bill. It was one affecting the whole liberties of the people of Ireland—one dealing with a great change in the Constitution of the country upon which the Empire had been built up, and one that ought to be discussed stage by stage. If necessary another Session should be devoted to making the Bill at least one that would hold water—that would be reasonable—instead of having the measure hustled through in this manner by the Prime Minister and those who supported him. It was upon these grounds that the Amendment had been brought forward, and upon those grounds it would receive the support of everyone on that (the Opposition) side of the House.

*MR. THORNTON (Clapham) said, that since he spoke on the First Reading of the Bill he had not ventured to address the House on the question of the government of Ireland; but during that period he had had the opportunity of very carefully watching and listening to the Debates that had taken place, and the result of his careful observation was that upon his conscience he believed on that side of the House there could not be said to have been the least obstruction. The Debate upon each clause of the Government of Ireland Bill had brought forward new points which the Government themselves had acknowledged by the numerous Amendments that had been accepted by the Prime Minister and the Chief Secretary for Ireland. Nobody placed, as he had been, in the position of a careful observer during the discussions upon the Bill could have come to any other conclusion than that the discussions had been fair and most reasonable, and were directed to the elucidation of questions of the most enormous importance. Those around him who had taken part in the discussions had distinguished themselves alike by their knowledge and eloquence, and when an Amendment was before the House on which they felt they could not advance the knowledge of the House they had maintained a very remarkable silence. There were men of light and learning around him who if they had been inclined to lengthen debate by reiteration could have done so, and rendered their utterances attractive; but, on the contrary, they had done nothing of the kind. There had been no obstruction from those Benches, nor could any such charge be laid to the Party to which he had the honour to belong. For himself, he had remained silent upon questions he was cognisant of, because he had heard them discussed far more ably and eloquently from the Front Bench than it was in his power to do; but though he had not taken part in the discussions he had felt it his duty to give his very best attention to the placing on the Paper of Amendments that had been well considered. Of these Amendments he could only say that they had been by Her Majesty's present Government either ruthlessly closed or whisked away into the tail-end of a new Bill, and, so far as he knew, destined to undergo a similar process. What was to be their position as Members of Parliament during the next week? The time was coming when they were not to be allowed to speak; and, so far as he understood the present Resolution, they were not to be allowed to vote, and were not to be allowed to draw attention to any great questions of public interest that might come before the House. Should any question connected with foreign policy arise during this next week, by this Resolution, as he understood it, hon. Members would be precluded from drawing attention to the subject by moving the Adjournment of the House; therefore, he said, they rested under an undue disability in this matter. He wished to tell the House what he believed to be the position of those Members on the Unionist side with whom it was his honour to act. He believed they desired in a Constitutional manner to defeat the measure; but, at the same time, they desired, if possible, to improve it, because he would be a bold man who, in the present condition of Parties, would say it was not possible that the Bill might in some form yet become law; and, that being so, he claimed for those who sat around him that they had done their best, by the Amendments which they had placed on the Paper, to improve it—that was, to render it workable should it, unfortunately, be placed on the Statute Book. To restrict discussion in that House was the most dangerous policy that could be brought forward, because there was no substitute for the Debates in Parliament. Neither platform speeches nor any kind of meeting could act as a substitute for occasions upon which a man addressing the House could ask questions of Ministers and be then and there answered; and, in his opinion, it would be a fatal blow to the security of the United Kingdom when the gag was placed upon such Debates. The hon. Member for Bedford (Mr. S. Whitbread), whom he was sorry not to see in his place, made a statement which he (Mr. Thornton) did not agree with, “that there was a decided mandate at the last Election for Home Rule.” He could quite understand that the hon. Member for Bedford fought out the question of Home Rule in his own constituency, to which he was closely tethered during the late severe contest, and clearly did not learn what was the case in other constituencies. He himself could not lay claim to any particular knowledge on the subject in other parts of the country; but in South-West London he unhesitatingly declared there was no mandate there for Home Rule at the last Election. [Cries of “Oh, oh!”] Hon. Gentlemen said, “Oh, oh!” but he would give his reasons for making the statement. In his constituency, and those immediately surrounding his, the Conservative and Unionist candidates brought the question of Home Rule before the constituencies; but their opponents did nothing of the kind, and he maintained that to bring the question properly before the constituencies it must be done by both Parties. For 18 months their opponents never mentioned Home Rule, which stalked ghost-like amidst the feast of measures mentioned in the Newcastle Programme. He had told the hon. Member for Battersea (Mr. J. Burns) that he had neither mandate to support Home Rule or the gag in that portion of Battersea he represented, and had warned him of an intention to state this in the House of Commons. It had been said during the Debate that the present Bill had been fully discussed. He denied that it had been discussed anything like fully. In this Bill, undiscussed at this moment, was the principle of One Man One Vote, which had been smuggled in at the end of the 6th clause. There was the new settlement of the Irish Constitution, and there was the question of a settlement of a crisis when the two Houses differed; and the details as to finance, which were not yet understood by the English people. That being so, it was clear the Bill had not been fully discussed. Then there was that most important question as to the Exchequer Judges, who were to have power to enable military forces to go into Ireland. That, again, was a question which had not been fully discussed. An unfortunate feeling had been engendered by the proceedings of the Government in shortening their Debates. If there was one matter more important than another, it was that whatever their political feelings might be they should keep up friendly relations between various parts of the House. That unfortunate scene which occurred in the House the other day—which everyone must regret who honoured the past history and traditions of the English Parliament—might be said to have taken its origin from the effects of these measures for gagging Parliament. If that spirit of compromise which had hitherto dominated the English Parliament were to be absent, they should not be so successful in their deliberations in the future as they had been in the past. In his opinion, they had to go back to the sixth year of the Stuarts to find a counterpart to the present situation. At that time freedom of speech was denied by the Forms of the House, and the Speaker had to state that he could not allow the question of tonnage and poundage and consequent arbitrary taxation to be discussed in that House. Speaking of the First Remonstrance of 1629, when free speech was suppressed, Greene, the historian, said—

“The breach of their privilege of free speech produced a scene in the Commons such as St. Stephen's had never witnessed before. Eliot (the proposer) sat abruptly down amidst the solemn silence of the House. Then appeared such a spectacle of passions as the like had seldom been seen in such an Assembly.”

Mr. Thornton

Commenting on this, Lord Macaulay said—

“It was not yet understood, even by the most enlightened men, that the liberty of discussion is the greatest safeguard of all other liberties.”

Had the Secretary for Scotland been present he would have appreciated the words of his illustrious relative. Those liberties to which Macaulay referred were defended in the next few years by the historic names of Eliot, Pym, and Hampden. It was his honest belief, from what he had seen in that House, that if the Government did not desist from the course they were pursuing, the principles for which Pym struggled and Hampden died would be seriously imperilled. It was a relief to him to know that around him sat honest and devoted lovers of their country who were striving against this autocratic rule. They would not allow one man to dominate and act the autocrat over this country. He could not forget that the Remonstrance of 1629 was followed by the Petition of Rights, and in the same way he believed that this attempt to closure the House of Commons would be followed by an uprising of the English people which would drive from power one of the most dangerous Administrations that had ever ruled over these islands.

*MR. T. H. BOLTON (St. Pancras, N.) said, the Prime Minister had told them that he proposed these Resolutions from the iron chain of consequence. That was to say, having carried his Closure Resolution with reference to the Committee stage, he followed that up with a Closure Resolution with reference to the Report stage, and probably there would be a similar Closure Resolution in reference to the Third Reading. By-and-bye they might have Closure Resolutions with reference to Supply, and the great principle which that House had asserted continuously through centuries, of having grievances redressed before money was voted, would be seriously impaired. He agreed with the right hon. Gentleman it was the iron chain of consequence—a chain of consequence most lamentably and deeply to be deplored, and it must be subject of great regret to all who valued the right hon. Gentleman's reputation as a great statesman that he had found it necessary in connection with this measure to restrict the freedom of Debate in that House. Was there, he asked, any necessity for this arbitrary course in dealing with this measure? The Member for Donegal had made the candid admission that the Home Rule measure was only one of the measures which this Government was charged with and had a mandate upon, and that other measures would occupy the attention of this Parliament. Now, if there was any mandate, it was a mandate to give some measure of enlarged local government only to Ireland and to carry certain other measures of importance to the people of Scotland, Wales, and England. There was no mandate to put a measure of this character, far too large—unnecessarily large—in its scope, full of contentious provisions, containing within it perhaps 20 Bills—to put such a measure to the front and force it through at all hazards and under all circumstances in this Session of Parliament. There was no mandate to force it through in the way in which it was being forced through. The people of this country supposed that the Prime Minister would have acquired wisdom from the result of the Election of 1886, and from such discussions as there had been in the country with reference to this question, and would have brought in a measure acceptable to the House, instead of bringing in a measure of this extreme character, containing provisions of such a scope that he could not hope to pass it without exhaustive Debate, not merely in the House, but in the country, and after another General Election. The Speaker had advised that the matters which had been considered in Committee should not be discussed very fully on this Report stage, and that preference might be given to subjects that had not been considered in Committee. He asked the House whether that advice had not been cheerfully observed? In the discussions that had taken place—except on two or three occasions when the subject had not been adequately discussed, or when some new light had been thrown upon it, and when some concession from the Government might be expected and hoped for—subjects which had been discussed in Committee were not revived and re-discussed. Yet now they were to be closed, and subjects that had not been discussed at all were to be taken in the order in which they stood upon the Paper, and without Debate disposed of, the result of which would be that matters of the very greatest consequence would be guillotined next Friday, and they would not have had any opportunity whatever of considering them. Take, for instance, the question of the police in Ireland. That question was only discussed in certain of its bearings. The necessity of putting an end to the police in an arbitrary way within six years had not been considered and discussed. The question whether some scheme might not be adopted by which the police should be allowed to gradually die out, or be adapted and worked into a system of local government in Ireland, had not been considered, and the result would be they would either have to do a great injustice to a very large number of men by disbanding them on the terms of the insufficient superannuation provided by this Bill, or else they would have to enlarge the scope of it and create a pension list, which would be an enormous infliction on the British and Irish Exchequers. That question had not been at all considered or discussed. Then, again, the question of the land had only been incidentally, and he might say accidentally, discussed. The great Land Question, which after all was, perhaps, the most important of the subjects which constituted the Irish difficulty, had not been considered in its largest bearing. It had only been accidentally and incidentally considered, through the chance of a proposed new clause or Amendment. The constitution of the Irish Legislature, its powers, and the way in which differences between the two branches should be settled—all these were questions which had not been discussed at all, or else only within a very limited degree upon some Amendment. The large question of the Judiciary had not been discussed at all. He understood the Chancellor of the Duchy (Mr. Bryce) to say that it was intended to give a right of direct appeal to some Judicial Tribunal against any arbitrary or oppressive action of the Irish Executive or against the non-acts of the Irish Legislature, for that he also understood that some Amendment might possibly be made to that effect, but that there had been no opportunity of disc-matter. He (Mr. Bolton) took advantage of a casual perfunctory sort of discussion that took place to ask the right hon. Gentleman whether an individual Irish citizen would have the same right to assert any grievances that an individual in the United States had, and a similar right of appeal to a Judicial Tribunal, and he understood the right hon. Gentleman to say it was the intention of the Government that this should be so. But if they looked at the Bill they found nothing of the kind. There was a sort of Judiciary independent of Irish control. That was to say, two of the Irish Judges were set apart to do certain judicial business relating to matters excepted from the control of the Irish Legislature. That, however, was not the creation of such a Judiciary as was necessary. What was wanted was an authoritative Judicial Body in Ireland capable of dealing with Constitutional questions, and they had had no opportunity of pointing out that these two Exchequer Judges would be utterly insufficient to deal with these Constitutional questions. He put down a new clause proposing to create two Imperial Judges. The Speaker pointed out that that might properly come in as an Amendment, and in deference to that opinion he transformed his new clause into an Amendment. The result now would be that there would be no opportunity whatever of discussing that proposition. It might be that his proposition was one which would not commend itself to the judgment of the House. Granted, for the sake of argument, that such was the case, at all events he had the right, as a Member of Parliament, to propose an Amendment of that kind. If they deprived individual Members of the opportunity of attempting amendment in this Bill, they deprived them of one of the most important of the rights they possessed as Members of Parliament, and very seriously impaired their usefulness in that Assembly. It could not be said that he personally had trespassed at length or with frequency on the House on this "Theor, in fact, on any other question produced. He had made it a rule to speak Stephen's in he had something to say, and (the propose, it in as few words as possible. solemn silence such a spectacle of an Imperial Judiciary seldom been admitted to be a proposal of far-reaching consequence. It was no good whatever to make declarations as to people's rights unless they gave them the machinery by which those rights could be enforced, and this Bill contained machinery so inefficient to protect individual rights in Ireland that it would only be necessary for them to have the opportunity of pointing out the inefficiency of the proposed machinery to clearly show the necessity for alteration. These were large and important matters which they had not had, and would not now have, the opportunity of discussing. They would not even have the opportunity of asking the House, without discussion, to express an opinion on their Amendments, because only Government Amendments were to be put to the vote. It was said that the Resolutions proposed by gentlemen opposite, who constituted the Government in 1887, were the precedent for this Resolution, but he would point out that the Government of 1887 did give the House an opportunity of expressing an opinion on all the various Amendments on the Paper. He asked why did the Government not select the more important of the Amendments and give the House an opportunity of considering them? They adopted a course which had the practical effect of shutting out a large number of subjects which were not discussed at all, and of preventing the discussion of subjects on which it was absolutely necessary discussion should take place. [Laughter.] The right hon. Gentleman on the Front Bench might laugh at the criticism he was making, but to laugh and make a matter of joke of a most important proposition of this kind, muzzling the House of Commons and preventing discussion, was not a course which was calculated to recommend the Government to the intelligent people of this country. If these Resolutions were necessary the Government should pass them under a sense of responsibility and with regret, and not with recklessness, levity, and indifference. He did not admit that because a Conservative Government in 1887 passed a Gagging Resolution—which the Members of the present Government protested against vehemently, and which the Irish Members protested against with even greater vehemence—because that Government did wrong in

1887, that was justification for this Government doing wrong also. He should have supposed this Liberal Government would have been delighted to have an opportunity of giving effect to the views which they expressed in 1887, and to show that they were not going to follow vicious precedents and to gag the House of Commons in dealing with this far greater and far more important subject. The Bill of 1887 was an important Bill. He did not underrate the importance of that measure; but, after all, hon. Members opposite must admit that there was really but one provision in that Bill, and that it was one Bill, whereas this was a number of Bills. He would quote what a faithful supporter of the Government—the hon. Member for Northampton (Mr. Labouchere)—said of this Home Rule Bill and of the former Closing Resolution. In the recent address to his constituents, that hon. Gentleman, who aspired to be a right hon. Gentleman, and who probably might be a right hon. Gentleman in some Radical Government of the future, said—

“The Bill alters the organic relations between Great Britain and Ireland. Most of its clauses are highly contentious in their character; many, indeed, under ordinary circumstances, would constitute a Bill of themselves, and to have passed these without any opportunity of debate was a doubtful innovation in Parliamentary procedure, and one for which I voted with considerable hesitation.”

He did not see why the hon. Member to whom he alluded did not go into the Lobby with other independent Members to protest against the action of the Government. As far as he (Mr. Bolton) could see, this action of the Government was unjustifiable. If there was difficulty in getting the Bill through, it was difficulty caused by the Government themselves. If they had intended to make this Bill the one great measure of the Session, why did they occupy weeks at the beginning of the Session in making a pretence of dealing with other large matters? Why did they not call Parliament together early, and make up their minds to pass one Bill before dealing with another? This Bill was not, in its present changed condition, the Bill they brought into the House. In five or six principal features it differed from the Bill as introduced. Many of them thought when the Government brought in their Bill they intended to stand by it in all its main provisions. If they had done so, much delay and discussion would have been avoided, and they would not now probably be discussing Gagging Resolutions. But what necessity was there? Had the country made up its mind as to the Bill now before the House? Did not every communication show that there was no disposition to take this Bill? Could anyone say that there was any strong feeling in favour of the Bill? Were not many friends of the Government very cool with regard to it? Were there not sections of the Liberal Party dissatisfied with it? Did they suppose for a moment that the Welsh Members cared for it except to get the Irish vote on Welsh questions? Was not the Temperance Party influenced by a similar object? Did the agricultural labourers care anything about it? And was the Labour Party content to postpone all labour questions to this Bill? In fact, the whole difficulty the Government had brought upon themselves, and now they were creating a further difficulty by gagging the House of Commons. This was a proceeding which was unfair and discreditable to the Government, and it was deplorable that the Leader of the House—the foremost Parliamentarian of these times—should, through Party expediency, attempt to gag the minority, almost equal to his own majority, with regard to a Bill which was unsatisfactory to the House and to the country at large.

*MR. GIBSON BOWLES (Lynn Regis) said, they had a high Constitutional question before the House; but it was difficult not to feel the extreme unreality of the Debate that had been conducted upon it. Unreal it was, because no argument, however strong or irresistible, was likely to make any impression on hon. Gentlemen opposite. Nothing concerning the dignity of the House would have the slightest effect upon them, because they were pledged to follow the Prime Minister and his colleagues. The Debate was unreal, because the matter was decided beforehand. So that anything they might say would not prevent hon. Gentlemen opposite from voting for the proposal of the Government now before the House. He could wish that hon. Gentlemen opposite would give a little time to the Prime Minister and his colleagues. They had changed before, and they would change again. Their Bill had changed many times. Indeed, it reminded him of the Woman of Samaria. The Prime Minister had had many Bills, and this was not his Bill. In fact, it was partly the Opposition's Bill. One-half of the part of the Bill they had discussed was composed of their Amendments. There was scarcely a line that had not been found capable of amendment. There was not a discussed clause that had not received amendment, and that with the full assent of the Government, who, having a majority, could have rejected any Amendment they chose, but who preferred to accept the Amendments. Having done that, he said the Amendments they had accepted must have been accepted because they were fairly moved in order to complete the Bill. They were now called upon, absolutely and entirely, to shut out every other Amendment, of whatever kind it might be, except those proposed by the Government. They were told this was to give effect to the will of the majority, but there were Amendments put down by Members of the majority; but even the most prominent Members of the majority were now to be shut out, not merely from moving Amendments, but from voting upon them, or having them considered at all. In one of the most eloquent speeches of the Prime Minister, he told them that all the Members of the House were equal. He believed that to be one of the principles which the right hon. Gentleman used to believe, but which he had now renounced. But, if that were so, what became of these Amendments? How could they leave it open to exclude all Amendments whatever proposed by Members of the House, except those emanating from the Prime Minister himself? Were all wisdom and knowledge concentrated in him? Why should they debate any question at all? Why go through this idle form? Why not bring forward a Resolution declaring that all the proposals of the Prime Minister should ipso facto have the force of law? That was almost what this proposal amounted to, and what he suggested would be as reasonable as this proposal. What was it meant to do? It was said that this proposal was brought forward to give effect to the voice of the majority—the majority for the moment; but in that majority there were 36 paid Members of the Government, who took £80,000 a year in salaries—who were paid to vote—and it seemed to him that there was a great difference between the majority and the minority, and that they were not, as the Prime Minister said, equal. The proposal of the Prime Minister was the crowning insult to the House. On the 30th March the right hon. Gentleman took every Parliamentary day, and robbed them of their time. On the 29th of June he put his precious Bill into water-tight compartments, and robbed them of their speech, and now he wished to rob them of their votes. Though the fate of this Resolution was certain that evening, it was not the end of the question. If the House agreed to this Resolution there was an end for ever of the House of Commons. He did not know how it was to exist. Let them go to their constituents, and not keep up this idle mockery. The vital portion of the House of Commons was liberty of speech. It was that principle—for all purposes of Imperial and National importance—which had created, not only the House, but even the Prime Minister himself, and without it the House of Commons practically truly ceased to exist. Yet that was the liberty of which they were to be deprived. Twice before this liberty had been attacked. Three hundred years ago a Tudor Sovereign, Queen Elizabeth, on a former Speaker claiming liberty of speech, replied that it was granted, but that it was—“Not a liberty for everyone to speak what he listeth and what entereth in his brain to utter; that privilege extended no further than the liberty of Aye or No.”

The liberty was not to be extended even so far as that by the Prime Minister. Another attempt was made later against the liberty of Parliament, when an armed body of men entered the House of Commons, removed the Mace, and purged the House. It seemed to him (Mr. Gibson Bowles) that the proceedings to-night united the violence of both without the courage of either of those courses. A new Tudor and a new Pride had arisen on the Treasury Bench; but the method adopted was that of the midnight footpad, of the Gladstone garotte, which not merely silenced but strangled at the same time. The Prime Minister owed everything to the liberty of speech in the House of Commons, amid whose traditions the right hon. Gentleman had been nourished and reared—traditions which he had maintained until he adopted Home Rule; but, strange to say, it was, he of all others who now turned to thrust the dagger into the breast of his own mother. They would pass through the Caudine forks, but the reputation of the right hon. Gentleman would pass with them. The country would judge him. The historian would say that here was a Minister who had been reared amid the traditions of that House who was now about to destroy them, and to destroy along with them the liberty which the country held most dear.

MR. JESSE COLLINGS (Birmingham, Bordesley) said, the only reason they had for discussing this proposal was to inform the country of what was taking place. When they remembered the traditions of that Parliament, by the fact that the British people enjoyed liberty of speech in Parliament for so long—and that no man had gained more of that than the Prime Minister himself—they were apt to look upon the privilege as one that could not be taken from them, and they could not be surprised that the Prime Minister, of all men, should endeavour so to degrade that House. He could fancy that Members opposite on the Irish Benches were enjoying their retaliation for the Prime Minister's conduct in 1881 and 1882, by compelling him to be the instrument to degrade this Parliament. But the people must not forget the price which had been paid for the privilege, nor the long struggle which had been waged to obtain this liberty; and it would be their duty to rouse up the people, not by frivolous talk, but to enlighten them on the dangers that were around them. Once roused, they would make short work of those who touched their liberties. If this Resolution were approved by the people, the great privilege of the redress of grievances would soon become a thing of the past. He ventured to say that no tyranny equal to the present attempt of the Prime Minister had been practised on the English people since the time of Charles I., and no Minister had endeavoured to betray the rights of the people in this way since the days of Strafford. Strafford was punished in the manner peculiar to his day, and the Prime Minister would undoubtedly receive the reward peculiar to these modern days—dismissal from the service of the people at the first opportunity that offered. The Prime Minister in 1886 thought that the Liberal Party was made for him, and not he for the Liberal Party, and he strangled and destroyed it. His idea now was that Parliament was his servant, and not he the servant of Parliament. He (Mr. Jesse Collings) could not help remembering the danger that the right hon. Gentleman described in 1885. It was instructive at the present moment. He told them of the danger it would be to the Empire and to the country if they were obliged to act with the Irish majority; but now he was bringing an Irish majority there to control them. They had no alternative but to do this. They knew how they had attained to power in 1892. They advocated anything for the sake of votes. They were willing the Irish Members should have everything so that the Government got into power. On the other side, to the Liberal Members, they issued a number of promissory notes, which were now becoming due. These were necessary for the purpose of getting votes. They must act in some way to get out of the desperate position that they were now in. They could not put off the Irish Members; but they must get this Bill out of the way. Every day and hour that the Bill was discussed showed its rottenness. The Government were like desperate gamblers doubling their stakes as the luck went against them, and putting off the evil day when they would have to account to those whom they had betrayed. They were told that after the Government had got this Bill out of the way they would try to pass other measures, and then go to the country on false issues—the issues of the House of Lords and the Newcastle Programme. Well, the country had been deceived once, and he did not think the people of Great Britain would allow themselves to stumble twice over the same stones. They had the Bill before them now, and were familiar with its provisions. The hon. Member for Bedford (Mr. S. Whitbread) had referred to the feeling in regard to Home Rule in the villages, and had asked that the Unionists should tell “the whole truth” on the matter. He could assure the hon. Gentleman that it would be sufficient for the Unionists to tell the country a tenth part of the truth about the Bill, and to lay before them the 9th clause alone. They would, however, tell the whole truth, because there was a monotony of iniquity in the Bill. The whole Bill and the methods by which it was sought to pass it were disgraceful, and unworthy of any British Government. When the hon. Member for Bedford stated that the meaning of Home Rule had been made clear to the villagers, he (Mr. Collings) would remind him that at the meeting in the Memorial Hall, at which the representatives of the agricultural labourers were present, the Prime Minister in his address had not said one word about Home Rule, but had only spoken about village reforms and other matters in which they were interested. Was that the way to explain to the villagers the meaning of Home Rule? It was bad enough to deceive one's peers, who had equal advantages with one's self for knowing the truth; but it was far worse to obtain the votes of the humblest class of men by methods which concealed the true objects to which the votes were to be put. The hon. Member for Bedford had spoken about the Home Rule Bill and its principles being perfectly understood at the last General Election. But at that Election nobody knew what the Bill was, except the Prime Minister and perhaps another on the Front Ministerial Bench, and certain Irish Members who had met together to barter away the liberties of Great Britain. How could that be placed before the country which nobody knew about? Even when the Bill was introduced the form which it would ultimately take was not known, for the House was now discussing a new Bill. None of the constituencies knew it until the election at Hereford the other day, and what happened there would also take place in other constituencies throughout the country when the Bill was explained to them, as it would be. The whole truth would be told to the constituencies, and he ventured to say that it would tell in favour of the Unionist cause. There had been something said about obstruction. The hon. Member for Bedford had said that the Bill had been discussed for 80 days. Well, it should be explained what 80 days meant. It seemed a long time, but a week's discussion barely amounted to 30 hours, or about six hours a day. The discussion of an ordinary Bill was one thing, but the discussion of a measure to upset the relations of the different parts of the United Kingdom was quite another. Take the 3rd clause alone. It would not be disputed that that clause alone contained what was equal to a dozen Bills. The clause which gave the Irish Parliament the right to destroy the writ of habeas corpus was dealt with in a few hours—he thought about four. The Common Law rights of protection to the minority were abolished after about five hours' discussion. The whole education of Ireland, upon which hon. Members set such store in 1870, was practically given into the hands of hon. Gentlemen opposite after only a few hours' discussion. The Chief Secretary was one of those who opposed the 25th clause of the Education Bill, because, as he said, it might endanger the unsectarian education in Ireland, and yet the right hon. Gentleman had voted with cheerfulness for the provisions in the Bill which handed over education to the Irish Parliament.

MR. J. MORLEY: The Committee did not divide.

MR. JESSE COLLINGS said, that if the right hon. Gentleman referred to the Debates he would find that there were more occasions than one on which the principle of non-sectarian education was raised, and on which Divisions were taken. His right hon. Friend should at least be silent in respect for that splendid paragraph of his in a book on National Education in England, where he said that every other nation in Europe was striving to curtail the priestly power, and it was reserved for England to take a different course, and to extend that power. The right hon. Gentleman in the same book even passionately condemned the conduct of the Liberal Government for refusing to listen to the aspirations for religious freedom of the English people, and for handing over education in Ireland to the priesthood. Let the right hon. Gentleman read the words he then uttered, and now endeavour to justify them—now that he was betraying the interests of the loyal minority in Ireland. The 9th clause the Prime Minister admitted he had had up his sleeve, and for days refused to allow himself to be betrayed into a revelation of it. Betrayed into a revelation of it! Not allow the British public to know what it was they were to support. It was only about six hours before the Gagging Resolution came into operation that it was decided to hand over the practical control of the Imperial Parliament to the Irish Members. Was six hours' discussion sufficient for such a proposition deliberately sprung upon the House and the country? He ventured to say that the 9th clause would have to be examined, and the Prime Minister and every other Minister would have reason to remember that clause. Instead of bringing a vague charge of obstruction, why did not hon. Members put their fingers on the particular portion of the Bill which had been obstructed? If they would go through the Bill clause by clause, though one or two might seem of small importance, and might seem to have had more discussion than they deserved—owing to the long speeches of Members of the Government and their supporters—he would undertake to say that no clause and no Amendment had had anything like the discussion which its importance warranted. If the Gagging Resolution had been imposed before the Financial Clauses had come on for discussion, all the atrocious blunders of that clause would have gone into the Bill without correction. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for East Wolverhampton (Mr. H. H. Fowler) had said that no Home Rule Bill ought to be rushed through the House. Probably the right hon. Gentleman had changed his mind.

MR. H. H. FOWLER: Oh, no.

MR. JESSE COLLINGS: Oh, yes; for the right hon. Gentleman could not call the discussion on the clauses he had described anything like obstruction.

MR. H. H. FOWLER: The Bill has been 80 days under discussion.

MR. JESSE COLLINGS: What was done in the 80 days. Was not the 9th clause rushed through the House? Were not the Financial Clauses?

MR. H. H. FOWLER: The Financial Clauses had nearly a week's discussion

MR. JESSE COLLINGS said, they had taken about 30 hours to discuss taxing the people of Great Britain to the tune of £2,000,000 a year. Was not the question of education rushed through the House. It was all very well to take refuge in generalities and empty platitudes, but an examination of the clauses and Amendments line by line would show that there had been no unnecessary debating. The fact was that the Government had not a leg to stand on to support their allegation as to obstruction. If there were any ground for the charge of obstruction, the Government knew that they could not have a better cry with which to go to the country. They had the game in their hands. The people would not permit the obstruction of measures on which they had set their hearts; then let the Government dissolve and go to the country. The opportunity was one which they would grasp immediately if they believed in their own statements. The hon. Member for Bedford ridiculed what was called "the British majority." The hon. Member could not understand what was meant by it. He (Mr. Jesse Collings) supposed the Union was brought about by an agreement between Great Britain and Ireland. [Cries of "No!"] They were both parties to it. The House had heard a great deal about the blackguardism of Pitt in this matter; but it was to be hoped that they would hear no more on the subject after to-night. Of course, it was said that the Union was brought about by corruption which assumed the form of money bribes. But the agreement that was now being attempted to be carried into effect had been based on the corruption, not of the promise of money, but of the promise of measures. As he had said, there were two parties to the Union—namely, Great Britain and Ireland. They heard it on every platform now-a-days that Home Rule was to be given to Ireland because Ireland wanted it; but there were two parties to the partnership. It was not sufficient to assert that the majority of the Representatives of Ireland desired to put an end to the partnership. The majority of the British people must desire the severance, else how could it be brought about. And they saw that the majority of the Representatives of Great Britain continually voted in favour of the Amendments resisted by the Government. The British Representatives had a right to be heard. It was an outrage to attempt to stifle discussion on this Bill by those Representatives. This was a very serious night indeed, which would arouse serious thoughts in the minds of every politician in the country. This country, like all other countries, would go down some day or another; but it would be exceedingly mean if it were allowed to go down at the hands of the Irish Members who had succeeded in capturing the Prime Minister, and in getting him to join them in the betrayal. The duty of the Unionist Party, at any rate, was clear. In the first place, they had to place before the country the true meaning of this Gagging Resolution, and to dispute altogether the reasons advanced by the Government. In the next place, it was their duty to do their best to free the country from the policy which the worst possible Government of the country was endeavouring to give effect to.

*SIR E. ASHMEAD-BARTLETT (Sheffield, Ecclesall) said, there was only one part of the speech of the right hon. Gentleman who had just sat down with which he would venture to disagree, and it was the one in which the right hon. Gentleman compared the Prime Minister with Strafford. He must protest against the comparison as unfair to Strafford. They had had a very interesting speech in the earlier part of the evening from the hon. Member for Bedford (Mr. S. Whitbread.) The hon. Gentleman always appeared on the scene at the moment when the Government, of which he was a valued and valuable supporter, was in dire straits. It might be said of him that he acted as an old Parliamentary "bouquet." That night he had played his accustomed rôle with even more than his accustomed skill. He dwelt upon two points chiefly. He told them that the Prime Minister was doing what had been done by the Conservative Government in 1887, and he expressed his inability to understand what was meant by "the British majority." The hon. Gentleman, if he sought again the suffrages of the electors of Bedford, would learn perfectly well what the British majority meant, because he would find that the electors of that ancient English borough would not return to Parliament a gentleman who had voted in favour of the Irish gag. [Cries of "Order!"] The inconsistency and absurdity of the argument of the hon. Gentleman as to the "British majority" were sufficiently exposed by the late Chancellor of the Exchequer. He would only say that for a follower of the present Government to deny the right of the Unionists to appeal to the feelings of the majority of the people of England and Scotland, when the sole basis on which the Prime Minister founds his Home Rule Bill was that they had in its favour a majority of the people of Ireland, was a paradox so complete and so utter that it hardly required refutation. The other argument of the right hon. Gentleman was that the Tories adopted the same course in 1887. But no one knew better than the hon. Gentleman that there was no comparison between the present Bill and the Bill of 1887. Every detail of the so-called Coercion Bill was thoroughly familiar to the House and the country. Every item of it had been discussed over and over again in the House. The Prime Minister had himself, in 1881 and 1882, introduced and passed Bills in the House which contained every detail of the Bill of 1887, and many additional and much more drastic details as well. [Mr. W. E. GLADSTONE dissented.] The Prime Minister shook his head, but they knew that at present no value was to be attached to these movements or gesticulations of the right hon. Gentleman. [Cries of "Oh, oh!"] He did not know what the Chancellor of the Exchequer meant by saying "Oh." What he (Sir E. Ashmead-Bartlett) meant was that the Prime Minister constantly in the House denied or affirmed things to which, if he had devoted the great resources of his memory at the moment more closely, he would have been unwilling to deny or to affirm them. [Cries of "Oh!"] He would repeat, for the Prime Minister's benefit, that his Bill of 1881 and his Bill of 1882 contained far more drastic provisions than those which were contained in the Bill of 1887.

MR. J. MORLEY : The Bill of 1887 was permanent.

SIR E. ASHMEAD-BARTLETT : Just notice the miserable resort to which the Chief Secretary was driven. He did not mention a practical detail of the Bill. The Chief Secretary laid stress upon one fact, that the Bill of 1887 was not for a limited period. The Chief Secretary knew perfectly well that any Bill, whether for a limited or unlimited period, could be repealed by Parliament; and if the Government felt so strongly on that particular detail why did not they repeal the Bill?

MR. J. MORLEY : We have dropped it.

SIR E. ASHMEAD-BARTLETT : Quite so, and here was the Chief Secretary answering himself. He had given the right Gentleman credit for being, at all events, more or less of a superficial logician. [Cries of "Order!"] But he was not even superficial, for in one breath he reproached them for having made the Bill permanent, and in the next he told them the Government had been able to get rid of it by dropping it, thereby entirely destroying his own argument. The Government had proposed for the second time this measure of permanent or complete Closure—this gag—this guillotine. And why? Not from any great consideration of policy. There was absolutely no question of policy involved. They had not themselves proposed that the Bill should come into operation before September, 1894. That was to say, they had still 12 months before the Bill must become law. Therefore, there was no absolute necessity, such as existed in 1887, for restoring order in Ireland, and preventing crimes which rendered the life of peaceful and loyal citizens intolerable. The proposal of the Government was based absolutely on Party considerations. It was no secret that the Prime Minister was himself coerced into adopting this policy. [A laugh.] The Prime Minister now smiled at the suggestion, but a very few weeks ago he did not smile, and could not have brought himself to smile. The Prime Minister proposed this gag, in the first place, against his better taste and judgment, and he was driven into it by the Radical wire-pullers and manipulators of his Party. The gag had been introduced because the Government found it impossible without it to carry any important measure of British reform in the same Session in which they brought forward this Irish revolutionary measure. That was a partizan motive. The measure now before the House was not a single Bill—it was a hundred Bills—it was a thousand Bills rolled into one. [A laugh.] He recommended the right hon. Member for Brightside (Mr. Mundella), who laughed, to read the Bill. He very much doubted if the right hon. Gentleman had read it hitherto. If he read the Bill he would find it embraced a large number of details which, in ordinary times, would occupy many hundred Bills. He would mention one instance. The law of habeas corpus—a subject which had exercised the ingenuity and patriotism of generations of British statesmen—was dismissed after two or three hours' Debate. It was a portion of a sub-section of a single clause, and it had been discussed in two or three hours. The Bill, in fact, dealt with the whole administration of Ireland, and with the relations of Ireland to the United Kingdom. Under what circumstances was it proposed to gag this Bill? The whole financial basis of the Bill had been three times reconstructed. The latest reconstruction only took place a short week before the gag, and the Debate upon it was limited to the first six lines of the first of the clauses. The result of the financial scheme which was closed in this way was that in future the people of England and Scotland were to pay 35s. a head towards Imperial taxation, and the people of Ireland only 6s. 6d. It was not surprising that the Government were anxious to close the Bill. Then, again, with regard to Clause 9, the Prime Minister had told the House over and over again that the Government intended to adhere to the in-and-out scheme. The Government changed their whole front upon that clause, and decided to allow the Irish Members to be present to discuss and to obstruct every question that came before the Imperial Parliament. This measure had been well described as a gag upon the people of Great Britain. It was an attempt to stifle and destroy the voice and the vote of the Representatives of the majority of England and Scotland by the operation of the small Irish majority of the Government. It was a very striking fact, and one worth recalling, that in the final Divisions which took place upon the former application of the gag the majority of English Members who voted against the gag was 77, and if they added the Scotch Members to the English Members the majority was 56; and, adding the Welsh Members as well, the total British majority against the application of the gag was 34. These facts would be remembered by the people of this country, and he was certain that when the decision of the electors came to be given upon the policy of the Government an enormous English majority would be returned against the present Prime Minister (Mr. W. E. Gladstone). The Prime Minister had said that he thought no race was in greater need of discipline than the English people. Well, the right hon. Gentleman had proceeded to apply the discipline. He had undertaken to break up the Union, to dismember the Empire, to undo the work of a thousand years. It was a little more than a thousand years since England was united into one land, and the process of unification and consolidation which the Government was now going to break up had been going on ever since. The Prime Minister was not only going to undo this great work, but he was going to make the British people pay for it. The sooner the appeal was made to the people the better, and he was confident that when it was made the Separation policy of the Government would be entirely and overwhelmingly reversed.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER (Sir W. HARCOURT, Derby): The speech to which we have just listened is a sufficient symptom that the Debate is exhausted. I do not think the Government have any reason to complain of this Debate, or of the Amendment which has been moved to the Resolution of the Government. I have always observed, with some gratitude, that from the Liberal Unionist Benches the most valuable assistance frequently comes to the Government. The Liberal Unionist Members manage to frame their Amendments in such a way that they have given to this Administration, in the course of the present Session, a greater number of Votes of Confidence than any Government of modern times has ever received. As to the speech of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Birmingham (Mr. J. Chamberlain), we have always recognised that his speeches have the peculiar effect of rallying and uniting the Liberal Party, which is hardly to be found in the speeches coming from any other source. The violent injustices of his language, his exaggerated virulence, and his personal rancour towards the Leader of the Liberal Party have an effect upon that Party which they gratefully recognise. It was said of a man that one blast upon his bugle-horn was worth a thousand men; but one blast upon the horn of the right hon. Gentleman is worth many votes. I think my hon. Friend the Member for Bedford (Mr. S. Whitbread) has already disposed of the Amendment and its Mover, and I do not think it necessary to add much to the Debate. I quite agree that in a question of this kind every case must stand upon its own merits; it is not sufficient to be governed simply by precedent on occasions of this character. Therefore, I do not wish carefully to inquire whether one case is absolutely upon all-fours with another. But, Sir, the right hon. Gentleman opposite cannot get rid of the precedent of 1887 so easily as that. It is not merely by alleging that the cases are different that they can be disposed of. The importance of the precedent of 1887 was that it introduced for the first time the principle of the Time Closure in the House of Commons—that is to say, of fixing a particular time by which a Bill should be passed through the House. Of course, that was a proceeding which was very inconsistent with all the former practice and traditions of the House of Commons, and it formed in itself a very important precedent. It broke the ice which had remained there—I will not say for a thousand years, but for a very long time ; it was the letting out of the water on the subject of the Closure. Gentlemen opposite sometimes pay me the undeserved compliment of quoting my former speeches. It rather wounds my vanity that they have omitted the speech which I made on that particular proposal, because I rather plume myself upon the prediction I made upon that occasion. I ventured to point out to the House in 1887 that the probability—and, indeed, the necessary consequence of the step the House was then taking—was that, as always happens, especially in the English House of Commons, where precedents are followed, that it would be pursued, and particularly with regard to the coming Home Rule Bill. From that point of view I rather welcomed the precedent of 1887, and I do not think I protested against it. I certainly did not vote against it. Of course, you thought your Bill a good Bill, and we thought it a bad one. Well, that generally takes place between the opposite sides of the House, and now we think our Bill a good Bill. [Opposition cries of "Oh!"] But you do not apparently have the same toleration for the promotion of our Bill as we had for the promotion of yours. Your Bill represented your Irish policy ; it was the policy of coercion. You used what you now call the "gag" for the purpose of carrying the policy of coercion. We have proposed what we regard as a policy of conciliation, and we propose to take a similar form and method to promote the policy which we have proposed. Well, then, the only real question in this matter is—Has there been a reasonable time, in the opinion of reasonable men, given for the discussion of this Bill? Upon that point the country will form its opinion. After all the other Party issues have been disposed of the question will be—Has there, or has there not, been a reasonable time given for the discussion of this measure? In my opinion, everything else in this Debate is beside the question. At all events, primâ facie we are able to say we have given 80 days for the discussion of this question, and that, I understand, is double the time that has ever been given to any measure brought under the consideration of the House of Commons. I venture to say that, under these circumstances, the onus of proof lies upon those who say that a reasonable time has not been given. It is asked—Where is the unreasonableness of the time we have taken in the discussion? The right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Birmingham (Mr. J. Chamberlain), speaking for the universe, assured us that there never had been any intention that this Bill should not pass in the course of the present Session. If he says that for himself I am quite willing to accept it, but he must allow to me my own opinion as to the intentions of the other parts to the universe. Indeed, the right hon. Gentleman was flatly contradicted by his ally opposite the late Chancellor of the Exchequer (Mr. Goschen), who said that this Bill consisted of 16 Bills, and that each of those Bills required a month each. I ventured to observe across the Table that 16 months were more than a year, which seemed to me to be a well-founded statement, borne out by the almanack. The right hon. Gentleman amiably acquiesced in that proposition. Then I venture to say that he was not in accord with the right hon. Member for West Birmingham when he said that the intention was that the consideration of this Bill should have been concluded in the present year. When we remember how this Bill has been treated, I think we may form an opinion—I am quite sure the country will—as to what the intentions were that dictated the manner in which the campaign has been conducted. When the Bill was divided into what were called compartments, with the object of bringing a certain number of clauses under discussion in each successive week, what happened? I think that in nearly all those weeks the whole week was expended in the discussion of a single clause, and that clause was not completed. In these circumstances, we have to ask ourselves if the Opposition are determined to spend more than a week upon every clause, because it really comes to that—[Cries of "No!"] —well, every clause they had the chance of discussing they spent more than a week upon—is it possible that any measure of first-rate importance can ever be dealt with by the House of Commons? That is what it really comes to. We are in this situation—Is the House of Commons to be reduced to such impotence that a minority can so conduct their opposition that no first-rate measure, if they choose to refuse it, shall be allowed to pass through the House of Commons in a single Session? That is practically the question. I will try to convince even the right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Birmingham (Mr. J. Chamberlain). I know him too well to attempt to convince him by any authority less than his own. On this, as on many subjects, I have learnt much from the right hon. Gentleman; and upon this, as upon most other questions, at one time or other we were in perfect accord. I think we are in perfect accord upon this subject now. Nothing will give me greater satisfaction than to find I have the support of my right hon. Friend. No one, I am sure, ever states the views he entertains in a more lucid and forcible manner before this House and the country than the right hon. Gentleman. That which, to my mind, is the base and root of the whole question is—How far and under what circumstances does it become imperative upon a deliberative Assembly to assert the right of the majority to carry its measures? Now, the right hon. Gentleman propounded this in an excellent manner not three years ago. He said—

“The problem presented by the growth of obstruction in the House of Commons is continually becoming more urgent and more important. We have already arrived at a condition of things in which it is possible for any minority absolutely to prevent the majority from passing any legislation at all.”

And then he paid a well-deserved compliment to the Opposition in the late Parliament. He said—

“During the last Session the Government were enabled to carry a certain number of non-Party Bills. This limited success was due entirely to the forbearance of their opponents, who were satisfied with the withdrawal of the chief Bills in the Unionist programme and magnanimously refrained from pushing their advantage to the fullest limit. But there is no doubt that under the existing rule they have it in their power to prevent the passing of a single Bill and to make the Session an absolute blank so far as legislation is concerned. Is this state of things Constitutional? Is it consistent with the theory of democratic government? Is it in the interests of the people at large?”

That is the question which we have to determine here in the first instance, and which the people outside have to determine afterwards. You think they will determine it in your favour. We believe they will decide it in our favour, and I am trying now to show what the question really is. Then, referring to the obstruction of which he speaks, the right hon. Gentleman proceeds to observe that the power of the people under such a system “becomes an empty name. It is useless for the people to express their wishes and to return Representatives . . . if all the efforts of those Representatives can be successfully paralysed by a determined and factious Opposition. An ordinary Session of Parliament affords ample time for the fair presentation of arguments for and against the leading proposals of the Government. It offers sufficient opportunities for the consideration and decision of every reasonable Amendment. On the other hand, no Session, however protracted, will be found sufficient for even a solitary Bill if all the Members of the Opposition insist on exercising their technical rights to the utmost.”

This is a true presentation of the question, in my opinion, with which we have to deal. Well, the right hon. Gentleman then deals with the case of America, where they were encountering exactly the same difficulty, and describes the method in which the difficulty has there been dealt with. He refers to various proceedings which have proved ineffectual till at last they came to what is called the application of the “Previous Question,” which is similar to the Resolution now before the House—that is, the time Closure, within the time limited for that purpose. And then the right hon. Gentleman, speaking of the practice of the United States, says—

“By this proceeding, summary and arbitrary as it may appear to us, obstruction is rendered hopeless. At a predetermined date and hour the Bill or Resolution under consideration must be voted on,”

—and I will call attention to this observation, which seems to be very pertinent to our present situation—

“and the minority have only themselves to thank if they waste the intervening period on irrelevances or personalities instead of using it to bring forward their strongest objections and most important Amendments.”

That seems to have met with the approval of the right hon. Gentleman, and he saw no injustice to the minority.

MR. J. CHAMBERLAIN: I beg my right hon. Friend's pardon. He has been perfectly fair up to the present moment, but he is going too far when he says that met with my approval, because if he will be kind enough to continue the passage he will find I pointed out that in the United States, by this arbitrary process, they have entirely destroyed free discussion.

SIR W. HARCOURT: I can assure the right hon. Gentleman that I do not want to do him any injustice. I will treat him as fairly as I can. But this is to be taken always supposing reasonable time has been given, and that the minority has not taken advantage of that reasonable time. Then the right hon. Gentleman says—

"Whatever the future may have in store for American politics, it seems certain that the death-knell of obstruction has been sounded as an established instrument of Parliament and Parliamentary tactics, and future minorities will have to earn the privilege of fair discussion by giving the clearest evidence of their determination not to abuse it."

We are agreed upon that. As far as I can see, we are agreed that the minority are to earn the privilege of fair discussion by giving the clearest evidence of their determination not to abuse it. We have thus made some progress towards what is called "the gag." That is what has been established in America. But what does the right hon. Gentleman say of the condition of the House of Commons? He says—

"The position of this country is most striking. Here the control of business has passed out of the hands of the Government of the Queen and the majority of the Representatives of the people. Legislation is only possible by the sufferance of the minority, and very often a small minority, made up of the least respectable and least intelligent."

That is an awkward point—who are the least respectable and least intelligent—upon which I do not desire to dwell. It is hardly necessary to the argument. Having reviewed the measures taken by America and the results produced, and contrasted them favourably with the results now extant in the House of Commons, the right hon. Gentleman proceeded—

"In considering this important question it should be borne in mind that under any system the majority have the power of controlling business if they choose to exert it. No change of rule is necessary for this purpose, only a change of practice and of a deeply-rooted feeling which has hitherto made such a proceeding distasteful to the majority of the House of Commons, and has led them to submit to the tyranny of a small minority than to depart from the generous traditions of many centuries of representative Government."

I agree entirely with that, and I think it was a memorable day when the practice was broken through in 1887. I say that is a precedent which necessarily has had, and will have, its consequences. Having used these arguments there comes a remark of the right hon. Gentleman which is deserving of the special attention of the House—

"But there is nothing to prevent the majority from bringing up and passing, under the Closure Rule, similar Resolutions to those adopted in Congress, limiting debate on any particular measure or even preventing debate altogether. It is not the power that is wanted, but the will, and the experience of Democratic rule in the United States justifies the belief that if a Leader should hereafter arise who should even by the most arbitrary method restore to the House of Commons its old authority over its Members, and enable it to regain control of its business, he would be supported by public opinion, and would be held to have deserved well of the country. Good government he would have rescued from paralysis and contempt."

MR. J. CHAMBERLAIN: Will my right hon. Friend read the next sentence?

SIR W. HARCOURT: Certainly. It continues—

"It would seem wiser not to wait for the advent of this deliverer."

Now the right hon. Gentleman denounces the deliverer [pointing to Mr. Gladstone] as an arbitrary tyrant. Three years ago the right hon. Gentleman was on his knees praying for a saviour of society, but now he moves this Amendment to my right hon. Friend's Resolution. The right hon. Gentleman goes on in his article to discuss various points, among others the matter of Supply, which is not yet under consideration, and he says—

"Coming now to the question of the Committee stage on Bills, it has been already pointed out that under our present system it is easy for a small minority to occupy a whole Session of Parliament in the discussion of Amendments in Committee on a single Bill."

Then he says—

"It cannot be too strongly insisted upon that no ordinary Closure, no limitation of the length of speeches, no rule against repetition or disorder will prevent this possibility. There is one remedy, and only one—namely, that adopted by the American House of Representatives in fixing by Resolution the limit of time at which the whole Debate in Committee shall be brought to a close. Supposing that a reasonable and, indeed, an ample time is fixed for this purpose, will anyone contend that there would be any hardship to the minority or that public interest would suffer?"

When some reference was made to this very remarkable article the other day the right hon. Gentleman said he desired that this question of fixing a limit of time to any Bill should be referred to an impartial Committee. Well, I think it would be difficult to frame an impartial Committee to deal with this question. I dare say, however, the right hon. Gentleman does not think so. Perhaps he is of opinion that if he were Chairman of a Committee composed of the gentlemen who sit around him it would be an impartial Committee. For myself, I do not exactly see how this impartial Committee is to be formed or how such a step as this can ever be taken except as it is taken in the House of Representatives, by the majority of the House, who are the Representatives for the time being, at all events, of the majority of the people whose business they sit here to transact. Then these ardent Unionists are so very anxious to dissect the majority of the House of Commons, and we have now for the first time, I should think, in the annals of the House of Commons the suggestion of a British majority. [Mr. A. J. BALFOUR: Hear, hear!] Yes; but if you are going to dissect the majority, why do you not separate Scotland and Wales? Why not speak of a Scotch majority, a Welsh majority, an Irish majority? The late Chancellor of the Exchequer became a little confused when he was dealing with this question of a British majority, for he said—

"Of course we do not separate majorities as long as this is a United Kingdom."

Well, at any rate, it is a United Kingdom now. Why, therefore, talk about a British majority? We know, of course, very well what this language means. It is the old language of ascendancy, language redolent of that spirit according to which it was always supposed that the Irish were an inferior race, and that their votes ought to be reckoned on a lower scale. It is part of the old tradition that it was the British alone who had a right to govern. I fancy I am rather a better Unionist than the late Chancellor of the Exchequer, for I maintain that in this House of Commons there is no English majority, no Scottish majority, no Welsh majority, and no Irish majority. It is a majority of the collective Representatives of the people, representing the majority of the people of the United Kingdom. Well, Sir, I have endeavoured to state to the House what I consider is the question to be discussed and determined to-night. Have the Government proposed an adequate time for the discussion of this Bill? [Opposition cries of "No!"] I know you are not satisfied; but that is our opinion, and it is upon that ground that we propose this Resolution. It is perfectly true that ultimately the country will have to decide. I do not complain the least in the world of an Opposition always calling for a Dissolution. We always did it when we were in Opposition. A man who has lost a game always likes to have his revenge, and possibly to get his money back again. But the country who sent us back in a majority expects, and has a right to expect, that we should do something, and we intend to do it. When we told you to dissolve the country was against you on Coercion. I may observe that you did not dissolve for six years, but when you did you found out that we were right. After six years we may make the same discovery, but the discovery has not been made yet. It seems to me that we have put a very fair issue before the House. It is perfectly idle all this talk about the gag. You have the doctrine of the gag explained in the article I have read. You had the system of the gag established for the first time by gentlemen on the opposite Bench. They may say that it was applied in an excellent cause; we say it was applied in a bad one. We say we are applying it in a good cause. You may say we are applying it in a bad cause. These are opposing opinions which opposite Parties will take. That is a matter which has to be determined, and which ought to be determined, by the majority of the Representatives of the people. We have placed before you the grounds upon which we consider that the time we have given for the discussion of this Bill is ample. I must say that the state of the House for the last week—I might almost have said to-night—has shown that the time has been considered ample by most of its Members, because they have ceased to take much part in the discussions. I believe—I know you will not agree—that the country, the majority of the country, is satisfied that there has been quite time enough spent upon the Bill. That is the opinion which we have entertained, which we have embodied in this Resolution, and on that Resolution we are perfectly prepared to take the opinion of the House of Commons now and to take the opinion of the country hereafter.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR (Manchester, E.): I rise, Sir, to congratulate the right hon. Gentleman, and I congratulate him on two grounds: I congratulate him, in the first place, on having been able to find a quotation from one of his own speeches with which he heartily agrees; and I congratulate him, in the second place, because he has been able to supplement the labour which most of us undergo when we address this House on a question by occupying almost the whole of the time he has addressed the House in reading out some extremely interesting extracts from an article by somebody else. I certainly do not complain of that. I am only delighted to see the right hon. Gentleman shelter himself under my right hon. Friend the Member for West Birmingham.

SIR W. HARCOURT: Preaching another man's sermon.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: The right hon. Gentleman can express himself with much greater felicity than I can command. I am delighted to see him preaching another man's sermon, but it seems to me that he somewhat misunderstood the text. I do not pretend to have refreshed myself with a careful perusal of the article from which we have had such copious extracts; but if I understood those extracts, and interpreting the whole article merely in the light of those extracts—which, I presume, were carefully selected—I should have said that they represented the views of my right hon. Friend when he was dealing with a small minority who had ample time for discussing the measures placed before them. Whether we have or have not had ample time to discuss the measures placed before us is a question I shall come to directly, but whether we are or are not a small minority is a question I will deal with at once. I may remind the right hon. Gentleman that a minority which is only 5 per cent. less than the majority of the House cannot under any estimate be regarded as a small minority; and when he quotes the example of my right hon. Friend—when he quotes American precedent for a mode of dealing with great Constitutional changes, he provokes one into reminding him of what the provisions in America are for preventing great Constitutional changes. Does the right hon. Gentleman think that the American Senate and House of Representatives, who were held up—and in certain respects quite rightly held up—by my right hon. Friend opposite, would have tolerated, or could, if they wished, tolerate, a great Constitutional change advocated only by a majority which differed from the minority by 5 per cent.? To make a Constitutional change—not like the present revolution, but the smallest change—in the American Constitution requires a two-thirds majority of the House of Representatives and a two-thirds majority of the Senate; and after that two-thirds majority has been obtained in both the great Representative Assemblies, it then requires to be submitted to the State Legislatures, and three-fourths of the State Legislatures must give their assent. And you have the courage to bring before us as a parallel to your own procedure the action of the free Republic on the other side of the Atlantic, which, whatever be its merits or whatever be its faults, at all events differs from the majority of this House in this: that it knows how to value a Constitution handed down to it by its forefathers.

AN hon. MEMBER : It did not pass an Act of Union.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR : At all events, the right hon. Gentleman did show that he appreciated the gravity of the step which he and his friends are requiring their followers to adopt to-night ; and in that he differed—and, I think, differed for the better—from the Prime Minister. I never heard a speech, introducing, I will not say a great violation, but, at all events, a great revolution in our procedure, like that delivered by the Prime Minister. It was a genial speech, it was a cheerful speech ; it was a speech delivered with every charm of manner ; but he never approached the subject. He asked us to sign away our liberty as you would sign a cheque for a few shillings ; and as for arguing the case, the Prime Minister, possibly as a good tactician, but certainly not as a great statesman, never brought before us for one moment the real magnitude of the issues which we are now confronting. He told us that it was the logical conclusion of his previous action, that what we were asked to do to-night was the consequence bound by an iron chain of that which we had, unfortunately, done a month ago. I do not know whether this iron chain is to stop where it is. I do not know why we are not to find ourselves bound by it hand and foot in future times, and why this, which is the logical conclusion, according to the right hon. Gentleman, of what we have done earlier in the Session, should not be itself the logical premiss of acts of equal tyranny performed either by right hon. Gentlemen or by their successors in future Sessions of Parliament. The fact of the matter is, that all those who pretend that this is not a new departure, and who will attempt to base their action upon anything done by hon. Gentlemen now on the Opposition Bench a few years ago, entirely mistake, as it seems to me, the functions of a Legislative Assembly and an Executive Assembly. We are both. If we were merely a Legislative Assembly which did not meddle in Executive matters, one rule would be applicable to all our procecedure. But we insist on interfering, and are required to and must interfere, in Executive matters as well as in legislative matters ; and there are some matters, technically legislative, which trench so nearly upon the Executive functions and duties of Government that they cannot really be distinguished from them. Such was the action we took in 1887. Every man will admit—whether he agrees with what we did in 1887 or not—that it is the first duty of Government to maintain law, preserve the rights of individual citizens, and preserve general order. Every man will admit that a Government which finds itself face to face with a state of disorder, which, in its opinion, cannot be quelled or dealt with in any other way, is bound to get through this House the necessary legislative powers to enable it to deal with the situation in which it finds itself. That general proposition, which is true of the maintenance of the law, is equally true in cases of public danger or foreign invasion, and in cases of any public crisis. But you must distinguish broadly from cases of that kind ; cases which are merely and strictly legislative cases ; cases in which you are endeavouring to reform if you will—to injure and destroy, as we think—the Constitution of the country ; cases in which you are passing laws which may be good or bad, but of which the imminent and instant necessity is not obviously demonstrable ; and in that second category, by your own confession, stands the Bill which we have been discussing for these 70 days. There are Home Rulers in this House and anti-Home Rulers—men who believe the salvation of Ireland, and this country too, depends on our passing Home Rule, and men who have a precisely opposite opinion ; but whether we be Home Rulers or whether we be anti-Home Rulers, all of us must agree in this : that whether Home Rule be passed in 1894, or 1895, or 1896, or 1897 does not affect the future of this country or of Ireland. It is not a question of months or days, as in the case of the Crimes Act. It is not the case of a foreign invasion or of a great public crisis. This is a case of a great alteration in the Constitution of the country, and, whether that alteration be good or bad, at all events this House may at least claim the full power to discuss the details of the main provisions of the measure which the Government have submitted to us. That broad principle being laid down, and I hope and believe accepted by the House, I ask whether there is any excuse for the revolution in our procedure attempted to be thrust upon us by the Government and by the small majority which it commands? The hon. Member for Bedford (Mr. Whitbread) gave one reason why the change should be made. He said we are exhausted by our labours; that the attendance in the House during the last two or three weeks shows that the House is not fit adequately to discuss the Home Rule Bill. I do not say that the House at 90 in the shade is in the best possible condition to carry through difficult and responsible legislation, but, at all events, our discussions, feeble as they may be, are surely better than no discussion at all. The arguments we humbly advance are better than none at all. If the Government adopt the wise procedure recommended by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Birmingham, and ask the House to re-consider the question in the autumn we shall be happy to accede; but if the Government insist upon carrying on the business through August, we also are ready to meet their wishes. The difficulties are not of our seeking, and they do not call for the taunt of the hon. Member for Bedford, because, in my recollection, never have labours of the Session been of such extraordinary magnitude, and the House has at this season of the year never devoted itself with such energy to the discussion of legislation. This is the first argument that has been advanced. The second argument is this, and it is chiefly relied upon by the Prime Minister: He said—"You have attempted to smother this Bill with the number of your Amendments." Well, I have watched this Bill closely, with a closeness rivalled only by two other Members in this House, and I absolutely deny that there has ever been any desire to smother the Bill, or that that result, as a matter of fact, has been attained. It all depends on the view that you may take of the complexity of the Bill. My right hon. Friend said it was equal to 16 Bills. I will not say how many Bills it is equal to, but I will say that every step you take you kick up a new principle; you tumble over principles every moment, and you cannot move through a clause, through a sentence—I might almost say through a word—of this Bill without finding that questions are raised equalling in magnitude those raised by half-a-dozen of the ordinary humdrum Bills on which this House very properly spends its time. When we recollect that this Bill deals with the whole question of the Police in Ireland, Civil servants in Ireland, the whole Executive in Ireland, the Royal veto in Ireland, the constitution of two Houses of Legislature in Ireland, finance and the land—not to weary the House with other questions—any one of which might form the subject of a Bill which would in itself become of great importance in any Session, is it not a little grotesque to say that we have abused the Rules of the House in moving Amendments? The only other argument I have heard is that, in addition to there being too many Amendments, those Amendments have been discussed at too great length. I hear the Chief Secretary assent to that. He is the Minister in charge of the Bill. It is the duty of the Minister in charge of a Bill, when the discussion has gone on too long, to move the Closure. How often on this Bill has the Closure been moved and granted during the Report stage? So far as I am aware, the Closure has been moved twice and granted once, and once only. Is it not absurd, then, to say that the discussions on individual Amendments have gone on too long? Clearly, they have not either in the opinion of the Government, or in the opinion of the authority in the Chair at the time; and certainly my own recollection is that the discussions have been remarkable for their brevity. I am not now discussing whether or not there have been too many Amendments. I am only discussing whether or not they have or have not been debated too long, and I can state with absolute assurance and confidence, having had some experience in these matters, that in all my knowledge of the House I have never heard Debates compressed within limits, on the whole, more narrow, more directed to the point, and in which those who have on the part of the Opposition been responsible for the conduct of the Debate have striven more genuinely and earnestly to confine the discussion and the argument to the point at issue. [Mr. MUNDELLA dissented.] I see that the President of the Board of Trade expresses a doubt about that. He has been away during these Debates attending to his Departmental duties. I have been here and he has not, and I give that as the direct and distinct conclusion I have drawn from a most careful and impartial consideration of what has taken place. If there has been an exception to this general rule, it has not been an exception of which I individually, or the House, I think, have felt any reason to complain. The only person, so far as I know, who has at all travelled beyond the strict line of relevant argument has been the one man in the House to whom such a sin is readily forgiven — namely, the Prime Minister. He has delighted us; he has cheered us through the hot weather — through our protracted labours — by speeches of which I can only say they are the one thing that would have consoled me for the deprivation of a holiday which I have been taught by long experience to expect about this time of the year. But, though the right hon. Gentleman's speeches have had all the qualities of readiness, elasticity, and dexterity, of eloquence, and charm, I cannot honestly say that they have always had the merit of relevancy. I particularly have in my mind one famous occasion on which in a rash moment I made a rash observation that the Government were not worth answering. What was the result of that ill-timed observation? It was that the Prime Minister jumped to his legs and, with splendid gesture and eloquence, launched out into a denunciation of the actions of the Tory Government in 1887 with regard to the Land Bill, quoting Lord Salisbury about the sacredness of judicial rents, and discussing all kinds of questions on which there was absolutely nothing to say except that they were quite wide apart. We were not discussing Lord Salisbury; we had nothing to do with judicial rents; we were not touching on anything in the least connected with the subject; but the right hon. Gentleman could not restrain himself, and he delighted the House and wasted our time in a speech of three-quarters of an hour.

[Cries of "An hour!"] I do not quite recollect, the time passed so quickly to those who heard the speech—but we felt that whatever it was it was not business. I recollect another case. It was when the Government had, by some of those errors of tactics to which all Governments are liable, blundered into a perfectly untenable position. They had, through one of those mistakes which are quite unaccountable, and which we all make, determined to resist an Amendment which had for its object the repeal of a certain Bill which gave very abnormal privileges to the Irish Government with respect to the repeal of the Habeas Corpus Act. I recollect that Debate well. The right hon. Gentleman first attempted to break down the Opposition forces by throwing against them the whole weight of the Solicitor General. As they still remained unmoved and unshaken, he then launched against us the reserve of the Attorney General; and, still finding us undefeated, the right hon. Gentleman thought that a strategic retreat was the only course open. Much as I admire the right hon. Gentleman, and greatly as I have enjoyed his performances on this Bill, I do not think that my admiration ever rose to the point it did on that occasion. He made an admirable speech. He professed to have been converted to our view long before his Solicitor General or Attorney General had spoken. He launched into an account of the passing of the Octennial Bill by Grattan's Parliament, absolutely irrelevant, I need hardly say, to the particular Amendment. Having given us a vivid account of the Parliamentary vicissitudes of that great measure, he said that he had no doubt, from internal evidence, that the same exertions that Grattan's Parliament made in favour of the Octennial Bill they had made in favour of the repeal of this Habeas Corpus Act. He said he had no historical knowledge of the fact, but he had no doubt they did do it, and on that ground he would do it. Finally, he concluded by declaring himself converted to his own views by the speech of his own Attorney General, which was directly in the opposite sense, and he did that with the admiration and assent of the whole House. There was not a man who did not enjoy it; there was not a man who did not think better of the right hon. Gentleman, and there was not a man who would not have done it himself if he could. There was one fault, and one fault alone, of which that speech may be accused. It took three-quarters of an hour; and if it took three-quarters of an hour for the Prime Minister to accept an Amendment, I want to know how the Opposition can be attacked for taking many times three-quarters of an hour in supporting an Amendment? I thought something would be gained by mentioning these concrete instances; but there are others scarcely less striking which will, I am sure, come to the mind of everyone who has followed the proceedings of the Committee closely; and I say boldly that, although the right hon. Gentleman has shown the most extraordinary Parliamentary genius through all these Debates, nevertheless he, and he alone, is guilty of the irrelevance and waste of time which, most unjustly, has been put upon our shoulders in the attack made upon us. I think, and I have always thought, that we are primarily, and must always be primarily, a debating Assembly if we are to carry out our duties. Right hon. Gentlemen opposite talk as if discussion was the privilege of the Opposition. They say—"If you spend a lot of time over Clauses 2, 3, and 4 you cannot expect to have the fun of discussing 5, 6, 7, up to the 44th clause." But it is not a case of the amusement of the Opposition; it is a case of our carrying out our duties to our constituents. Even if it be granted, as I do not grant, that we have not compressed our Debates on the first four clauses within the narrow limits which we might have done, I say there is not the faintest shadow of an excuse for preventing this House, either on the Committee stage or on Report stage, from carrying out its duties and discussing the proposals of the Government. It is not the Opposition who are hurt by this; it is the House itself. We have no love for sitting here through August discussing this Bill. You do not do us a kindness by letting us go on. The question is, whether or not this House, if you curtail, I will not say its privileges, but if you prevent it from carrying out its duties, can retain, or will deserve to retain, the position it now holds in the estimation of our countrymen. I am of opinion now, as I have always been, that our traditions are sufficiently robust, deep-seated, and permanent to prevent one or even two tyrannical actions like this from absolutely destroying the future of this House? I am not a pessimist, and I refuse to take a gloomy view of the future of this Assembly. I acknowledge that the long discussions, which are the absolutely inevitable and necessary incidents of Assemblies of this kind living under Democratic Institutions, might produce an impatience in the country among the democracy which, in a moment of madness, might induce them to deprive us of our liberty and to triumph over our fall. But I do not believe that the great crisis has yet arrived. I see no signs of any catastrophe of this kind. For if that happens it must happen under the stress of some great popular excitement. It must be under the leadership of a man who not only commands universal admiration for his talents and the respect of a great Party in the State, but who has behind him the great mass of the people of this country. No such catastrophe has yet occurred. Gentlemen opposite do not pretend to themselves, even in their most sanguine moments, that they come here with the force of a great popular movement behind them. They do not look forward to the next Election as men going from a triumphant struggle to receive a great ovation. They are like criminals awaiting their trial, and, like criminals in that unhappy condition, I do not think that they are likely to hasten the event which will, however, sooner or later come upon them. But when that time shall come, when the National Assize shall be held at which men are to be judged by their political deeds, I, at all events, firmly believe that a punishment will be inflicted on the criminals in this case which will take from them and their successors any desire in future to repeat the offence.

QUESTIONS.

WESTON TURVILLE SCHOOL.

MR. TALBOT (Oxford University) : I beg to ask the Vice President of the Committee of Council on Education, in view of the fact, in addition to other considerable improvements and alterations, the Education Department are requiring the Managers of Weston Turville School, in the County of Buckingham, forthwith to paint the whole exterior of the school, will he state by what section of the Code this requirement of a matter which affects neither the comfort nor the wellbeing of the children is authorised ?

THE VICE PRESIDENT OF THE COUNCIL (Mr. ACLAND, York, W.R., Rotherham) : In the last letter of the Department to the School Managers (dated July 22nd) all that is required as regards the painting of the exterior of the building is that the external wood-work should be painted as soon as possible. A building can hardly be kept in a healthy condition, as required by Article 85 of the Code, if the windows are allowed to deteriorate for want of painting, but the Department will not press that the work should be done immediately, if the Managers consider that it can be properly held over for another year.

DISTURBANCES IN CAVAN.

MR. YOUNG (Cavan, E.) : I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland why an additional force of police has been sent to Cootehill, County Cavan ; and if the extra police will soon be removed ?

THE CHIEF SECRETARY FOR IRELAND (Mr. J. MORLEY, Newcastle-upon-Tyne) : A protection post of five constables was temporarily formed at Lisnagoon, near Cootehill, on the 3rd instant, for the purpose of affording protection to a number of labourers employed on an evicted farm. No charge will fall on the county in respect of this post, which was broken up on the 17th instant.

BRITISH COMMERCIAL TREATIES.

SIR E. HILL (Bristol, S.) : I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether he will cause to be printed in the Treaty Series of Foreign Office Papers the Treaties of Commerce and Navigation now in force between Great Britain and the principal European and American countries ; and whether he will lay upon the Table of the House the Commercial Agreement or Treaty recently concluded with Spain, which it is understood has been presented to the Spanish Cortes ?

THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR FOREIGN AFFAIRS (Sir E. GREY, Northumberland, Berwick): The old Treaties of Commerce and Navigation have already been laid before Parliament; they can be obtained separately as Parliamentary Papers, and they are all published and indexed in Hertslet's Treaties. Under these circumstances, the heavy expense of reprinting the Treaties could not be justified. Any new Treaties which may be concluded will be presented in due course in the Treaty Series. The Provisional Agreement with Spain, which has, however, not yet been ratified by the Cortes, will be laid.

THE FOREST OF DEAN MINERS.

SIR C. W. DILKE (Gloucester, Forest of Dean): I beg to ask the President of the Board of Trade whether the statement in the organ of the Labour Department of the Board of Trade—"In the Forest of Dean the miners have been on strike since July 8th," is an accurate statement of the facts connected with a local lock-out unaccompanied by the offer of arbitration?

THE PRESIDENT OF THE BOARD OF TRADE (Mr. MUNDELLA, Sheffield, Brightside): The difference between a lock-out and a strike against a reduction of wages is one of some nicety. In the Forest of Dean the coalowners (so far as the Department is informed) gave a fortnight's notice without at the time making any proposal for a definite reduction, but before the notices took effect a reduction of 25 per cent. in wages was asked for, and, after a ballot among the miners, refused. Under these circumstances, the description of the dispute given in the passage referred to is correct according to the definition of strike and lock-out contained in Board of Trade Report on strikes and lock-outs, 1888. Owing to the ambiguity of the terms "strike" and "lock-out" the Department is gradually discarding both terms and substituting the term "trade dispute."

SIR C. W. DILKE: Would it not be better to class the Forest of Dean miners in the same way as they are classed by the Home Office in other English Districts?

MR. MUNDELLA: I think that is a reasonable suggestion to which effect might be given.

BOVINE TUBERCULOSIS.

MR. FIELD (Dublin, St. Patrick's): I beg to ask the President of the Local Government Board whether any progress is being made with respect to the publication of the Bovine Tuberculosis Report, and when its issue may be expected; and whether the Government are considering the adoption of means to compensate owners whose property is confiscated in the interests of the public?

THE PRESIDENT OF THE LOCAL GOVERNMENT BOARD (Mr. H. H. FOWLER, Wolverhampton, E.): I am informed by the Royal Commission on Tuberculosis that two of the special inquiries which they have been undertaking are completed, and that the third will be finished by the end of next month. Immediately after that the Commission will meet to draft the final Report. As to the second point, I can only state that the consideration of the question as to the adoption of means of granting compensation must be deferred until the Commission have made their Report.

THE LIQUOR TRAFFIC (LOCAL CONTROL) BILL.

MR. W. LONG (Liverpool, West Derby): I beg to ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether it is correct that he anticipates taking the Second Reading of the Liquor Traffic (Local Control) Bill before the rising of the House; and, if so, if he can state when the Bill will come on?

THE SECRETARY TO THE TREASURY (Sir J. T. HIBBERT, Oldham): The Chancellor of the Exchequer is not able at present to name a day for the Second Reading of the Liquor Traffic (Local Control) Bill. He hopes that time will be found for it before the close of the Session.

TITHE SEIZURES IN WALES.

MR. GRIFFITH-BOSCAWEN (Kent, Tunbridge): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether he is aware that at the meeting of the Cardiganshire Joint Standing Committee, held on August 10, at Aberayron, his letter to the Chief Constable, pointing out that the County Court Bailiff was insufficiently protected on May 5, was not mentioned by the Chief Constable in his Report, and only produced on the demand of the Chairman of Quarter Sessions; that the Chairman of Quarter Sessions proposed the two motions to the effect that the Chief Constable be ordered in all cases where the police were engaged in protecting the Sheriff's officer when carrying out the orders of any Court to employ such number of constables as may be necessary to ensure the proper protection of the Sheriff's officers, and the due execution of such orders; and that any existing orders or instructions of the Committee to the Chief Constable in any way repugnant to this order be rescinded, but they were lost by the votes of the representatives of the County Council, every Justice voting for them; whether he is aware that two of these County Councillors are also members of the Anti-tithe Committee; and whether he now intends to take any steps to get the intention of his letter carried out, and the law enforced; and, if so, if he will state what steps?

THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE HOME DEPARTMENT (Mr. ASQUITH, Fife, E.): I regret to have to inform the hon. Member that though I am in communication with the Chairman of Quarter Sessions on the subject of his question, I am not yet in possession of sufficient information to enable me to give him an answer. Perhaps the hon. Member will postpone his question.

VACCINATION PROSECUTIONS IN ESSEX.

MAJOR RASCH (Essex, S.E.): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether his attention has been called to the vaccination prosecutions and distrainments now being carried out at Grays, Essex; whether, in the case of second prosecutions, he will remit the fine and costs; and whether the case of Wheeler, a labourer employed on the works of Brooks, Shoobridge, and Co., who has been twice prosecuted, on whose goods one distrainment has already been made, and who is threatened with a second, has been brought to his knowledge?

MR. ASQUITH: Yes. I find that 65 warrants of distress were issued in June and July. In 46 cases the penalties were paid; in six the goods were sold; in nine there were no effects; and four are still unexecuted. I am not aware whether any of these were cases of a second prosecution for the same child. In Wheeler's case there were two prosecutions, but for two different children. If I were to remit the fines I should be, in effect, repealing the Act of Parliament. As I have frequently stated, I deprecate second prosecutions for the same offence, and if the Bill which I have introduced were passed into law they would become impossible.

DR. MACGREGOR (Inverness-shire): May I ask whether, if repeated breaches of the Vaccination Law justify a remission of the penalties, the same rule will apply to breaches of the Land Laws; and if not, why not?

MR. ASQUITH: That is a matter of opinion and not of fact.

DR. MACGREGOR: I respectfully submit, Mr. Speaker, that that is a fair question to address to the Home Secretary.

*MR. SPEAKER: The right hon. Gentleman has already answered it. He has replied that it is a matter of opinion. I think myself that it is an argumentative opinion.

ST. DAVID'S COLLEGE SCHOOL, LAMPETER.

MR. TALBOT: I beg to ask the Vice President of the Committee of Council on Education whether he has considered the strong expressions of opinion from the Lampeter and Pont Stephen United District Boards, and other Public Bodies, representing the district in question, against the decision to deprive the boys attending St. David's College School, Lampeter, of the benefit of the Intermediate County Scholarship Fund; and whether he will reconsider a decision which appears to have caused so much dissatisfaction?

MR. ACLAND: Resolutions to the effect stated in the question were recently passed by the Lampeter Pont Stephen School Board, the Lampeter Town Council, and the Board of Guardians of the Lampeter Union; but the Scheme had been approved nearly three months previously. I gave an answer on the question generally on the 14th August. But I think the dates which I have stated will show that it is out of my power to reconsider the Scheme in question.

Mr. Griffith-Boscawen

MR. TALBOT : Would not the Vice President meet the wishes of such a large body of public opinion by introducing some modification of the Scheme?

MR. ACLAND : It is not in my power to alter the Scheme. I have to hear the objections within a given period, which has now expired.

MR. TOMLINSON (Preston) : Could not a supplementary Scheme be adopted?

MR. ACLAND : It is always possible to grant an amending Scheme, but it must go through the same process as an original Scheme.

THE POLICE AND EVICTED FARMS.

MR. THOMAS HEALY (Wexford, N.) : I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland if he will explain by what authority Sergeant Sherwood, the sergeant in charge of the Castlebridge Police Barracks, in the County of Wexford, has recently been assisting in mowing hay on a farm in the locality from which a Mrs. Delaney has been evicted; whether it is part of a constable's duty to assist emergency men in haymaking; whether a complaint was made to the District Inspector on this subject; whether any investigation by the Police Authorities was held; and, if so, with what result; and whether instructions will be given which will have the effect of restricting the police to their proper duties?

MR. J. MORLEY : I understand that in consequence of the scarcity of hay in the neighbourhood the sergeant bought and cut some grass on the evicted farm referred to for the use of an ass of which he is the owner. The matter has been inquired into by the Constabulary Authorities.

THE FUGE EVICTIONS IN COUNTY CORK.

MR. FLYNN (Cork, N.) : I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether his attention has been called to the proceedings in connection with the recent evictions on the Fuge estate, near Ballyclough, County Cork; is he aware that the tenants offered to pay the landlord's representative all arrears of rent due up to date upon the spot, and had frequently offered the rent to the landlord; why, under these circumstances, was such a large force of police present on this occasion; and whether he is aware that the Sheriff's representative broke the windows, and when about to effect an entrance was put aside by District Inspector Bell, who was the first man to enter the premises; and, if so, whether he can state if it is the duty of a police officer to discharge the duty ordinarily performed by the Sheriff or the Sheriff's representative?

MR. J. MORLEY : I have received a detailed Report of the proceedings connected with these evictions. It is the fact, as stated, that the landlord's representative was offered all arrears due by the two tenants evicted, and that payment of the rent had been previously offered, provided the landlord would consent to make the occupiers agricultural tenants instead of dairy farmers. The evictions, however, were not for non-payment of rent, but were on the title in pursuance of writs of possession issued from one of the Superior Courts. A force of 25 police, under the command of District Inspector Bell, was present to protect the Sheriff's bailiff and to preserve the peace. The doors and windows of both houses were barricaded, and in one house was a number of persons who expressed a determination to resist eviction, and who repeatedly refused admission to the bailiff. A window was broken in by the bailiff, and the District Inspector, a man of much tact and intelligence, then entered by the broken window in order to endeavour by his presence to check violence and preserve the Sheriff's representative from apprehended injury. In entering the house before the bailiff Mr. Bell in no way discharged any duty belonging only to the Sheriff or his officers; it was his duty as peace officer to do all in his power to prevent a breach of the peace, and, observing persons inside the house, with the doors barricaded, and fearing serious consequences might ensue should the bailiff enter first, he himself went in for the purpose of warning the inmates of the trouble they would bring on themselves should any violence be used towards the bailiff. Happily no act of violence was attempted, and a breach of the peace was avoided.

MR. FLYNN : Has the right hon. Gentleman been made aware that the only act of resistance was that the doors were not opened to the Sheriff, and that there is no precedent for the action taken by the Inspector named?

MR. J. MORLEY: I think the hon. Gentleman is mistaken as to there being no precedent, as a case was decided by the Lord Chief Baron at Sligo Assizes in 1887, in which it was ruled that Constabulary officers are responsible for the preservation of peace; and it was entirely with a view to prevent any act of violence that Inspector Bell acted as he did.

MR. FLYNN: Can the right hon. Gentleman inform me whether any violence was anticipated, because my information is to the contrary?

MR. J. MORLEY: I have read the reports of this case very carefully, and I am quite satisfied that the officer did not in any way exceed his duty.

GOVERNMENT CONTRACTS AND TRADES UNION LABOUR.

MR. DALZIEL (Kirkcaldy, &c.): I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury whether the conditions respecting the employment of Trades Union labour, proposed to be introduced into future printing contracts with Messrs. McCorquodale and Company and Messrs. Waterlow and Sons, will also be made to apply to all bookbinding contracts that may be entered into with these or any other firms?

SIR J. T. HIBBERT: The same conditions providing that no preference shall be given by Government contractors as between Union and non-Union men will be inserted in all future contracts for bookbinding as well as for printing.

MR. W. FIELD: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether he is aware that certain Government printing contracts have been given in Ireland to contractors who violate the Fair Wages Resolution; whether he is aware that Government printing contracts have been given by the Commissioners of National Education in Ireland to a contractor who disregards the said Resolution; and whether he will take steps to have the wishes of this House carried into practice in those and all other Governmental contracts?

MR. J. MORLEY: In forms of tender for Government printing in Ireland special attention is drawn to the Resolution of the House of Commons dated February 13, 1891, to the spirit and intention of which all who may be intrusted with contracts for the Stationery Office are expected to conform. The Commissioners of National Education report that their printing contracts have been given to the Queen's printers in Ireland, who assert that they comply with the provisions of this Resolution. The Government are not aware that the provisions of the Resolution are infringed by any other Department.

POYNTZPASS POSTAL SERVICE.

MR. E. M'HUGH (Armagh, S.): I beg to ask the Postmaster General if he will explain how it is there is only one delivery of letters in the day in Poyntzpass whilst there are three deliveries in the adjoining towns of Tanderagee and Scarva; whether he is aware that English letters for Poyntzpass arriving in Newry at 8 a.m. are detained there for 2½ hours before being despatched the following morning at 5.30 a.m., whilst they could be despatched by the mail train which passes Poyntzpass at 11.45 a.m. every day; and if he will see to this grievance being remedied by having arrangements made that in future the mail train will put off the mails as it passes the town?

THE POSTMASTER GENERAL (Mr. A. MORLEY, Nottingham, E.): The facts are as stated by the hon. Member; but unfortunately the revenue will not admit of more than one post in the day to Poyntzpass. Even now the cost of the service exceeds the available revenue, and I regret that further outlay is not warranted for accelerating the delivery of English letters numbering less than 25 a day, or for the arrangements which would be necessary for exchanging mails by apparatus at the station named.

IRISH NATIONAL EDUCATION.

MR. W. JOHNSTON (Belfast, S.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland will he explain on what grounds the Commissioners of National Education in Ireland have omitted from the Fifth Book of Lessons the history of the British Constitution, by the late Archbishop Whately, and also 18 articles, by the same author, on political economy, and why five out of the eight lessons on Scripture History have been omitted, and writings substituted which are objected to by Protestants, and in the Third Reading Book for children from 9 to 12 years of age the last verse of Moore's Canadian Boat Song, teaching the Invocation of the Saints, has been inserted; and if this change is made with the sanction of the Government?

MR. J. MORLEY: Before answering this question there are one or two points on which I desire to satisfy myself, and I must therefore ask the hon. Member to postpone it until Thursday.

THE QUEENSTOWN MAIL ROUTE.

CAPTAIN DONELAN (Cork, E.): I beg to ask the Postmaster General whether his attention has been drawn to the fact that by promptly availing of the special mail service American letters landed at Queenstown, ex Umbria, at 7-30 p.m. on Friday last, were delivered in London at 9 a.m. on Saturday, thus enabling replies to be despatched by the outgoing Cunard liner on Sunday; whether he is aware that under the old system these letters would not have reached London until after business-hours on Saturday evening, and could not therefore have been answered until the following Thursday; and whether, in view of the great benefit which this special service confers upon the mercantile community of Great Britain and Ireland, it will be continued?

MR. MAURICE HEALY (Cork): I beg, at the same time, to ask the right hon. Gentleman whether, pending a decision on the question of the special mail service for American mails between Queenstown and London, now under his consideration, he will direct that the service shall meanwhile go on as heretofore?

MR. A. MORLEY: I am aware of the circumstances referred to in the first two paragraphs of the question, and in the course of a few days I hope to be able to make a communication on the subject alluded to, as I promised to the deputation which I received at the House of Commons on the 11th instant.

BOYLE POSTMAN'S GRIEVANCE.

MR. BODKIN: I beg to ask the Postmaster General can he state why Mr. Joseph Kennedy, night postman in Boyle, has been suspended from the discharge of his duties; is he aware that Mr. Joseph Kennedy is universally regarded in the town as the most efficient official connected with the Boyle Post Office, and that there is a general belief that he was suspended by the Local Authorities merely because, being a Catholic, he protested against certain proselytism that was being carried on in the office; and will he promptly inquire into the matter, and have this man immediately reinstated in his position if there be no charge against him, or otherwise have a full and public investigation of the entire circumstances of the case?

MR. A. MORLEY: The question only appeared on the Paper this morning, and it has been impossible to obtain information. I have called for a Report on the case, but I should be glad if the hon. Member, and other hon. Members who desire information on purely local matters of Post Office administration, would give longer notice of their questions.

GOVERNMENT CONTRACTS IN IRELAND.

MR. MICHAEL AUSTIN (Limerick, W.): I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury if he has had inquiries made into the allegations concerning the system under which Government printing and bookbinding contracts are being executed in Ireland; when are such contracts terminable with the present contractors; and will steps be taken to have all printing and bookbinding work executed by firms who comply with the Fair Wages Resolution adopted by this House?

SIR J. T. HIBBERT: In reply to inquiries by the Stationery Office, Messrs. Thom denied that they had acted in any way in contravention of the Resolution of the House of Commons of February 13, 1891. Three of their contracts, those for book-work printing, job-work printing, and lithography, are terminable on six months' notice at any time; the remaining two are terminable as follows:—Vellum binding, September 30, 1897; and leather binding, September 30, 1894. As I have frequently stated, steps have already been taken to carry out the Resolution of the House.

MR. MICHAEL AUSTIN: Is the right hon. Gentleman aware that the Queen's Printers only employ junior labour as regards the binding?

SIR J. T. HIBBERT : If the hon. Member wishes further particulars I must ask him to give notice.

THE AUSTRALIAN MAIL SERVICE.

MR. HENNIKER HEATON (Canterbury) : I beg to ask the Postmaster General whether the time has arrived for calling for tenders for the conveyance of mails between Australia and England ; on what date do the present contracts expire ; and whether the conditions suggested by the Brisbane Conference regarding the new contracts have been approved by him ?

MR. A. MORLEY : The present contracts expire on 31st January, 1895. The conditions suggested by the Brisbane Conference have not been approved by me. They involve questions of importance, which I have not yet had time to consider maturely in order to reply to an inquiry from Australia as to their adoption. This must be done before tenders are invited.

THE GOVERNORSHIP OF SOUTH AUSTRALIA.

MR. HENNIKER HEATON : I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies whether he has received a communication from the Chief Secretary of South Australia on the subject of the retirement of the Governor, Earl Kintore ; whether it is suggested that His Honour Chief Justice Way shall fulfil the duties ; and what reply has been forwarded to the letter ?

THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE COLONIES (Mr. S. BRXTON, Tower Hamlets, Poplar) : No, Sir.

THE SOUTH WALES COAL DISPUTE.

MR. KEIR HARDIE (West Ham, S.) : I beg to ask the Secretary of State for War whether his attention has been called to the statement that the officers in charge of the troops in South Wales have met in consultation with the Emergency Committee of the mine-owners as to the most effective method of disposing of their forces ; and whether the officers in command of the soldiers in South Wales are authorised to consult with the Emergency Committee of the mine-owners, and not with the Magistrates ?

THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR WAR (Mr. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN, Stirling, &c.) : I have no information on this subject, but have called for a Report, which I have not yet received. I may say, however, that it would be altogether unusual for the military officers to act upon instructions from any but the constituted Civil Authority.

MR. KEIR HARDIE : Will the right hon. Gentleman also inquire into the report in the newspapers to the effect that General Sir Richard Harrison is making a round of inspection of troops and is accompanied by Mr. James Williams, of Newport, as representing the Coalowners' Association, and ascertain why a civilian is allowed to accompany the staff on a visit of inspection ?

MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN : I have no doubt that that will be covered by the Report ?

MR. BURNIE (Swansea Town) : May I ask whether, as according to all accounts there has been no necessity for the military to be sent to Wales, the right hon. Gentleman will take the earliest opportunity of getting them removed ?

MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN : No, Sir ; the War Office act upon the requisition of the Civil Authorities, and until that requisition is withdrawn the military will remain.

SIR C. W. DILKE : Did the Local Authorities ask for any particular number of troops to be sent ?

MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN : I do not know who determined the number of troops to be sent. I think the Civil Authorities determine the districts in which the troops are required. The General commanding the district is there at this moment for the purpose of making the necessary arrangements for the housing and feeding of the troops.

MR. KEIR HARDIE : Does Sir R. Harrison propose to provide additional troops, as he has promised the coalowners in response to a resolution of thanks from them ?

MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN : I am not aware that he made any such promise ; I think it is very unlikely ; but I would rather wait until I have the Report.

MR. KEIR HARDIE : I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he could state what Benches of Magistrates in South Wales have applied for military assistance in the preservation of the public peace; what is the total number of Magistrates who compose such Benches; how many of these are directly and pecuniarily interested in mines; and how many are working men?

MR. ASQUITH: I have not the information to enable me to answer this question, very few of the applications having passed through the Home Office, the others were addressed directly to the Military Authorities. If the hon. Member desires it I will obtain this information through the War Office, and place it at his disposal. I have no information which would enable me to answer the inquiries in Paragraphs 2, 3, and 4 of the question. It is improbable that there are any working men in the Commission of the Peace for the counties referred to, as the existing property qualification practically disables the Lord Chancellor from appointing working men to the County Bench. But I must point out that the existing dispute in Wales is largely a question not only between employers and employed, but between two bodies of working men who take different views of their own interests.

MR. KEIR HARDIE: Has any application been received from either of those bodies for protection?

MR. ASQUITH: No, Sir. Applications for protection are not entertained unless they come from the Local Authorities.

MR. PRITCHARD-MORGAN (Merthyr Tydfil): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether, having regard to the fact that Her Majesty's Government considered it necessary at the request of the coalowners and Magistrates, most of the Magistrates being coalowners, to send troops to Wales to protect such of the workmen as desired to resume work, Her Majesty's Government will favourably consider the advisability of appointing a Minister for Mines, or a Minister for Labour, under whose direction Arbitrators or Boards of Conciliation may be created to settle mining and other labour disputes, with a view of averting the necessity in future of sending troops into districts where labour disputes exist?

MR. ASQUITH: It is not the fact that Her Majesty's Government have sent troops at the request of coalowners who are not Magistrates. How many of the Magistrates are coalowners I am unable to say. I should be very glad to see the present barbarous method of fighting out trade disputes superseded, and the necessity for taking exceptional measures for the preservation of order obviated, by the establishment of a well-considered system of arbitration. Her Majesty's Government have introduced a Bill for that purpose, but have not been fortunate enough as yet to secure for it the consideration of the House.

MR. PRITCHARD-MORGAN: Do Her Majesty's Government intend in the near future to bring before the House the question of creating a portfolio for mines, or, as in the Colonies, for labour generally?

MR. ASQUITH: No, Sir; I cannot hold out any hopes of that.

SIR J. GORST: May I inquire whether the Bill of the Government will have the effect stated in the question, and when will the Government bring it before the House for consideration?

MR. ASQUITH: The right hon. Gentleman is perfectly well acquainted with the contents of the Bill, because he has taken a peculiar and personal interest in its fortunes.

SIR J. GORST: Will the Government bring this most important Bill under the consideration of the House at a time and under circumstances in which it can be discussed?

MR. ASQUITH: As the right hon. Gentleman knows, I cannot make any statement upon the order of business, but so far as my recollection goes the Bill has been several times before the House, when if there had been general goodwill and any serious disposition to entertain the Bill it might have been passed.

MR. BARTLEY (Islington, N.): Is it not a fact that the Bill was brought before the House at a time when no Amendment could possibly be moved or divided upon?

MR. ASQUITH: The Government has not yet been able to secure a Second Reading for the Bill.

MR. BYLES (York, W.R., Shipley) was understood to ask if the troops were sent solely at the request of panic-stricken Local Authorities when there was really no necessity for them?

[The question was not answered.]

BOARDS OF GUARDIANS AND THE UNEMPLOYED.

MR. KEIR HARDIE: I beg to ask the President of the Local Government Board whether he can now state the extent of the powers possessed by Boards of Guardians for acquiring land and opening workshops to enable them to set able-bodied destitute persons to work at reasonable wages; whether employment so given necessarily pauperises and disfranchises the recipients; and whether he will cause to be issued a Circular to Boards of Guardians setting forth these powers, and how far the Local Government Board is prepared to co-operate with the Guardians in putting them into operation?

MR. H. H. FOWLER: I will send the hon. Member notice when I am prepared to answer this question.

LABOUR IN GOVERNMENT ESTABLISHMENTS.

MR. KEIR HARDIE: I beg to ask the President of the Board of Trade how many labourers in the Government arsenals, dockyards, and victualling stores are receiving less than 24s. per week?

MR. MUNDELLA: I am unable to give the information asked for by the hon. Gentleman. I must refer him to the War Office and Admiralty.

MR. KEIR HARDIE: But have not the Board of Trade had a special Report prepared on this question?

MR. MUNDELLA: A special Report was made for the information of a Committee of the Cabinet on the wages question. The Labour Department, however, has to obtain its information from the other Departments concerned, and the hon. Member must apply to the Department to which his question applies.

MR. DARLING: Is this the Report as to which I put a question last week? If so, is there any objection to extracting from it the information asked for?

MR. MUNDELLA: Certainly there is, for it is a confidential document.

MR. KEIR HARDIE: Will the right hon. Gentleman agree to grant a Return if I move for one?

Mr. Byles

MR. MUNDELLA: The hon. Member must apply to the Departments concerned. It is outside the province of the Board of Trade.

AGRICULTURAL LABOUR IN SCOTLAND.

MR. BUCHANAN (Aberdeenshire, E.): I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury whether the Reports of the Sub-Commissioners, appointed by the Labour Commission to investigate the condition of the agricultural labourers in Scotland, will shortly be presented to the House?

SIR J. T. HIBBERT: I am informed that these Reports will be published in two parts, and that it is hoped that Part I. may be issued in a month's time and Part II. by October. Every effort is being made to expedite the issue.

GLASGOW TELEPHONE LICENCE.

MR. CAMERON CORBETT (Glasgow, Tradeston): I beg to ask the Postmaster General if he has considered the application of the Corporation of Glasgow for a telephone licence, and what decision he has come to regarding it?

MR. A. MORLEY: The application was received on the 14th and answered on the 16th instant. I shall be glad to furnish the hon. Member with a copy of the reply.

MR. CAMERON CORBETT: Did the reply say more than that the matter would be considered?

MR. A. MORLEY: Yes, Sir; it dealt with a number of matters.

SPECIAL MAIL TRAIN SERVICE TO KINGSTOWN.

MR. MAURICE HEALY: I beg to ask the Postmaster General whether all special mail trains for American mails from Queenstown to Kingstown to catch the ordinary mail boats are detained at Kingsbridge until the ordinary mail train is leaving or only some such trains; and, if only some, in what cases the special train goes on to Kingstown, and in what cases the mails are detained at Kingsbridge?

MR. A. MORLEY: American mails conveyed by special trains arriving from Queenstown during the night are invariably sent on by special train from Kingsbridge, because there is no ordinary train by means of which they could catch the day mail boat from Kingstown; but those reaching Dublin during the afternoon, in time to admit of their being conveyed from Kingsbridge by the regular mail train, remain at Kingsbridge to be carried on by that train.

REGISTRATION OF DEBENTURE BONDS.

MR. BARROW (Southwark, Bermondsey): I beg to ask the Attorney General whether his attention has been called to the failure of H. R. Marks, as reported in The Standard newspaper of Thursday, the 10th instant, in which the Official Receiver (Mr. Hough) appears to have said that about five or six weeks before the receiving order was made certain debentures, amounting to £15,000, had been issued by W. Wilfred Head and Marks, Limited, under which the assets of the business were charged in favour of the debenture holders; how were these debentures disposed of, and for what consideration; whether the trade creditors, presuming that they had knowledge of the debtors' intention to charge their security, had any lawful means of protecting themselves; and whether, with a view to increasing the safety of the position of creditors of Limited Liability Companies, he will consider the advisability of introducing a Bill to provide that debenture bonds shall be registered in the same way as bills of sale?

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir C. RUSSELL, Hackney, E.): In reply to my hon. Friend, I know nothing of the facts except as appears on the Paper. I cannot, therefore, express any opinion on the second and third branches of the question; but, as to the concluding inquiry, I think there is a great deal to be said in favour of requiring debentures to be registered, and I shall consult the Lord Chancellor on the point.

IRISH PRESBYTERIANS AND HOME RULE.

MR. DANE (Fermanagh, S.): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury has he any objection to publishing the Address recently received by him from a number of Irish Presbyterians; and, if not, will he do so?

THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY (MR. W. E. GLADSTONE, Edinburgh, Midlothian): I have no objection.

THE INDIAN CURRENCY QUESTION.

MR. EVERETT (Suffolk, Woodbridge): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether it is true that an addition is to be made to the pay of the Civil and other servants in India in consideration of the fall which has taken place in exchange; and whether this additional pay will be taken out of the Revenues of India? I desire most respectfully to complain of the great alteration made in the latter part of the question, and claim my right, as a Member of Parliament, to put a question in my own words. The second part of the question ran thus:—

"And whether this additional pay will be taken out of the pockets of the people of India at the same time when their own free supply of rupees"—

*MR. SPEAKER: Order, order! That is a controversial question.

MR. W. E. GLADSTONE: The origin of the proceeding in this matter has taken place in India, and the Secretary of State in Council has simply agreed to the proposals of the Government of India. By these proposals European officers will receive an exchange compensation allowance, and that allowance will enable them to forward half of their salaries to Europe at the rate of 1s. 6d. for the rupee.

MR. EVERETT again proceeded to press his question, and suggested there was nothing controversial in the part struck out.

MR. SPEAKER: Order, order! It is impossible to have an essay under the guise of a question.

THE NATIONALISATION OF MINES.

MR. WOODS (Lancashire, Ince): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury if he is aware that the coalowners in the Midland Counties have locked up their mines against their workmen, and thereby thrown out of employment over 300,000 miners, and indirectly over 500,000 other workers; whether he is aware that the proposals of the coalowners in the action they have taken has caused a revulsion of feeling in the public mind against them; and whether, with a view of preventing these periodical conflicts between capital and labour, Her Majesty's Government will be prepared to initiate, or if introduced next Session support, legislation having for its object the nationalisation of Mines and Royalties rents?

MR. W. E. GLADSTONE: The question of mining royalties and mines is a very large one indeed, upon which undoubtedly I should not feel myself justified in giving any opinion on my own behalf or on behalf of my Colleagues without a much fuller study than I have had an opportunity of giving it. The hon. Member will see how vast a question it would be to take the property in fee simple in mines and royalties into the possession of the State evidently with a view to the consequent intervention of the Government through the medium of the Executive. I am afraid I can only say I am quite certain that when the question is brought forward it will be most carefully and comprehensively examined. My hon. Friend is no doubt aware that it has been recently considered by a Commission. Then, with regard to the occurrences in Wales, I fear that I have no information that would justify me in speaking upon them or professing to supply hon. Members with information other than such as they may gather from sources open to all, nor would it be wise on my part to do so in view of the state of public sentiment in the districts where the difficulty between employers and employed has occurred.

THE GUILLOTINE RESOLUTION.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR (Manchester, E.): After the Resolution which was passed yesterday, I understand that on Friday, when the Amendment under discussion is concluded at 11 o'clock, we shall only divide on the Government Amendments. I suggest that it would be for the convenience of the House if the Government Amendments could be printed separately without the Amendments on which we cannot divide.

MR. J. MORLEY: I will see if that cannot be done.

Mr. Woods

ORDERS OF THE DAY.

GOVERNMENT OF IRELAND BILL.

(No. 428.)

CONSIDERATION. [ELEVENTH NIGHT.]

Order read, for resuming Adjourned Debate on Amendment, as amended, proposed [18th August] on Consideration of the Bill as amended;

And which Amendment, as amended, was, in page 3, line 7, after Sub-section (4), to insert, as a new sub-section, the words—

“(5) Directly or indirectly imposing any disability, or conferring any privilege, benefit, or advantage upon any subject of the Crown on account of his parentage or place of birth, or of the place where any part of his business is carried on, or upon any Corporation or Institution constituted or existing by virtue of the law of some part of the Queen's dominions and carrying on operations in Ireland, on account of the persons by whom or in whose favour or the place in which any of its operations are carried on; or.”—(Mr. J. Morley.)

Question again proposed, “That those words, as amended, be there inserted.”

Debate resumed.

SIR J. GORST (Cambridge University) said, he did not propose to detain the House at any length on this matter; but he was bound to say he did not fully understand the object of the Amendment, nor did he particularly care. But he scarcely thought it right to establish separate legislation of this kind for Ireland, nor ought they to create within the limits of the United Kingdom separate nationalities having separate rights. He would therefore move, as an Amendment, the insertion, after the word “birth,” of the words “or residence.”

Amendment proposed to the proposed Amendment, in line 3, after the word “birth,” to insert the words “or residence.”—(Sir J. Gorst.)

Question proposed, “That the words ‘or residence’ be there inserted in the proposed Amendment.”

*SIR C. RUSSELL said, the Government could not accept the clause, as it would make a substantial difference in the scope of the clause. To include “residence” would affect the powers of the Legislative Body as to franchise eligibility for office, and in other ways.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR : That statement throws a curious light on the clause. Without the Amendment proposed by my right hon. Friend the clause would enable the Irish Legislature to deal differentially with, say, absentee landlords. Do the Government desire that? I cannot believe that that is their intention. The Amendment of the Chief Secretary purports to aim at preventing any disability, benefit, or advantage being created in respect of any subject of the Crown as distinguished from other subjects. The Amendment to the Amendment will effect the purpose more completely; and, therefore, I cannot understand the Government's objection to it. It is clear that without it the Irish Government will be able to carry out a differential treatment which Parliament neither contemplates nor proposes. Will the Chief Secretary explain why they persist in refusing to accept this Amendment, seeing that such differential treatment as it is aimed at would be essentially unjust?

MR. J. MORLEY : The course of legislation the right hon. Gentleman opposite fears might be adopted by the Irish Legislature in the case of Irish absentee landlords has been already adopted by the Legislature of New Zealand. There is no intention to prevent the Irish Government to put a tax upon possessors of land who do not reside on the land. I think that the Government have fulfilled all their pledges in relation to this matter, and therefore I cannot accept the Amendment.

MR. GIBSON BOWLES (King's Lynn) said, he thought the right hon. Gentleman had forgotten that on this clause and another clause attention was called to the fact that, as it stood, the Bill would enable the Irish Government to impose the differential treatment of fishermen. In the case of fishermen, their "business" was carried on at sea. English, Scotch, Manx, and French fishermen all fished off the Irish coast; and their place of "business" would, therefore, he supposed, be the same as that of the Irish fishermen, but their places of residence would be at Lowestoft, Wick, or elsewhere. He understood that it was the intention of the Government to protect British fishermen in carrying on their industry. [Mr. J. MORLEY assented.] As the clause stood it would not protect them; and he, therefore, hoped the Government would assent to the Amendment.

MR. ARNOLD-FORSTER (Belfast, W.) said, the Chief Secretary for Ireland had given a hint which was equivalent to an invitation to the Irish Legislature to put a tax upon landlords who were compelled to live out of Ireland. The Irish people had been told scores and hundreds of times that it was their duty and their interest to hunt the landlords against whom this threat was directed out of the country. An organisation had been put in force against the landlords which, in some instances, had proved effectual; and he thought it ought to be made quite clear that the House was face to face with a situation in which the practice of making life intolerable to a certain class of Her Majesty's subjects would be supplemented by a statutory penalty, inflicted, on the invitation of the Government, upon that class because, to use the words of the Nationalist Members—"Ireland had been made too hot to hold them." So great had been the power of hon. Members that they had induced the Chief Secretary for Ireland to introduce this vindictive provision into the Bill.

MR. SEXTON (Kerry, N.), referring to the speech of the hon. Member for King's Lynn (Mr. Gibson Bowles), remarked that the sea was not the only place where a fisherman's business was carried on. Although he caught his fish on the sea, he sold them on shore. If he sailed from and returned to Wick, that would be his place of business, and he would be protected under the subsection as it stood. The addition of the proposed words would make the subsection absurd. It would be strange indeed if the sub-section were made to read in such a way as to infer that residence in Ireland was a reason why any advantage should not be given to a man under an Irish Bill. The hon. Member for West Belfast (Mr. Arnold-Forster) had spoken as if absenteeism was something that was imposed on landlords by the people of Ireland. The hon. Member was new to politics, and not very old in years, or else he would be aware that long before the Land League came into existence Irish landlords had a habit of living out of Ireland, and that absenteeism had given a great impetus to the land movement. Absenteeism is one of the results of the Act of Union. He hoped that under this Bill the state of things would be reversed, and that landlords would be again content to live in Ireland. He asked the House whether it would be well to deprive the Irish Legislature of the power of providing that men who drew their incomes from the toil of the people and spent them away from Ireland should not be called upon to contribute some special aid to the Revenue of the country they deserted? The Imperial Parliament before the Union had more than once imposed taxes on absentee Irish landlords for the purpose of obliging them to stay in Ireland and to protect British interests. He thought that what the Imperial Parliament had done in this respect the Irish Parliament might do. It was calculated that out of about £12,000,000 of Revenue £4,000,000 were taken out of Ireland. That was one of the secrets of the poverty of the country. There was no principle more clear than that the Legislature of a country had a perfect right, if public opinion approved, to levy a fine upon these men. Of course, the landlords paid Income Tax upon the £4,000,000 a year taken out of Ireland, and the assessment of that income, from which Ireland had no benefit whatever, formed part of the Imperial Revenue. If the fact that rents were taken out of the country to be spent elsewhere was regarded as a reason why Ireland ought to contribute at a specially high rate to Imperial Expenditure, it was also a reason why the Irish Legislature should have the power to impose a tax upon those who spent their income out of Ireland.

MR. BYLES (York, W.R., Shipley) said, he had been somewhat surprised to hear the hon. Member for West Belfast (Mr. Arnold-Forster) talking of Irish landlords as a hunted class. He himself had always regard the Irish tenants as a hunted class. He could take Members to places in Ireland where every human face wore a hunted look. [Cries of "Where?"] It was in County Kerry, on Lord Ormathwaite's estate. These people had been evicted from their homes and were afraid to let their children creep back to them for shelter, but lay in ditches night after night. The tenants of Ireland had been hunted from their homes for generations past. In his own town—an inland English town—there was a population of 25,000 Irish people. This meant that these people had been hunted out of Ireland. The last time he went to Ireland he visited the estate of a landlord in the West, through whose property one could drive 40 miles in a beeline. He visited some of the tenants this landlord was threatening to evict. They were in the very lowest depth of poverty, were living on the slightest food, and were imperfectly clothed and sheltered; and yet the only home on that vast estate in which the owner did not desire to live was the home of the landlord, the Marquess of Sligo himself—a great square mansion in a magnificent domain with every comfort and luxury, and with beautiful scenery and plenty of fishing and shooting surrounding it. No doubt, he (Mr. Byles) took strong views on this question, but he asked the House what was the title of the Marquess of Sligo, or of any man, to own a vast country or a vast territory in Ireland, or anywhere else, if the only thing he did in relation to the population living in it was to extract rent from them. The people of this country would some day rise up and say—“Why should this man own this land; and why should any man own any land unless he returns to it something of that which he gets from it.”

MR. MACARTNEY (Antrim, S.) said, he quite admitted that the hon. Member who had just sat down was entitled to express the most extreme views he held on any subject; but he was surprised that he had not expressed his horror at the holding of any land whatever. The hon. Member said he had seen in the West of Ireland people with terror-stricken faces. So had he (Mr. Macartney), but the terror was not of the landlord, but of the Land League.

MR. BYLES: It has been their only salvation.

MR. MACARTNEY said, he was very much afraid that the people he referred to did not look on the Land League as their only one salvation. The hon. Member for North Kerry (Mr. Sexton) desired to tax absentee landlords who had been driven out of Ireland. He (Mr. Macartney) should have thought the hon. Member would not have ventured to bring forward that argument, because it was in direct conflict with the opinion of another distinguished Member of the Nationalist Party, the hon. Member for North Louth (Mr. T. M. Healy), who had declared that when he saw great houses untenanted in Ireland he said to himself, "Glory be to God." Ireland was not the only country in the world where there were absentees. There were numberless landlords in England who were not always to be found upon their property. There were many citizens of the United States who were not to be found in the country where they had made their fortunes. He could not conceive on what ground of justice or morality the House could authorise the Irish Legislature to pass a law against absenteeism, which they would only be enabled to enforce because the absenteeism they derided was simply the result of the policy of those who permitted such a law. If there were districts in Ireland where landlords were no longer to be found living on their property it was because Nationalist Members had never hesitated to attack those landlords. They had generally chosen the best landlords for attack because, as they had often expressed it, a good landlord was the greatest obstacle to the success of their policy in Ireland. He was certain that the House of Commons would never consent to perpetrate such an outrage as was now proposed upon all principles of morality and justice.

MR. FLYNN (Cork, N.) said, it could not be denied by anyone who knew anything of Irish history that Ireland had been long regarded by many landlords as simply a place from which to draw money. One of the standing grievances of Ireland had been that the owners of large properties returned nothing to Ireland but the commissions they sent to their agents. If the Amendment were adopted the result would be to tie the hands of an Irish Legislature in such a way that it would be impossible for it to undertake any useful work in connection with the development of fisheries and other industries. For instance, it would interfere with the continuance and extension by the Irish Legislature of the work commenced on a very small scale at Baltimore in the shape of fishery schools, where nets were made, fishing was taught to boys, fish-curing was taught to the inhabitants, and where loans were granted for the making of boats. The Amendment was utterly unnecessary, and would possibly work very great mischief.

*VISCOUNT CRANBORNE (Rochester) contended that, unless the Amendment were agreed to, it would be possible to inflict disabilities on Scotch fishermen because they resided in Scotland, and on English fishermen because they resided in England. The reason why the Amendment was resisted by the Government was that they wished to allow the Irish Legislature to attack those landlords whom the Prime Minister declared it would be an obligation of honour to defend. He (Viscount Cranborne) quite agreed that an absentee landlord was not as good as a resident landlord; and yet if a distinction were to be drawn between the two classes of men the absentee landlord might be robbed of everything he possessed. Did the hon. Member for North Kerry (Mr. Sexton) wish it?

MR. SEXTON: Not at all. I think a tax would induce them to live in Ireland.

*VISCOUNT CRANBORNE said, he thought a tax of the kind would have the effect of destroying the whole class of resident gentry in Ireland, which in his opinion would be a great disaster. The investor might be attacked as well as the landlord. If the sub-section passed in its present form it would be possible for the Irish Legislature to make a distinction between investors on account of their place of residence, and all dividends paid in England or Scotland, or even in Ulster, might be heavily taxed. It was perfectly clear if the Government did not accept the Amendment they would have broken the spirit of their pledge. He knew that the landlords were unpopular on the other side of the House; but if hon. Members opposite had no sympathy with the landlords they ought to have some sympathy with the investors, because if the investors were oppressed it would be disastrous to Ireland by discouraging investments.

MR. MAC NEILL (Donegal, S.): Hear, hear!

*VISCOUNT CRANBORNE said, he did not think hon. Members from Ireland so wise as all that. If they were wise they would not have quarrelled with Eug-land; and just as they had done their best to rob every landlord and drive him out of Ireland, they would do their best to rob every English and Scotch investor unless prevented by the insertion of the Amendment in the Bill.

MR. MAC NEILL said, he would appeal from one noble Lord to another noble Lord. In 1773 Lord Chatham recommended that a tax should be imposed by the Irish Parliament upon absentee landlords; and he recommended it, moreover, as an English politician. Another great man also—Adam Smith—recommended, as an Englishman, and in the interests of the British Empire, that a tax should be placed on absentee landlords. In 1773 Lord Harcourt, who was then Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, sent over a recommendation to allow the Irish Parliament to tax absentee landlords 2s. in the £1 on their rental; and Lord Chatham, speaking of that recommendation when it was accepted, says—

“My opinion, after weighing again and again the whole matter, is that it is most advisable not to meddle in urging the Royal Prerogative to repeal the Bill for taxing absentees, should such a Bill be sent over. The operation of the Bill is extremely severe, no doubt, against absentees; but the principle of that severity seems founded on strong Irish policy, which is to compel more of the profits of improved estates in that Kingdom to be spent by the possessors there amongst their tenants, and on their own consumption, rather than in England and in foreign parts. England, it is evident, profits by draining Ireland of the vast incomes spent here from that country; but I could not, as a Peer of England, advise the King, on principles of indirect accidental English policy, to reject a tax upon absentees sent over here as the genuine desire of the Commons of Ireland acting in their proper and peculiar sphere, and exercising their inherent exclusive right of raising Supplies in the manner they judge best.”

The Irish Parliament was willing to act on Lord Chatham's opinion. Who obstructed them? The absentee English landlords, headed by the Marquess of Hartington. The tax was then rejected through English influence by the Irish Parliament. The Irish landlords themselves were in favour of an absentee tax, because the Irish Parliament at that time was practically a landlords' Parliament. In 1797 Mr. John Le Fouche, an eminent Dublin banker, proposed an absentee tax with the full consent of the Lord Lieutenant of the day, Lord Camden. Mr. Lecky stated that Lord Portland, who was Secretary of State in England, gave the Lord

Lieutenant peremptory orders that the tax must be rejected. Lord Camden, in describing the result, said that it was impossible to describe the ill-humour which pervaded all descriptions of persons, even in the Government Departments; and he referred to

“the great disgust with which most of the friends of the Government support its present intentions,”

(that was in opposition to the measure). As the amount of rental taken out of Ireland 100 years ago was £1,000,000, and was now £4,000,000, the necessity for an absentee tax was now four times greater than it was then. Mr. Lecky attributed all the miseries introduced by middlemen and agents to the want of a resident gentry in Ireland; and it would be the first duty of an Irish Parliament to encourage, and to the best of their ability to promote, measures to bring all classes of society into harmony and peace in Ireland.

COLONEL SAUNDERSON (Armagh, N.) said, he thought the House would agree that the prospects of the Irish landlord under a Home Rule Parliament would not be one absolutely to be desired. If he remained in Ireland he ran a fair chance of being shot; if he got out of range he was to be taxed. That might seem the language of exaggeration. But those were the doctrines of the Land League, and they had been informed by Nationalist Members that if the Irish people stuck to the doctrines of the Land League the result would be that they would get rid of landlords altogether. So the Irish landlord in the future had not a very rosy look-out. He wished to be allowed just to quote a speech by the Leader of the Home Rule Party. The hon. and learned Member for North Louth (Mr. T. M. Healy) said—

“Now, I would tell Lord Granard's tenantry, in dealing with unjust landlords, that I would feel no more compunction in seeking my own rights than I would in driving a rat out of a hayrick. I look on them exactly in the same light; but, of the two, the rat is the more respectable animal, because, at any rate, God made the rat, but the landlord is a human invention. A rat eats nothing he has not stolen. A landlord could, at any rate, do a day's work, and very soon I hope to see the courage of Maynooth squeeze him out as you squeeze out a lemon or orange, and when they throw away the skin I hope to see you give it a kick and send it to its proper place.”

That was how the hon. and learned Member for North Louth intended to encourage absentees to live in Ireland. He did not approve of absentees. They were a misfortune, but there were other absentees besides landlords. He should like to have a Return of the number of absentees who sat among the Nationalist Party. If a Return were asked for and accurately made, it would surprise them, as it would show the number of Irish patriots who were absentees to such an extent that they proved their love of their country by living out of it. The Attorney General for England said not long ago that the landlord class was a class for whom nobody had any sympathy. He had just as little sympathy for the Irishman who came over to England, made a large fortune in this country, and spent not one farthing of it in his own country. Such a man was the Attorney General himself. To bring absentees back to Ireland they must insure them the just protection of the law, and make Ireland a happy and peaceful country. But the idea of encouraging absentees by placing supreme authority in the hands of the leaders and guides of the Land League was the most astounding proposal he had ever heard. Only a fortnight since we were told that if the Irish people stuck to the tenets of the Land League they would sweep the landlords away altogether. Yet the Government now blamed the landlords for not going to a country where they were to be treated like rats. The hon. Member for South Donegal took an unhappy step in holding up the Duke of Devonshire as an absentee.

MR. MAC NEILL explained that he was speaking of the Duke of Devonshire of a century ago.

COLONEL SAUNDERSON said, that the present Duke, on recently visiting his Irish tenantry, had a most cordial reception from them. But it was proposed that he should be taxed by the future Parliament in Dublin. He could not understand how the Government could persuade themselves that it would be for the good of Ireland to give the future Home Rule Government, which they fondly hoped might come, a power which, to his mind, would be absolutely destructive of the existence of the landlord class in Ireland, without which it was impossible to establish in Ireland those social relations and social conditions which alone could tend to the prosperity of the people of Ireland.

MR. VICARY GIBBS (Herts, St. Albans) said, he desired to ask the Attorney General what the position of Insurance Companies would be if the clause of the Chief Secretary for Ireland was passed? Would they be protected from exceptional taxation by the Irish Parliament? As was well known, the Insurance Societies had large mortgages on the Irish land; and the Building Societies, which held the money of the poor, had also large sums invested in land in Ireland.

MR. J. MORLEY: That point will be raised by an Amendment further on.

MR. VICARY GIBBS said, he should like to know how a distinction was to be drawn between the legal owners of the land, such as Insurance Companies, and the ordinary owners, the landlords, if exceptional legislation was to be enforced by the Irish Parliament on holders of land non-resident in Ireland? If the mortgagees were to be protected, and the ordinary private owners not to be protected, he would like to know on what ground the Government thought it just to put exceptional legislation in force against single individuals who owned land, and unjust to enforce it against Corporations who owned land in the same manner?

MR. W. REDMOND (Clare, E.) said, the hon. and gallant Member for North Armagh had treated the House to a recital of old speeches by Members below the Gangway. He did not think there was much to be gained by quoting from old speeches; but if the hon. and gallant Gentleman wished the House to believe that the practice of making violent speeches was all on the side of the Nationalist Members, he was asking them to believe what was not true. Within the last year—within the last few months, he might say—quite as violent, quite as dangerous, and quite as disloyal speeches had been uttered by hon. Gentlemen belonging to the Party of which the hon. and gallant Member for North Armagh was the Leader. He had quoted from the speeches of one or two Members below the Gangway in which some violent expressions were used in reference to certain landlords. He (Mr. W. Redmond) asked the House to bear in mind that the worst of the strong language used by these Members against landlords was used at a time when the Irish people were absolutely threatened by the shadow of another famine in the country.

COLONEL SAUNDERSON: The date of the speech from which I quoted was 1887, and there was no threatened famine then.

MR. W. REDMOND said, if the hon. and gallant Member had done him the honour to listen to what he said, he would have found that he did not make particular reference to the speech which the hon. and gallant Member quoted, but to the language which was used 10 or 12 years ago, and now quoted so frequently by him and his friends. In the circumstances which prevailed at that time in Ireland, with famine threatening the people, with the knowledge of what the people had suffered before from such visitations, with an eviction campaign in full swing, people being driven from the country, and starvation staring them in the face, surely a large excuse could be made for the use of strong language, if, while all these things were occurring in Ireland, the Irish landlords were drawing princely incomes from the Irish tenants and spending them in England and elsewhere, utterly indifferent to the fact that their dependants, who had earned the money by the sweat of their brow, were face to face with terrible suffering. A good deal had been said about the terrorism of the Land League. It was his opinion that if there had been no absentee landlordism, with all its attendant evils in Ireland, there would not, in all probability, have been a Land League in Ireland at all. The Land League and all similar tenant combinations were the direct result of the neglect of Irish landlords to perform those duties and obligations which the landlords of all other countries recognised as belonging to their position. Twenty years ago the hon. and gallant Member for North Armagh and his friends had the whole representation of Ireland in their own hands; they could drive their people to the polls, and they drove them to the polls. There was no Ballot Act and no Land League to protect the voter.

COLONEL SAUNDERSON said, the Ballot Act came into operation in 1870.

Mr. W. Redmond

MR. W. REDMOND said, the Ballot Act did not come into operation till 1872. He was, therefore, right in speaking of 20 years ago. At that time there was no check whatever—no organisation or league to impose any check—upon the power of the landlords in Ireland. They had the absolute and unfettered control of the representation of the country, and the management of everything connected with it. And what better was the country then? Would anyone deny that the suffering of the Irish people, and the misery of the Irish people, was immensely greater at that time, when they were under the control of the landlord? The hon. and gallant Member for North Armagh was himself a landlord; but he was not an absentee landlord—he lived in his own country—and he knew perfectly the truth of the statement he now made; that if every landlord had lived on his estate in Ireland and become acquainted with his tenants, and shown some sympathy with the people, who were spending their lives from early morning to late at night reclaiming and cultivating the land, there would have been a good feeling between landlord and tenant, and the Land League would not have been necessary at all. The hon. Member for South Antrim denounced the tyranny of the Land League in Ireland. It was a strange fact that the very people who had taken the greatest advantage of the benefits obtained for the tenants by the Land League lived in the very constituencies represented by the hon. Member and his friends. Let them remember the legislation that was the direct results of the operations of the Land League. The successive Irish Land Acts were passed as the direct result of the agitation throughout Ireland, and they were never dreamt of until the Land League came into existence. If that legislation could be blotted out, and the landlord once more endowed with an unfettered control over the people, and an unlimited power of fixing rents; and if a proposition were made to that effect, what reception would that proposition meet with at the hands of the constituents of the hon. and gallant Member for North Armagh? Those men who denounced the Land League were the first to go into the Courts and take advantage of the benefits which were the direct result of the action of the League. They were asked to believe that the Irish landlords were a long-suffering class. What was the history of landlordism in Ireland? During the last 50 years the population of Ireland had been reduced by one-half. The half of the people either died in the fields or were driven to America and other parts, and this was the direct result of absentee landlordism. One of the most glaring cases was that of Lord Dillon in the County of Mayo. This was a man who exercised power over the lives and fortunes of a great many people whom he did not know living on an estate he had never seen. He had never been to it, and he had never bought so much as a box of matches in Ireland. Yet this man drew an income of £20,000 a year from these people, and spent it in England and other places out of Ireland. The Plan of Campaign was established on this estate, and its operation was necessarily followed by trouble and turmoil and disturbance. This was what absenteeism had done for this part of Ireland. Another great offender was Lord Clanricarde, who never visited his estate, who never went to Ireland at all, but who drew a magnificent income from Ireland, and never spent 1s. there, and never had any communication with his people except to extort out of them in rent more than they were able to pay. Yet these men, who drew the last penny they could out of the people of Ireland, and never spent 1s. among them, were to be treated in the same way as those Irish landlords who lived on their property, knew their tenants, and tried to do their duty, as most English landlords did. To deprive the Irish Parliament of the power of dealing with this matter would, in his opinion, be a grave mistake, for absenteeism had been the cause of most of the trouble in Ireland. It had been said that the tenants had been led away by agitators. The Irish people were very much like other people. They would not join any organisation or elect a Member of Parliament of a certain Party unless they saw good reason for doing so; and there never would have been a tenant Representative in this House or any tenant organisation in Ireland had not the people been forced into these measures by the absentee landlords. The defence which the hon. and gallant Member gave of absentee landlordism in Ireland was a very weak and milk-and-water defence indeed, because the hon. and gallant Member could not deny, could not pretend to deny, that absentee landlordism was one of the greatest curses from which the Irish people had ever suffered.

MR. CHAPLIN (Lincolnshire, Sleaford): If I understand the position correctly, it is that Her Majesty's Government object to accepting the Amendment moved by my right hon. Friend on the ground that it would be unduly limiting the powers of the Irish Parliament. It has been intimated, I believe, from the Irish Benches, that circumstances might arise which, in their opinion, would make it desirable and justifiable, or necessary, that taxation of some kind or other should be imposed upon absentee Irish landlords. From that view, and with that policy—which, I understand, is evidently contemplated in the future—Her Majesty's Government in no way dissent. I should be the last person in the world to stand up in this House for the purpose of defending absentee landlords, whether they be absentees from Ireland or from their estates in England or elsewhere. I am bound to say that if that is to be the principle on which we are going to act on this occasion, it opens up some very serious questions indeed, and questions which up to the present time have not received one single moment's consideration during the whole course of these Debates. The first question I must ask Her Majesty's Government is this—What do they mean by absentee landlords? If you are legislating upon these principles, you must have a definition of absenteeism, undoubtedly, in your Bill. We cannot generalise from one or two individuals, such as those which have just been quoted by the hon. Member who has just sat down. There are black sheep, undoubtedly, in every flock; and I have no doubt that in England, as well as in Ireland and all other countries in the world, it would be perfectly possible for you to find some landlords who deservedly may be stigmatised as absentees. But what is an absentee? How many months' residence do you require to prevent a landlord being an absentee? How long and how often is he to reside upon his own estate? I take the case of a Member of Parliament. In the present state of things in the House of Commons we are called upon to sit here, at all events during the present year, for something like nine months. Is the Irish landlord to be debarred from fulfilling his duties as a Member of Parliament; and because he does fulfil these duties and sits for nine months in the House of Commons is he, therefore, to be termed an absentee and be subjected to all the pains and penalties that the Irish Parliament in the future may inflict? These questions, which are decided so hastily, ought at least to receive the attention of the Government, and they should certainly do something to define in their Bill what is meant by an absentee. I should like to ask another question. Many of these landlords in Ireland are absentees. What are most of them? Most of them are great proprietors who own great estates, and who also have great duties to perform in this country as well; but nobody would deny that it is from that very class that the best landlords in the whole of Ireland are to be found, and these are the men who are to be selected for taxation or for fines at the discretion of the new Irish Parliament, and as to whom the present Government have not a single syllable to utter in their defence. The hon. Member alluded just now to Lord Hartington, and spoke of him as one of those conspicuous instances of absenteeism—

MR. MAC NEILL: I did nothing of the kind. I spoke of the Duke of Devonshire of a century ago, who was an absentee landlord, and who prevented, through his influence, the absentee tax.

MR. CHAPLIN: Of course, I accept anything that the hon. Member says; but I think I heard him mention the name of Lord Hartington, and it may be thought excusable under the circumstances. But I take the present Duke of Devonshire as a type and instance of the class of landlords of whom I am speaking. If you go through the whole of Ireland at the present moment you will not find one estate, North, South, East, or West, which has been more admirably managed than that of the present Duke of Devonshire, or a landlord who has dealt with greater liberality with the tenants of every class. I heard a rather humorous story told of a visit of the present Duke to Lismore which happened some time ago. He had a very great reception—perhaps a reception which at this moment is significant in that part of Ireland. But even the gathering on that occasion was not altogether free from agitators, and an agitator in the crowd cried out, “Three cheers for Home Rule,” whereupon he was surrounded by a large mob, who said, “Say it again,” and he said it again. Unless I am very much mistaken, he very shortly afterwards found himself in the river. I do not think a more unfortunate proposal than that of taxing every absentee could be made. I want to ask another question. If the Irish landlords are absent, who is responsible for it? What has been the character of our land legislation in Ireland during the last few years? What did you do in the Act of 1881? You took all control of his property from the landlord; you absolved him from his duties, and left him in the position of having nothing but a rent charge upon his estates. How is it possible, under these circumstances, that owners of property in any country in the world should continue to take in the future the same interest in their property as they have done in the past? I do not wish to defend absenteeism; but if justification was needed for the landlords in Ireland who are away from their properties at the present time I should point to the Land Act of 1881, and should say by that Act alone they had been absolutely absolved from any charge of absenteeism whatsoever. But, supposing this Bill is carried in its present shape, supposing this Amendment is refused, supposing the number of other Amendments which have been put forward time after time during these discussions are thrown aside by Her Majesty’s Government, do you think that this is the kind of legislation which will encourage landlords to be more resident in Ireland in the future than they have been in the past? Under whom will they hold their properties, and upon whom will their fortunes depend in the future? Upon that new Executive of which we have heard a good deal in the course of these Debates. Although, owing to the system of Closure, we have not yet had an opportunity of raising the whole question of the position of the landlords under the new Executive, as I had hoped and intended to have done, everybody knows of whom that Executive will be composed. Everybody can form for himself a fair anticipation of what their probable action will be in the future, and what else are we to judge from than from the old speeches of hon. Members? We have heard declarations made over and over again by them; and they, in all probability, will be Members of the Irish Executive. We have never heard one syllable of these speeches publicly withdrawn; and, although they have been challenged over and over again to do so, not one of them has ever repudiated the intention of taking any line in the future different from that which he has adopted in the past. I cannot conceive how it is possible for men in their senses to look otherwise than with the greatest suspicion and apprehension and alarm upon the fact that the landlords' fortunes will in the future be in the hands of men such as these of whom we have every reason to suppose the new Irish Executive will be composed. I wish also to ask another question. If you are going to apply this principle to Ireland are you going to do the same thing to England or are you not; if not, why not? The House, I hope, will think, and even the Government will admit, that I am justified in submitting this case and putting these questions to them. I am not speaking at the present moment—I hope I have never spoken—from any motive whatever of unduly delaying the business of the House; I am trying to the best of my ability to defend the interests of the class of that country which I think has been too often most cruelly treated in the last few years. Not so very long ago the Prime Minister found himself in great difficulties and in conflict with the Representatives of the Irish people, and he did not scruple then to appeal to the landlords to come forward to his assistance to enable him to govern Ireland not in accordance altogether with Irish ideas, but ideas which animated him and his colleagues at that time; he did not scruple in those difficulties to appeal to them on those occasions. Now, what regard at all has he shown to the interests of the Irish landlords. Their fortunes and their futures are to be entrusted to a small body of men whom he has described as men who are “preaching the doctrines of public plunder.” I know perfectly well that the right hon. Gentleman on a former occasion in this House repudiated that statement, except so far as it related to Mr. Parnell. I grant you that is true; he never identified any of the gentlemen who we may expect will be Members of the Irish Executive; but he did identify them as a small body of men “preaching the doctrines of public plunder” in the most emphatic way, because he imprisoned them at the same time as Mr. Parnell. Therefore, I think, the right hon. Gentleman will not be surprised with regard to men, whom he himself found it necessary to imprison for preaching the doctrines of public plunder, that I, speaking as a landlord myself, and as one endeavouring to defend the rights of my brother landlords in Ireland, should call the attention of the House of Commons to the difficulties in which they must inevitably be placed. I hope Her Majesty's Government will take this matter more deeply into their consideration; and that they will, at all events, take care that there are inserted in this Bill provisions which will make it impossible that the Irish landlords should be taxed for their absence from their country. Failing that, I am bound to say, badly as they have been treated in the past, the right hon. Gentleman will have inflicted another injury upon a loyal body of men in Ireland.

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL (Sir J. RIGBY, Forfar): The right hon. Gentleman who has just sat down appears to be under the impression that this Bill contains legislation prejudicial to landlords, and especially to absentee landlords, and he said more than once that we ought to put into the Bill a definition of an absentee landlord.

MR. CHAPLIN: I said if you refuse this Amendment.

*SIR J. RIGBY: Exactly so. If we refuse this Amendment we must put into the Bill a definition of an absentee landlords. Why in the Bill? We are saying nothing about that; we say nothing about absentee landlords in the Bill. The right hon. Gentleman seems to think that this question is now being mooted for the first time. We are asked to excuse from all possibilities of legislation on the part of the Irish Legislature anything that shall place the non-resident landlord under disability. Now, I should just like for one moment to recall to the House what has taken place before. An hon. Gentleman got up and said that there was a law in New Zealand that taxed the absentee landlord at a different and a higher scale to those who were resident. He demanded to know whether there was a prohibition in this Bill against any such legislation; and there and then he was told—and it was not the only time on which a similar statement was made—that the Government had no sort of intention of legislating in that way. Then the right hon. Gentleman the Member for the University of Cambridge suggested that this had been forgotten, and that, no doubt, the Government would do at once what they had always said they did not intend to do, and accept, as a matter of course, the words “or resident.” We have intended, so far as relates to any legislation which must take place in the Imperial Parliament, not to interfere in these matters at all. When it is considered of what importance it will be to Ireland, and, therefore, to the Executive Government of Ireland, that matters shall proceed there as regards people in England or elsewhere on terms that will be advantageous to Ireland, I think it is too much to suppose that they should not fairly be left to deal with these matters. With regard to the observations of the hon. Gentleman the Member for the St. Albans Division respecting mortgages, I would ask the hon. Gentleman to consider whether it is likely that any Irish Legislature would undertake to pass laws which would prevent money going into Ireland. Could there be any clearer interest than that they should make the laws, as far as possible, advantageous to such mortgages? The hon. Gentleman asked me, I think, what I considered would be the position of a mortgagee as to the possibility of legislation against him. Well, I think that was pointed out on Clause 4 as to Insurance Societies, and the distinction between Insurance Societies and individuals. I do not think there would be any legislation that could take effect in regard to mortgages of individuals which would not operate at the same time with regard to mortgages of Insurance Companies. But when we are asked to prohibit all legislation in regard to persons who are not resident, whether they be mortgagees or others, you have got to consider that you exclude equally beneficial and disadvantageous laws. If there were a clear danger that the Irish Legislature should be so foolish and absurd as to endeavour to keep capital out of their country, it might possibly be right to guard against that danger; but I say there is no danger of that, and it would be utterly wrong to attempt to provide for any such thing.

MR. DARLING (Deptford) said, it seemed to him a pity that the Solicitor General should have taken, as a matter of fact, a somewhat narrow view of this question. If they excluded altogether the speeches that had been made from below the Gangway, it would be possible to persuade the House that the Irish Parliament would not do anything to prevent English capital being invested in that country. But the Solicitor General argued with regard to Irish character from what he knew of the ordinary litigants in the English Court of Chancery. They were usually, if not Scotchmen, of a more cautious race from Palestine, who were accustomed to conduct their affairs according to business principles. Irish methods of procedure were very different. The hon. and learned Gentleman could not imagine that the Irish would be so foolish as to do anything that would impede the flow of money into Ireland, yet this very afternoon they had heard the hon. and learned Member for South Donegal enunciate a policy which must narrow the market for Irish properties, and, therefore, lower the price. The result of that must be disastrous to Ireland. This Bill was put forward as one not to widen the breach between England and Ireland, but to draw still closer the people of the two countries. But what would be the result? If an Englishman, choosing to live in England, was not to get his income from property which he owned in Ireland, as the man localised there would get his, it would lead to this: that the land of Ireland would be owned by people settled there, who would have no connection in England, Scotland, or Wales; and the effect of that must be to make the Irish people more and more a separate nation. Under those circumstances, how could the Bill draw closer the relations between the two countries? If the Party opposite wished to do Ireland one more favour, they would make it as simple for a man to live in one country as in another.

MR. GOSCHEN (St. George's, Hanover Square): I do not see the hon. Member for Bedford in his place, and I see from the empty state of the Benches opposite that hon. Members, too, believe that there is nothing in this Bill that has not been discussed over and over again. Yes; but we have not had a discussion on this subject.

SIR J. RIGBY: Yes, we have.

MR. GOSCHEN: It was touched upon in the briefest possible manner; there was no regular Debate on the question, and it has been a revelation to us on this side of the House that the Government intended to leave the power avowedly to hon. Members below the Gangway to tax absentee landlords.

MR. J. MORLEY: It was stated again and again.

MR. GOSCHEN: It is very extraordinary, if it has been stated again and again, that hon. Members on this side of the House have so small a recollection of it. Will it also be maintained that the hon. Member for North Kerry made a declaration then that it would be the intention of the Irish Members to tax absentee landlords? No; that was at a time when there was no guillotine in prospect, and when there was silence among the Irish Members; but the moment it is known there is only a certain time to be occupied we are then to be privileged, and, I must say, to have the advantage of hearing the views of hon. Members from Ireland.

MR. SEXTON: I did not declare that the absentee landlords would be taxed. What I said was that it would be improper to withhold the right to tax them from the Irish Legislature.

MR. MAC NEILL: And that is what I said.

MR. GOSCHEN: I thought he spoke not only of taxing them, but even of fining them. [Mr. SEXTON: No, no!] At all events, no one will deny that this question of the right of taxing absentee landlords is a very important one. I see the Prime Minister is in his place, and I would ask him, does he think that the relations of the Imperial Government to the Irish landlords are such that it is right to expose them to this not very remote risk—the probability that there is to be taxation of absentee landlords? We know that the honour which is pledged to the landlords in Ireland was only a pledge of honour given under special circumstances; but, without wishing to say anything that would be too censorious, may I not suggest to the right hon. Gentleman that, if they are going to place the loyal minority of Ireland, including the Irish landlords, under the power of hon. Members below the Gangway, at all events this Amendment is a precaution which we might fairly ask them to take. I do not believe for a moment that the taxation of absentee landlords would be an advantage to Ireland. I do not believe that this method of protecting the Irish landlords who live in Ireland would be successful. I do believe that if this power were exercised it would be a baneful power in disturbing the relations between landlords and tenants. It might be well to try to tax absentee landlords when separated by such distances as we are from our Colonies; but how are absentee landlords to be defined in Ireland? The point I wish to make is that it would be futile really to tax them, whilst, at the same time, it would create a feeling much to be regretted. Suppose hon. Members were to put a tax on absentee landlords, how will they define them? I admit the Government may fairly decline to answer that, and say it is left to the Irish Parliament to settle what an absentee landlord is. Is he a landlord who does not live there for a year or two years or more? Is he to qualify by residence like a canon who has to spend a couple of months in a Cathedral town? What kind of residence is it to be? If he goes and shoots for a month is he to be free from taxation? If he goes there with the whole of his family is he to be free from taxation? It appears to me it is almost ridiculous to think that any definition of taxation of absentee landlords could be found which would not lead to every kind of evasion and difficulty and inconvenience, and would bring no advantage whatever to the Irish Exchequer. It is easy enough to elaborate this question. Supposing, as the right hon. Member for the Sleaford Division put it, that a man spends six months here in the House doing Parliamentary duties, and at the end of the Session goes for the benefit of his health to the South of England. Is he to be taxed because he is an absentee landlord? Or suppose you provide for all these cases, is it not certain that it would be easy—looking to the closeness between the two countries—to find methods by which the tax would be evaded? Hon. Members may, perhaps, say—“Why protest against the tax?” because it is not likely to bring in much money. Is that a great financier’s view? Is that the view of the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Gladstone) that in that case the tax is a sound and useful one. If there is one single man in the House who I should have thought might protest against the view that a futile tax might yet be proposed, it would be the right hon. Gentleman. I thought that one of the chief doctrines he would have laid down would have been that a tax which gave rise to friction and inconvenience, and was not remunerative, would be the last tax he would desire to see imposed. The argument has already been used that some of the best landlords in Ireland are those who do not reside there. The case has been mentioned of the Duke of Devonshire, and there are Lord Leconfield and many others who spend as much and more on their estates in Ireland than many a landlord resident in Ireland does. Suppose you were to tax the absentee landlords, on whom will that tax fall? The result will be that such landlords as I have indicated will have so much less of revenue from their estates to spend upon the improvements which their tenants desire; and this taxation of the best absentee landlords would be likely to have that very result which the action of much of the land legislation has been having—namely, to relieve the landlords in Ireland from doing their duty by their tenants as is generally done by landlords in England; therefore, I say, from the point of view of expenditure on Irish estates, the taxation on absentee landlords will be a fatal mistake. There is this further point: a question has been raised with regard to mortgages. Suppose that you tax the absentee landlords, will it not shake the credit on which money has been lent by Insurance Companies and others, and does the Solicitor General wish to establish this state of things—that the portion of the rents which passes over to the Insurance Company is not to be touched, but that the free rents are to be touched? If so, every possible difficulty will arise. I understand the Solicitor General to say he does not believe that this would lead to taxation of mortgages. But if you tax the absentee landlords it will lead to the taxation of mortgages also. It may startle the Solicitor General, but I think he may know that, in those countries where absentee landlords have been taxed, there, also, there is a question of taxation of mortgages. A good deal has been said as to the alternatives offered other landlords—I will not say the best landlords—but resident landlords in Ireland who may desire to leave Ireland. I wonder what is the choice that is going to be given by hon. Members below the Gangway. Hitherto, during these last years, language was held by them which was to frighten and drive the English garrison out of Ireland. Hon. Members below the Gangway do not deny that their policy has been to drive out the English garrison and the English landlords; and they stated that they would not rest until they had accomplished that object. Now suddenly there seems to be a change; and through the taxation of absentee landlords those who formerly were to be driven out are to be attracted to stay in Ireland. Is that the real reason why this power of taxing absentee landlords must be exercised? Is it in order to attach to Ireland those landlords against whom the Land League has been employed and every device practised which might alienate them from their estates and drive them out. Another idea might be that the taxation of absentee landlords might compel them to sell under disadvantageous circumstances; and I should be very much mistaken if the taxation of absentee landlords was not one of those methods of squeezing to which my hon. and gallant Friend behind me alluded in an earlier part of the Debate. They were formerly to be squeezed in one way, and now the Government are perfectly prepared, as it would seem, to hand them over to the power of the Irish Legislature to squeeze them in another manner. I am bound to say that, looking to the assurances which have been given us of equal protection of the laws, and that property should not be taken without due compensation, I confess I am surprised at the new prospect that has been opened out. Why, this is as effectual a way of depriving them of property as you can well devise. I do not think it is within the spirit of equal protection of the law to say that the landlord who resides in Ireland for a certain time, either in the year or in the course of a year, is to be treated in one way, and that the landlord who dwells in England or Scotland for a part of the year is to be treated in another way. That is not the equality which we have been induced to look to. Of course, the great difficulty in this as in all other cases is that you are trying to have separate legislation between the two countries which ought to have the same legislation. It crops up on every occasion. Why is there this great difficulty. Because the interests of the people of Ireland are so interlaced with the interests of the people of England that it is deadly to separate them, otherwise it might be easy enough. Her Majesty's Government take a different view of the case. They are willing that Ireland should be treated as a separate country, because when you speak of absenteeism, which is to be absenteeism in England from Ireland, you are treating Ireland as a separate geographical whole, and you are showing by your resistance to this Amendment, as you have shown by your resistance to others, the extraordinary difficulty which exists when you leave that freedom to the Irish Parliament which they desire, and give them the right at the same time to protect all those interests which have grown up under your care, and for which you are responsible as much as you are responsible for the interests in this country—and which will suffer under the legislation which you set up.

MR. W. E. GLADSTONE: The declarations of the Government on this subject were long ago made, and the House has considered and decided the matter. The right hon. Member for Cambridge University submitted the Amendment without any attempt at re-discussion. But the speech of my right hon. Friend stands with hundreds of others in this respect—that it was a re-discussion of the general subject. It has been an argument in favour of absentees. The absentees are in most cases excellent landlords—

MR. GOSCHEN. (interposing) said, that he never uttered a single word in favour of absenteeism. What he said was that there were good landlords as well as bad who were absentees. He was as much opposed to absenteeism as the Prime Minister.

MR. W. E. GLADSTONE: The declaration which the right hon. Gentleman has just made—that he is just as much opposed to absenteeism as I am—is a valuable declaration. But having heard the words of the speech of the right hon. Gentleman—to which I listened with attention—I must say that the whole speech sounded to me as an ingenious and elaborate plea against legislation in regard to absenteeism. The right hon. Member for Sleaford appeared to think that absenteeism in Ireland was fully justified by legislation. The right hon. Gentleman seemed to suppose that absenteeism began in 1881. Absenteeism has been a great, a gigantic fact, staring him in the face for years and years. It would be premature, and quite unnecessary, to enter into any defence of taxation of absentees. It is a very difficult and very important social question; but in principle a tax upon absentees is not unsound. In principle it is right to hold that distinct and definite duties are inseparably connected with the possession of land. The right hon. Gentleman says that there are absentee landlords who have been good landlords, and that there are resident landlords who have been good landlords. I entirely and cordially agree with him to this extent, that they are good landlords so far as their position of absentees admits. They are good landlords in respect of all that relates to money; but I think that Mr. Carlyle was right when he said that cash payment was not the only means between man and man. There are social and political arguments against the tax which may be conclusive, but I do not enter into that question at all, nor say whether it is right or not. This I will say—though I may be accused of irrelevancy in saying anything which refers to the history of the past, which, according to hon. Gentlemen opposite has nothing to do with the present or future—that, in my opinion, it is a noble feature in the history of the old Protestant Ascendancy Party in Ireland that, during the latter half of the last century, they were strongly in favour of a tax upon absentees. That did them high honour, even if their political judgment was not sound. What we contend is this—that the Irish Legislature are the proper persons, if they are to come into existence, to consider whether or not the duty of residence ought to be required of the owners of land, and whether habitual non-residence should not be sufficiently defined so that it might justly and properly be discouraged in the form of taxation. That I say is a question we ought to leave to them, and that is a question which we have already decided to leave to them. It is all very well to say there are absentee landlords in England. Is there £1,000 of income to absentee landlords in England for £10,000 in Ireland? The landlords of this country are generally resident, whilst a very unfortunate proportion of the Irish landlords have been habitually non-resident. Our contention is this—that the Irish Legislature is the party, and the sole party, that can properly deal with this question, which is one that ought to be dealt with with great knowledge and great care. It may be there are some who believe—I do not myself altogether reject the belief—that after the controversy has settled down in Ireland the absentees will be much fewer than now. [A laugh.] The right hon. Member for the University of Dublin (Mr. D. Plunket) smiles; but he will recollect this historical fact, and I am sure he will not deny what I am going to say. When the Union was about to be passed, and when arguments in favour of the Union were made, it was generally admitted that the Union would bring about an increase of absenteeism. That, I am sure, he must recollect; and, I think, unless I am very much mistaken, that is even admitted in the official pamphlet of Mr. Cooke, with which he must be acquainted, and there is not the slightest doubt that that melancholy prophecy has been largely fulfilled. There is no other country that has ever had, so far as I know, as much of absenteeism as Ireland with the solitary and mournful exception of our West Indian Colonies, where absenteeism was still more thoroughly and deeply rooted. But the question is, if this be a matter of simple policy, of consideration of practical arguments one way or another, then it is a matter that exclusively belongs to the Irish Legislature to deal with. If you choose to say that the taxation of absenteeism is a crime, that absenteeism is like some consecrated shrine which you ought to defend from spoliation, you will say that it is an absolute duty to protect absentees against future legislation. But that is surely a doctrine that cannot be maintained. The right hon. Gentleman has himself said that he strongly disapproves of absenteeism, and that he regards it as in itself an injury. If it is in itself an injury, it is for the Irish Legislature to consider in what manner that injury should be dealt with. You cannot possibly give to Ireland the power and responsibility of making laws without admitting in the full that so vast and important a social question as this must go to the Irish Legislature, and cannot properly, or wisely, or justly be decided here.

*MR. D. PLUNKET (Dublin University): I desire to intervene but for a very short time in this Debate, and I wish to say, at the outset, that I have myself no special sympathy with absentees in the sense of those who are voluntarily absentees from their property; but even with reference to those, I think that some of the language which has been used by the right hon. Gentleman to-day is of rather a dangerous import to the laws which have hitherto protected property in this country. The right hon. Gentleman has said the House has already decided this question. The right hon. Gentleman must, no doubt, have in his mind that in the course of the Debates some such decision was arrived at; but I have been in constant attendance in this House, and I have no recollection of this question being brought to a decision in any former stage of the Bill. I do not wish to be dogmatic; I only say I have no recollection of it, and I should be glad if right hon. Gentlemen opposite will refer us to the occasion when this question was raised and decided by the House. It is, at all events, a new question so far as the laws of this United Kingdom are concerned. The right hon. Gentleman has said that the Irish Parliament is the proper party to settle this question—the question whether taxation should be applied to absentees. He said the question ought to be referred to that Parliament. That is the point upon which I desire to join issue with him. I may say, in passing, that he laid some stress on the fact that there was a great tendency at the time of Grattan's Parliament—

MR. W. E. GLADSTONE: And before it.

MR. PLUNKET: That it was before the Union the habit of the Irish landlords to reside on their property, and he seems to think that there would be a tendency again for them to return to Ireland and reside on their property if this Home Rule Bill should pass into law. But surely he knows that the case would now be wholly different—he has told us so himself—that the Irish Parliament in those days was mainly a landlords' Parliament. He has often told us that the Irish House of Commons was as much identified with the landlords as was the Irish House of Lords. Passing from that, I ask, is it right that this power should be delegated to the Irish Legislature, or that it should be reserved from them for treatment by this Parliament? Let me say, in passing, that with regard to the proportion of absentees—I may be wrong, but in proportion to the total number of Irish landlords—I consider such a statement as we have heard to be wild and misleading. But is it just to give to the Irish Parliament—is it right to give them the power of imposing taxation upon the whole class of non-resident landlords, because a certain small proportion of them are voluntary absentees? This is not only a question for the landlords who for whatever reason do not reside on their properties in Ireland, but for those similarly situated in England and Scotland, and also for those English and Scotch mortgagees who have charges upon Irish land. There are, it must be remembered, absentees and absentees. We know that in England and Scotland there are classes of landlords who cannot always reside on their property if they would. For instance, there are in Ireland, as there are in England, landlords who have several estates—on one estate they have a residence; on others they have no residence. And the question arises whether the Irish Parliament is likely to follow up the principle of taxing these as absentees, and, if so, whether they are likely to do so with moderation and justice? The Irish absentee landlords have been the subject of denunciation for years, for generations, by the very Party who will have control of the Irish Legislature of the future, and, not only the Irish absentee landlords, but those very persons in England and Scotland who have mortgage charges upon property in Ireland. Having been so denounced and held up to obloquy in the past, does no risk exist for them in the future? The Solicitor General asked, was it possible that the Irish Parliament would tax such mortgagees and so prevent the flow of capital into the country? But, Sir, it is only within the last five years, or six, or ten years, that this very case arose. There was a movement at that time amongst a certain number of the landlords of Ireland demanding that there should be a reduction of family charges pro rata according to the reduction of rents. What was the attitude of the Nationalist Party? It was, I think, The Freeman's Journal—at all events, it was one of the Irish Nationalist papers—that called upon the landlords to join with the tenants for the purpose of reducing the charges of Englishmen and Scotchmen who had Irish property. I did not know that this discussion was coming on, or I might have had the quotations with me. But certainly the appeal was made to the landlords to join with the tenants in order to cut down those mortgage charges of people residing in England and Scotland. This is not a matter of speculation, but a matter of fact. That was one of the first inducements held out by the Irish tenants, or by their organs in the Press—an inducement to the landlords to join in fleecing those Englishmen and Scotchmen who have placed their money in Irish investments. I do not want to prolong the Debate; but I would point out that it is impossible you can confine this proposal to Irish landlords—if a tax is to be put on them it will, assuredly, also be put on these Englishmen and Scotchmen who have their money invested in Ireland. Probably it may be put on with greater stringency in their case. The question is—Is the House prepared to take this view—that those, whether Englishmen, Scotchmen, or Irishmen, who invested their money—and were often invited, as in the time of the Landed Estates Courts and the Encumbered Estates Courts, on the title of your own law and on the inducement that their investments would be safe—are you going to say that you will not keep these under your own protection, but that you are going to put them under an Irish Parliament where the overwhelming majority will be the Representatives of those who have been denouncing indiscriminately for years the absentee and the investor? Are you going to say that these people deserve no special protection? If you do that, you cannot confine it entirely to Ireland—you cannot confine ex post facto legislation of that kind to one side of the Channel. The Nemesis of such legislation will soon pursue you into your own country, and, whether it be right or wrong, Parliament must at some future time pass laws of this character for England and Scotland. However that may be, there is grave risk that injustice may be done unless Parliament, by some such provision as that now proposed, prevents the interference of those Leaders of the Irish Legislature of the future who have long been engaged denouncing wholesale Irish absentee landlords, and also all those who have made mortgage investments on Irish properties, as not entitled to the ordinary protection of the law.

COMMANDER BETHELL (York, E.R., Holderness) said, the hon. Member for St. Albans (Mr. V. Gibbs) asked whether Insurance Companies and other Corporations of that class would be exempted from the operation of this provision. The Chief Secretary, in reply, said he had an Amendment down on that subject, and, after that, the Solicitor General said that these companies would be placed on the same footing as private individuals. There was a difference between the two answers. The Attorney General shook his head. Perhaps the hon. and learned Gentleman would point out where the similarity lay between the two.

MR. J. MORLEY said, what he said was that he had an Amendment on the Paper bearing on the subject.

COMMANDER BETHELL said, he would like to understand whether he understood the right hon. Gentleman to convey that his Amendment met the views of the hon. Member for St. Albans?

MR. J. MORLEY was understood to answer in the negative.

COMMANDER BETHELL said, it was so understood at the time.

Question put, and negatived.

Mr. D. Plunket

SIR J. GORST moved, in line 5, to leave out "by virtue of," and insert "in accordance with." He said, it seemed to him that the words "by virtue of" did not appear to be quite clear in their application. He wished to substitute words which he thought would make it clear as to the position of institutions, say, under the Companies Acts, or incorporated by Royal Charter. He presumed the institutions it was intended to cover were voluntary institutions not incorporated by Statute; but he did not think the words "by virtue of" would include charitable or philanthropic institutions which were not incorporated. He begged to move his Amendment.

Amendment proposed to the proposed Amendment, in line 5, to leave out the words "by virtue of," in order to insert the words "in accordance with."—(Sir J. Gorst.)

Question proposed, "That the words 'by virtue of' stand part of the proposed Amendment."

*SIR C. RUSSELL said, the clause mainly referred to associations which were incorporated either by Charter or Act of Parliament, but it was not intended to bring within the purview of the clause foreign associations not existing "by virtue" of our law, though they might be in accordance with it.

Question put, and agreed to.

Amendment, as amended, agreed to.

MR. PARKER SMITH (Lanark, Partick) said, he rose to move in page 3, line 12, at end, insert—

"Whereby the writ of habeas corpus may be suspended; or whereby any Bill of Attainder or ex post facto law may be passed; or."

The Amendment in its present form was open to the charge of multifariousness; but, although the various points raised had been discussed separately in Committee, he thought they were so important that they might be discussed together. [Interruption, and cries of "Order!"]

MR. SPEAKER: Order, order!

*MR. PARKER SMITH said, he was quite sure the Government, and especially the Prime Minister, would not deny the importance of these questions. The right hon. Gentleman, not long since, in answer to the hon. Member for South Tyrone (Mr. T. W. Russell), declared that there was no question more vital than that of the liberty of the subject. That was the question he wished to raise now. And he must say that it was strange that gentlemen who voted against the Criminal Procedure Bill of 1887 could support a proposal which virtually affected far more people than that Act did. The question was whether they should give over their right to deal with this question—whether they were to retain their right to deal with the liberty of the subject, or whether they should allow another body to deal with it. It seemed to him that this was as great a question as the other question as to the alteration of criminal procedure. It was their duty, therefore, to endeavour to press the question, and to see whether, in the changed circumstances in which they were placed since they had been in Committee, they could not, at any rate, arrive at some understanding in the matter. There was one argument that might have been used at the earlier stages of the Bill—the argument of finality; that they were getting rid definitely of the Irish problem and the Irish Question. But that argument could not be used now, for this Bill allowed the Irish Question to stand over—it proposed to re-open Irish questions in the future, and not to get rid of them. They were to have in Ireland a mere Provisional Government. It seemed to him, while that was so, that the very last thing that should be handed over to the Irish Government was the power of dealing with habeas corpus. They might grant other powers, but they should retain this under their own control. There would be Irish Members here in this House; and it seemed to him only right in these circumstances that they ought to take this most delicate and tender subject under their control in this House. The writ of habeas corpus had been from the earliest times the bulwark of our liberties; and it had been held by Constitutional writers as the strongest and simplest method of sustaining liberty. During the century it had been once suspended in this country, and frequently suspended in Ireland. The Irish Legislature, therefore, would have plenty of precedents; and, as the speech of the hon. Member for South Donegal showed, they would be prepared to act on them. Those precedents might be good or bad, but, seeing that they existed, it seemed to him that the discretion of acting on them should be kept in the hands of the Imperial Parliament. What would be the protection of the Irish minority against abuse of the power of suspending the Act on the part of the Irish Legislature? The Attorney General had argued that it would be the Royal veto; but it was not for matters of this kind that the veto was intended. How could they interfere by veto? If the Government of Ireland went to them and told them that it was essential for the good government of the country that they should have power under special circumstances to suspend the Habeas Corpus Act, how could they interfere by veto? It could only be by constant intervention after full Debate—in which the Irish Members would take part—that there would be any possibility of interference with the discretion of the Irish Government. The Prime Minister had used the same argument. He had said on the 19th June—

“Were this Irish Legislature to be capable of capricious, wanton, and needless suspension of the Habeas Corpus Act, with no circumstance to warrant or demand it, our Bill, as it is framed, would not allow it. Such an Act, even if it could receive the Royal Assent, which I believe to be impossible, even if it could escape the intervention of the House, which I believe to be impossible also, the action of the Courts of Ireland by the appeal that would be made to them, and by the final judgment of that Judicial Committee of the Privy Council, would entirely quash and nullify that not only unwise but wicked Act of the Irish Legislature.”

No Irish Parliament would suspend the Habeas Corpus Act under the circumstances described by the right hon. Gentleman. They would only be likely to do it where there was a certain amount of cause, but cause which the Imperial Parliament would probably think insufficient. Still, the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council could not interfere. Their interference would only come in where there was no cause for the suspension of the Act—where, so to speak, there was no case to go to the jury. If there was any evidence at all, the case would be one not for the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council, but for a Legislative Body to consider. What was the law on this matter in other countries? Take the case of the United States—a country which had framed its institutions on ours. It was part of the original fundamental Constitution of the United States that the writ of habeas corpus should be embodied in both the Federal and the State laws. The 9th section of the First Article said—

“The privilege of the writ of habeas corpus shall not be suspended, unless when, in cases of rebellion or invasion, the public safety may require it. No Bill of Attainder or ex post facto law shall be passed.

Dealing with the powers of States the words were—

“(10) No State shall enter into any Treaty . . . . pass any Bill of Attainder, ex post facto law, or law impairing the obligation of contracts.”

And these provisions were embodied in the Constitutions of the various States. Both the Federal Government and the States Governments were prohibited from suspending the writ of habeas corpus in any case save those of rebellion or actual invasion. He should like to know whether that was the view of the Government of the circumstances which really would justify the suspension of the writ of habeas corpus? They knew that it had been suspended in Ireland under other circumstances; but was it the view of the Government that in the future it should only be suspended in cases of rebellion or actual invasion? It seemed to him that the line that had been taken by Members of the Government and their supporters with regard to the Crimes Act would lead to the conclusion that under no circumstances should the writ of habeas corpus be suspended save in cases of rebellion and actual invasion. If they thought there were other circumstances which would justify it he should like to hear what they were. If they did not think that, then the Amendment became a corollary of an Amendment which was accepted by the Government the other day—an Amendment moved by the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for Bury (Sir H. James), to give the Executive power to suspend the issue of the writs of habeas corpus in cases of rebellion and invasion. The Law Officers fought against that Amendment.

*SIR C. RUSSELL: I fought very mildly.

MR. PARKER SMITH: But the Solicitor General had fought vigorously. It seemed to be the function of the Solicitor General to act as watch-dog.

Mr. Parker Smith

He barked violently at every Amendment moved, but presently along came his owner prepared to deal with the matter in hand with a certain amount of reasonableness. After the Solicitor General had spoken, the Prime Minister got up and said—

“The hon. Member for North Kerry argued—and argued boldly—that the matter of exception from the right of habeas corpus made by the proclamation of the Executive was, or must be, an Imperial matter. He confessed he thought there was very great force in that statement. The Attorney General absolutely demonstrated that this was an Imperial matter; that foreign invasion was war, and, as war, it was shut out from the powers of the Irish Legislature; that rebellion was rebellion against the Crown, and that proclaimed rebellion striking at the very heart and centre of the Government was likewise war levied against the Queen, and was distinctly and indisputably an Imperial matter. As I listened to the argument of the Attorney General, I was confirmed in my acceptance of what has been said by the hon. Member for North Kerry. My hon. and learned Friend has so entirely cut the ground from beneath the feet of myself and the Chief Secretary that we feel we cannot carry out our desire to leave this matter to the Irish Legislature, and I think the best course is to do what we have done in relation to the supremacy, and what we have done to the best of our ability upon every occasion without exception on every Amendment and every clause that has been proposed during the course of the Bill, and that is to accept it unless there is a good case against it. In that manner we wish to deal with the Amendment of my right hon. Friend, and we shall, consequently, not oppose it.”

It seemed to him that the attitude of the right hon. Gentleman was very different to that taken up by the Government when dealing with this question of the suspension of the writ of habeas corpus in Committee. The present Amendment should be accepted, as the previous one had been. So much for the case of habeas corpus. He would now deal with the other point which was included in the Amendment. In the first place there was the Bill of Attainder, which was a comparatively small point. It was a sentence passed on an individual not by a Court of Justice, but by an Act of Parliament. Such a sentence was one which, no doubt, everyone in the House would regard as absolute, and would agree should be struck out of any fresh Constitution. Sir Thomas Erskine May said in his Parliamentary Practice, with regard to Bills of Attainder—

“In evil times this summary power of Parliament to punish criminals by statute has been perverted and abused. In the best of times it should be regarded with the severest jealousy.”

This matter was provided for in the Federal Constitution of the United States of America, and he thought in most of the State Constitutions, and it had been found very useful even in modern times. Cooley said with regard to it—

“The conviction of the propriety of this Constitutional provision has been so universal that it has never been questioned either in Legislative Bodies or elsewhere.”

Through this provision various unconstitutional and improper acts of the various States had been held to be ultra vires. Then there was the question of ex post facto laws. So contrary were these laws to the spirit of our Constitution that the other day it was ruled out of Order even to propose an Amendment to this Bill, because it contained the principle of ex post facto law. If that was the case, surely in making a fresh Constitution and stating general principles this point ought to be specifically covered. The restriction existed in the United States—in the Congress and in the various States, and it was particularly desirable that it should exist in Ireland, seeing that there would be a special proneness on the part of that Legislature to pass ex post facto laws in consequence of old quarrels and bitter-nesses the memory of which had not yet altogether died out. Ex post facto laws might refer to Criminal or Civil Law. As to criminal matters, it was held to be too monstrous to suppose that the Irish Legislature would desire to pass ex post facto laws; but it appeared to him that, when they were dealing with general principles in a measure like the present, they should cover the whole of the ground. On a parity of reasoning, if the Attorney General had to draw up a new Decalogue he would hardly leave out the Commandment, “Thou shalt not kill.” It was necessary to lay down the law in general terms. It might be held that that Commandment covered a vast number of minor offences which approached to murder. So also the words he proposed would cover a great many cases which, in the absence of such words, the Courts would find it very difficult to decide. In regard to Civil matters, ex post facto laws might bear with great hardship on individuals, which laws made for the future might not. Therefore, the discretionary power of making such laws should not, it seemed to him, rest in the hands of the Provisional Government that was being constituted. It was one of those supreme discretions which they at Westminster ought to keep in their own hands. All these matters which he had grouped together were questions dealing with the liberty of the subject. In the absence of his Amendment, indignation might be aroused, and forcible resistance might be offered to enactments of the Irish Legislature, and whilst they were protecting themselves, in many respects he thought that this was a matter in which they should not omit that precaution. Some of the matters in which they had protected themselves—for instance, as to the payment of the financial contribution from Ireland—seemed to him trifling as compared with the matter here involved. In the one case it was the public who were interested, and the public could take care of themselves; but in the other case it was private individuals who might suffer injustice. He begged to move his Amendment.

Amendment proposed,

In page 3, line 12, after the word “or,” to insert, as a new sub-section, the words,—
“Whereby the writ of habeas corpus may be suspended; or whereby any Bill of Attainder or ex post facto law may be passed; or.”—(Mr. Parker Smith.)

Question proposed, “That those words be there inserted.”

*SIR C. RUSSELL said, that the Government could not accept the Amendment, the subject having been fully discussed in Committee. He could not admit that the matter wore a new aspect because points which had previously been treated separately were now grouped together. The hon. and learned Member had taken another remarkable ground in justification of further discussion—he had gone the length of saying that the Government ought to accept the Amendment because it was a corollary to the Amendment of the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for Bury, which was accepted a few days ago. What was that Amendment? The right hon. and learned Gentleman had discovered—or some industrious friend had discovered for him—that in 1781 an Act was passed by the Irish Parliament, a clause of which gave to the Irish Government the exceptional power of suspending the habeas corpus by an Executive act—namely, by proclamation with the assent of the Lord Lieutenant or the Irish Privy Council. He (Sir C. Russell) and his hon. and learned Friend the Solicitor General both spoke when the Amendment was moved, and pointed out that the proposal was one of really no importance, for the reason that the Statute had existed more than 100 years without being enforced. On further discussion the Prime Minister realised the fact that the matter was not one of serious political importance. In fact, this subject had been amply discussed. On the 19th June, the hon. and learned Member for East Down (Mr. Rentoul) moved an Amendment to prevent the Irish Legislature from suspending or prejudicially affecting the right of any person to writ of habeas corpus. He (Sir C. Russell) replied, the hon. and learned Member for Mid Armagh (Mr. Dunbar Barton) continued the discussion, the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for Bury then read him (Sir C. Russell) a lecture against what he called the political speech he had made, the Prime Minister followed, and the discussion was brought to a close by the noble Lord the Member for South Paddington. The discussion occupied a considerable number of pages in The Parliamentary Debates. On the 20th June there was a discussion on the question of excluding ex post facto legislation from the Irish Legislature originated by the noble Lord the Member for West Edinburgh (Viscount Wolmer). He (Sir C. Russell) had replied, he was followed by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Birmingham (Mr. J. Chamberlain), the hon. Baronet the Member for Wigan (Sir F. S. Powell) then spoke, and the hon. and learned Member for Haddington (Mr. Haldane). The Leader of the Opposition joined in the discussion; he was followed by the Prime Minister, and the Prime Minister was followed by the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for Bury. Considerable time was occupied by the Debate. And, in addition to these Debates, on the 14th June a similar discussion took place on the subject of Bills of Attainder. Surely it would not be considered unreasonable if the Government held that these subjects had been discussed at adequate length, and if they declined to enter into them fully on the present occasion. Hon.

Sir C. Russell

Members professed to be anxious to get to the discussion of the important matters of the Bill, and the Government were anxious to assist them if possible. Why, then, were they to have repeated the discussion of matters which had already been dealt with? What was now proposed was that the Irish Legislative Body should have no power to pass any law suspending the Habeas Corpus Act. Why should they not have that power? Why was such a matter as this, whenever it should arise, to be sent back to the Imperial Parliament, which would not possess as much knowledge of the local facts as the Irish Legislative Body and the advisers of the Lord Lieutenant? With regard to Bills of Attainder, his answer was not only that the matter had been discussed before, but that the Bill already contained a provision whereby no person in Ireland could be deprived of life, liberty, or property, without due process of law. As to ex post facto legislation, it was of two kinds—that was to say, it could deal with criminal and with civil matters. The criminal aspect of the case would come under the answer he had just given; and as to the civil, as the Government had stated before, they did not intend to deprive the Irish Legislative Body of the right to pass an Act of Indemnity. Upon all these grounds the Government could not accept the present Amendment.

SIR H. JAMES said, he thought the House would be disposed to agree with the Attorney General that they should not unnecessarily discuss matters twice over. If, however, they felt a matter to be of such importance that injustice might be done unless a remedy were found, they were justified in taking every opportunity to discuss it, and in pertinaciously trying to prevent the danger. With regard to the Habeas Corpus Act, so far as he could understand, it was proposed to allow the Irish Government a free hand to suspend it in Ireland. The Attorney General seemed to have lost sight of the reason why the clause was eventually accepted by the Prime Minister. The Attorney General and the Solicitor General had said that the matter was one of small importance; and he pointed to the fact that, although the Irish Act had been in existence 100 years, it had not been acted on. But in gauging the importance of the matter they could not have regard to past experience. They were now establishing a new subordinate Executive; and the question was whether they should give to that Executive the power of suspending the Habeas Corpus Act? The reason why the last Amendment was accepted was not on account of the distinction between the Legislative and the Executive power, but the conversion of the Prime Minister rested on the ground that the hon. Member for North Kerry and the Attorney General had convinced him that dealing with the suspension of the Habeas Corpus Act was an Imperial matter, and not an Irish matter. It was quite true that the discussion was then confined to two conditions of things—namely, the existence of rebellion and invasion, which were put forward as being Imperial matters—and he quite appreciated the fact that it was on consideration of those two questions that the Prime Minister said the subject was Imperial; but it must be remembered that in the case of rebellion or invasion the whole of the people of Ireland would be affected. They now arrived at this material question—Under what conditions did the Government expect that in the future the Habeas Corpus Act would be suspended in Ireland? If it was to be suspended when invasion and rebellion existed, then the Prime Minister had admitted—and the Attorney General and the hon. Member for North Kerry had asserted—that it was an Imperial and not an Irish matter. And what was the consequence of that? Why, that Imperial and not Irish legislation should alone be competent to deal with it; and yet the Government were going to allow the Irish Legislature to deal with this—according to the Prime Minister—purely Imperial subject. If the Habeas Corpus Act was to be suspended in consequence of rebellion or invasion, they must leave the matter to the Imperial Legislature; and yet they refused the Amendment. They were going to give to the Irish Legislature an unfettered hand to suspend the Habeas Corpus Act in regard to matters other than rebellion and invasion? If so, what were the other circumstances which the Government considered would justify the Irish Parliament in suspending the Habeas Corpus Act? They must be something particular.

Were they cases of great crimes? He hoped the Prime Minister would not suppose he wanted for a moment to suggest that there was blame attaching to anyone in respect of the suspension of the Habeas Corpus Act in Ireland during recent years. He did not wish to separate himself from responsibility as to the passing of Coercion Acts; but, speaking generally with regard to what had occurred, he would ask the House whether they wished to see the Habeas Corpus Act suspended in Great Britain or Ireland? If it were done at all, it should be done for great cause and after great deliberation. Great safeguards would require to be taken in the case of Ireland, and the responsibility ought to rest on the shoulders of the Parliament of the United Kingdom. It certainly ought not to rest with a new Parliament without experience in dealing with such questions, and where there was not likely to be unanimity amongst the various sections of the community. He did not wish to be a prophet of evil; but surely it was possible to suppose that the men who would advise the Lord Lieutenant to assent to the suspension of the Habeas Corpus Act would be the very men who would have been instrumental in passing it, for reasons, possibly, merely political. Why should the Lord Lieutenant be left in a position to come into conflict with his Executive Ministers? And why should he be asked to act unconstitutionally in not following their advice? The Lord Lieutenant must either accept the advice of his Ministers, or say—"I dismiss you." It was to be hoped that this matter would yet be dealt with seriously by the Government in the light of the admission already made—that this was an Imperial question. As to a Bill of Attainder, the Attorney General had reduced his opposition almost to a nullity, because he said the Irish Legislature could not possibly pass such a measure, as it could not be called "due process of law." But he (Sir H. James) was very much inclined to believe that an Act of Parliament, whatever its character, would represent "due process of law." But if the Government had any objection to Bills of Attainder being passed, why not embody their view in the Bill—why not render certain that which to some minds, at any rate, appeared uncertain? With regard to ex post facto laws, they had had a strong example of the objection of the Government to them in 1883 in connection with the question of preventing certain Members from taking their seats. They had held that such legislation should only apply to the future. The House then said that, however desirable it might be to make the House as pure as possible, it would not allow Reports of Commissioners to affect the status of any persons in that House. When powers were being conferred on a Legislative Body by express enactment, why should not the proper limit of those powers be fixed? The Irish Legislature might exercise ex post facto legislation in its days of inexperience.

MR. MAC NEILL (Donegal, S.) made an observation which did not reach the Reporters' Gallery.

SIR H. JAMES said, the expression used by the hon. Member for South Donegal would emphasise the argument. When there were to be 103 Members entertaining the same views as were expressed by the hon. Member for Donegal in a manner that was peculiar, but that could be comprehended by the House, it was well to take care that ex post facto legislation should not come within the range of powers of the Irish Parliament.

MR. BUCKNILL (Surrey, Epsom) said, the Attorney General (Sir C. Russell) had said that the question before the House had already been fully discussed, and he had referred to the great number of pages of The Parliamentary Debates which were occupied by the report of the discussion. As a matter of fact, however, the discussion on the question of habeas corpus on the 19th of June had occupied exactly two and a-half hours and no more. Everybody must admit that the suspension of habeas corpus was an all-important question, and that such a remedy should never be applied if any other remedy could be found. He wished to say nothing offensive to the Nationalist Members; but there was a possibility that in times to come, when the present Nationalist Members had all been called to their long rest, the Irish Legislature might be hurried into hasty legislation arising either out of the subject of land or the subject of religion, which were the two subjects that the Chancellor of the Duchy (Mr. Bryce) said were specially in the mind of the Government in connection with safeguards, and an Act might be passed suspending habeas corpus. If, then, the Lord Lieutenant should advise the exercise of the veto, and Her Majesty's Government should advise Her Majesty directly to the contrary, there would be a charming instance of a deadlock. As there were to be 80 Irish Members in the Imperial House of Commons, it surely was not correct of the Attorney General to say that the House could not be nearly as well informed as the Irish Legislature as to the facts bearing upon a proposed suspension of habeas corpus. Surely the Irish Members would be able to give the House all necessary information on the subject. Inasmuch as the English Members would have the Welsh and Scotch, as well as the Irish, Members to assist them in their deliberations there would be no fear of injustice being done.

MR. DUNBAR BARTON (Armagh, Mid.), who rose amid a few cries of "Oh," said, he was not surprised that some hon. Members should try and prevent a Member of the Irish minority from speaking on this subject. He would remind the Attorney General that he had omitted to tell the House that the former Debate on this subject was closed after it had been a very short time in progress. He offered no apology for protesting against the insertion in the Bill of the most tyrannous and aggressive provision inserted in any great measure during this century. If it was a serious thing for any Government to propose a single measure suspending habeas corpus, how serious was it to give carte blanche to the Irish Legislature to do so at their own sweet will! The Attorney General had told them that he was willing to give these powers to the Irish Legislature because he depended upon the veto. That argument, however, would apply to every paragraph in Clause 4. That argument seemed to him to show how necessary it was to prevent these provisions affecting the liberty of the subject from being inserted in the Bill. There were no safeguards in the Bill for the minority. He asked the Government for some better answer than the Attorney General had given. They, for their part, said that these were provisions that they were willing to go to the civilised world upon. They might go to the case of America.

Sir H. James

They knew that the American people were willing to see Home Rule adopted. But they could tell the American people that the Irish Parliament was to have powers which no American State was permitted to possess. The Government told them that they were giving them the same Constitution as was possessed by the American people. He could only say that if they were turning out a Constitution for the people of Ulster he would welcome some such provision as this. There was nothing humiliating in striking out of a Bill powers of the kind against which the Amendment was directed. If it was humiliating to the Irish people it must also be humiliating to every State of the American Union. It was because they meant to exercise these powers that they wanted the provisions retained in the Bill. The Member for North Kerry, in dealing with the subject of ex post facto laws, said it would be extremely unlikely that there would be no process of the sort. What could the Members of that House suppose the people of this country would do where they received such a warning? Ought they not to be ready? The present Government, and any Government of Great Britain, would have to frame a Constitution very different from this before they could honestly ask any free people to accept it, or to acknowledge any obligations under it. He had looked through some recent cases in the American books, and he found that down to comparatively recent years every one of these provisions had been used for the protection of the subject. Since the American Civil War, however, special laws had been declared unconstitutional because they suspended habeas corpus. They had from American experience the fact that in that free country Governments and Parliaments and Constitutions in moments of excitement might pass laws of this kind; and it was, therefore, no insult to the Irish Legislature to say that they might be carried away in the same manner. He deeply regretted that the Government would not accept his Amendment. Indeed, he was very much surprised that hon. Gentlemen below the Gangway had not welcomed it, and that the hon. Member (Mr. Blake), who had experience of the Canadian Legislature, had not come forward and asked the Government to accept it. He believed they would remove one discreditable stain upon the measure if they acceded to that Amendment. At any rate, he and his friends would go with the country; and, as Irish Unionists and Members of a minority in Ireland and a majority in England, they would believe that the Government, by refusing this Amendment, and by the language with which they had accompanied that refusal, had given them deliberate notice that this was a Bill for the suppression of the liberties of the minority.

Question put.

The House divided:—Ayes 122; Noes 166.—(Division List, No. 277.)

MR. BYRNE (Essex, Walthamstow) moved an Amendment to add the following to the restrictions on the powers of the Irish Legislature embodied in Clause 4:—

“(6.) Whereby any special rights, powers, privileges, or immunities now possessed or enjoyed by Judges, jurors, witnesses, and officers concerned or engaged in the administration or execution of the law may be prejudicially affected; or.”

He said, this was an important matter affecting the Judiciary proposed to be set up in Ireland, and which had been hitherto left entirely without discussion. To his mind, the question of the rights and privileges of those concerned in the administration of the law were only second in importance—if, indeed, second—to the powers of the Executive itself. The object of his Amendment was to preserve to the class of persons he had mentioned those rights and privileges and immunities which had assisted to make the Judiciary hitherto existing in Great Britain and Ireland so strong and so universally respected. Whatever might be thought of the necessity or propriety of this proposal, he thought all would agree that one of the most important things was to have an absolutely independent Judiciary—he meant Judges who could not be touched by the Executive—Judges who were beyond the powers of those who had to administer Executive functions in the House. There could be no greater or better protection for minorities, or a greater safeguard for minorities, than the absolute independence and absolute freedom from risk on the part of those who administered the law. He could, in a very few words, illustrate the nature of those rights, privileges, and immunities which he desired to be preserved, and to be dealt with by the Imperial Legislature if at all. Some of these rights had grown up without Statute Law. Others depended upon Statute Law, and he thought no man in that House could get up and say positively what were the exact limitations of these rights and privileges. He could only give a reference or two—first, with reference to the Judges. At the present moment Judges had absolute immunity in respect of all they might say in the course of their duty; and it was a principle of our law that no action would lie against a Judge of the Superior Courts for a judicial act, though it might be alleged to have been done maliciously and corruptly. The public were deeply interested in this rule, which existed for their benefit, and especially in securing the independence of Judges and preventing their being harassed by vexatious actions. He did not anticipate, and he would not be so false to his own profession as to think, that their successors would be degenerate men. He had the highest respect for the Irish Bench and Bar, and he had no reason to suppose that they would not endeavour to preserve their independence; but if they once removed these safeguards, which had rendered them independent, and so rendered them dependent upon the Government for the time being, they would be taking the first step towards bringing matters to a different pass. So long as a Judge knew that he was not liable to dismissal or reproof, he cared not what winds blew round him. He knew that what he had to do was to do his duty straightforwardly, and nobody could touch him. Was it certain that this would be the case in a country which had been so troubled as Ireland, and where there would, no doubt, be troubles in time to come? He hoped their fears might be falsified; but they would not be dealing justly if they allowed the rights of the Judges to be attacked and abolished at the instance of those who, in times past, had often spoken in improper terms of the Judges. What state of affairs would be brought about if an Act were to be passed which would allow an action to be brought against a Judge for something he had said in course of his Charge to the jury, or in course of summing up? He had heard words made use of in that House which made him believe that actions would be brought. The Judges had now power to preserve order in their Courts. What was to become of order if that power should be taken away? He asked the House, therefore, to reserve this power to the Imperial Parliament. Nor would the matter be less grave when they came to deal with the case of juries. To threaten or assault a juror for his verdict was high misprision and contempt, punishable by fine and imprisonment. Was it impossible that if jurors gave offence in Ireland they might suffer some persecution, and be subjected to some threats for what they had done in the course of their duty? Then with reference to witnesses. At the present moment witnesses were not required to answer questions which might incriminate them, and they were not liable to answer questions which might tend to show the channels through which information had been given to officers of justice in criminal prosecutions. Was it not possible that that privilege might be taken away from witnesses in the future? Had they not heard of attempts made again and again in Courts of Justice, even as the law stood, to get from witnesses whence they had had their information? This power was, therefore, of the highest importance, and ought to be reserved to the Imperial Parliament. At present officers were compelled to disclose matters of State, the publication of which might prejudice the community. That surely was another of the things that should be preserved. He passed by Magistrates, Sheriffs, and other officers concerned in the administration of justice, and came to the Constabulary, in respect to whom there was special legislation now existing in Ireland. He appealed to the House to continue to the Constabulary, so long as they should exist, that protection which had hitherto been considered necessary for them. It was provided that no action could be sustained against a constable for any act done in obedience to a warrant of a Magistrate, and that he should not be held responsible for any irregularity in the warrant, or for the want of jurisdiction in the Magistrate who signed it. He had heard observations made in the House which showed that actions against constables in connection with irregularities in warrants would be possible in Ireland, and, therefore, it was most essential that this right of constables should be preserved in the future. He would anticipate two things that might be urged against his Amendment. In the first place, it might be said that the Amendment did not give sufficient trust to this Irish Legislature, upon whom they were conferring great powers. That argument had had a much greater effect before they knew what Clause 9 was going to be. But now they were to have 80 Members at Westminster, who would have power not only over Irish local affairs, but also over Imperial affairs, amongst which might very properly be included the matters referred to in his Amendment. The Prime Minister, in a speech at Edinburgh, in which he foreshadowed the Home Rule Bill, had said that every safeguard for the minority would be introduced into the Bill. Some safeguards the Government had given; some they had refused; but they should, at least, reserve a safeguard for those who could not protect themselves, and who, by virtue of their respective offices, were open to the most villainous and the wickedest attacks from all those who hated order and desired disorder to reign. It might be said, also, that the words of his Amendment were too large. He thought that as the Amendment was phrased it was perfectly clear; but he would not object to the introduction of words which would make its meaning clearer.

Amendment proposed,

In page 3, line 12, after the word "or," to insert the words—" (6) Whereby any special rights, powers, privileges, or immunities now possessed or enjoyed by Judges, jurors, witnesses, and officers concerned or engaged in the administration or execution of the law may be prejudicially affected."—(Mr. Byrne.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL (Sir J. RIGBY, Forfar): In the latter part of his address my hon. and learned Friend has accurately foreseen certain of the answers that would be made to his Amendment. First of all, these words are undoubtedly wide; and my hon. and learned Friend very properly admitted that it would not be at all within the power of any lawyer to define the extent to which they would go.

MR. BYRNE: I said it would be difficult to enumerate them.

SIR J. RIGBY: That is much stronger. You say there are so many powers, immunities, and privileges, that no lawyer could be expected, except he spent a great deal of time in studying them, to enumerate them. A very good reason why you should not, by a sweeping clause of this kind, deal with so many questions that you cannot even enumerate them. Then it was said that we would bring forward an argument which is none the worse for being repeated, which if sound in one case is sound in all these cases, and which we are not to be prevented from using simply because the Mover of an Amendment sees that it is appropriate to his case. I do say that it is a very serious objection to this Amendment that it is only one part of a very great structure—one brick, as it were. What my hon. and learned Friend wants is that we who have devised the Bill, and are supporting the Bill as a reasonable and logical Bill, should insert in it these fragments of law, picked up at random from a measure here and a measure there, taking away from the Legislature we are creating powers even smaller than those which would be left to them, even if these particular measures had been dealt with. I have no doubt that there are hundreds of other cases in which, if you admit the theory that the Legislature was unfit to legislate, you might propose Amendments as reasonable as the present. Of course, if we admitted, in a single case of this kind, where the elementary ideas of justice are concerned, that the Irish Legislature is unfit to legislate, we should be condemning our own Bill, and that we are not inclined to do. I agree that to maintain the position of the Judges is important; that the administration of justice is important; that the protection of witnesses and officers of the law is important; that, in fact, there is scarcely any part of the Constitution that does not contain matters that are of importance, and it is really too much to expect that we should include in a Bill like the present side issues of this kind, in regard to which, if we admitted them, the discussions on the Bill would never come to an end. Great as is the importance of the position of the Judges and the position of juries, it cannot be said that legislation dealing with them is either so important, or so delicate, or so open to misconstruction, or so open to temptation, as in the case of the Amendment with which we have last dealt—namely, that of the law of habeas corpus. It would be idle for us to say that we intend to entrust the Irish Legislature with that most important and delicate part of legislation which must necessarily be used, or will be most likely used, under circumstances of great difficulty and temptation, and then to say that we cannot trust them to deal with legislation in regard to Judges of the ordinary Courts of Justice. During the Debates on this Bill we have successively rejected Amendments withdrawing from the cognisance of the Irish Legislature the whole criminal law and procedure and the whole criminal administration. Here we are dealing with the question of the status and procedure of the Courts, and if we admitted words of this sweeping character into the Bill we would be laying traps for the Irish Legislature in regard to matters in which they would be acting in perfect good faith and in perfect innocence; and it is not rational and it is not wise to attempt to surround this Legislature, to whom we intend to entrust great powers, such minute swaddling-bands as are suggested in this Amendment. I have already said, in answer to an Amendment brought forward in Committee, that if we were to proceed on the scale indicated by that Amendment our Bill would soon fill out to the extent of Stephen's Commentaries. We cannot now accept this Amendment, not because we think the matter of small importance, but because we think it inconsistent with the general framework of the Bill, and because it aims at depriving the Irish Legislature of any sort of control over matters of the utmost importance to the peace, order, and good government of Ireland.

MR. RENTOUL said, the Solicitor General, on behalf of the Government, who founded an answer to his hon. and learned Friend who moved this Amendment with regard to the carrying out of the law in Ireland, was certainly vague enough in his remarks, and certainly as unsatisfactory to them in the answer he gave as he could possibly be. The Solicitor General said the words of the Amendment were very wide, and the reason why he considered the words were very wide was that the Mover of the Amendment said he could not enumerate the various Acts of Parliament and the various laws at present in existence which bear on the persons who were enumerated or contained in the Amendment. But if that was a reason why the Solicitor General should not accept the Amendment, then, if he turned to the Bill of the Government and to the 3rd clause, to the subjects that were taken away from the cognisance of the Irish Parliament, he would find, for example, in Section 3, Sub-section 1, the Crown, or the succession to the Crown, or a Regency, or the Lord Lieutenant, as Representative of the Crown—

Notice taken, that 40 Members were not present; House counted, and 40 Members being found present,

MR. RENTOUL proceeded. He said, the Acts of Parliament bearing on the very first sub-section of Clause 3 of this Bill themselves were covered by perhaps some hundreds of Acts of Parliament, and so with regard to several other excepted matters under this 3rd clause—the Army, Navy, Militia, and Volunteers, Treaties with Foreign States, and so forth; treason, treason-felony, alienage. All these things were subjects of an enormous mass of legislation that made up the Statute Book of this Empire. If the functions of the Courts and jurors, and witnesses, and those connected with the administration of law in the Courts—if their functions were the subject of large numbers of Acts of Parliament, and that was the reason why the Amendment of his hon. Friend should not be accepted, it was a strong and important reason why the whole of the exception under Clause 3 of this Bill should be entirely withdrawn. But the Solicitor General said that was only one part of the legal system which the hon. and learned Member for Essex (Mr. Byrne) had brought forward; and if the hon. and learned Gentleman the Solicitor General had applied his mind to this matter, he would have found that there were 999 other matters of equal importance and equally subject to amendment. But that was exactly what they said; they agreed with the Solicitor General entirely on that point, that there were 999 matters or 9,999 matters in this Bill that ought to be left out from their point of view. The Solicitor General taunted them with having tried a little while ago to take away the whole Criminal Jurisprudence from the cognisance of the Irish Legislature. They tried to take away the whole of the Criminal Law altogether from the Irish Legislature; they tried to prevent them passing any criminal enactments, or having any power over the administration of the Criminal Law; and having failed in these objects, as a last resort they came up and played their last card, as it were, and they asked for freedom for the officials, Judges, police, and those who were carrying out the administration of the Criminal Law in Ireland. The Solicitor General said if the Government were to accept this Amendment they would be admitting that the Irish Legislature were not fit to legislate on these matters, and that it would destroy the Bill. Their (the Opposition) contention was that the Irish Legislature was an unfit Legislature, and they wanted to destroy the Bill. They wanted no such Bill at all; but if they must have one, then they wanted the Bill which had been promised before the electors of this country, and on which they should be before the country again ere it became law—namely, a Bill in which the loyal minority were properly safeguarded. The Solicitor General said it was too bad that side issues of this sort should be brought in. The independence of the Judges of Ireland was a side issue to the Loyalists of Ireland! The independence of the whole administration of the law of the country, the safety of witnesses who did their duty, the safety of jurors who had been thoroughly and effectually intimidated in certain counties in Ireland—all this was merely a side issue! If this was a side issue, what was the main issue? It would be impossible for any issue to be put before that House of more importance to the Loyalists of Ireland if they were to live under this Irish Legislature. The Solicitor General said if the Government accepted all the Amendments the Bill would be the size of Stephen's Commentaries. If the Solicitor General undertook to do an impossible thing; if he undertook to give to Ireland a subordinate Legislature which should be co-ordinate at the same time—a dependent Legislature which should be independent at the same time, then it would require a Bill as large as Stephen's Commentaries, and a great deal more, to do that work. If the Government had failed in this matter, it was because they attempted what they themselves declared to be a thing which passed the wit of man, and which was absolutely impossible. [Sir JOHN RIGBY: No!] The Solicitor General said "No"; but with regard to what was the main provision and principle of this Bill—the position of the Irish Members in that House—it was declared to be a thing that passed the wit of man to have them there, and, at the same time, to safeguard the independence of this Parliament and leave it free for the people of this country. He was sure the Solicitor General would admit there was no class of men who should be more entirely above hope and fear than the Judges of the land. Let them imagine the Irish Legislature had the power to remove a Judge, according to Clause 23 of the Bill, on an Address presented by the two Houses of the Irish Legislature. These two Houses would be composed of a majority of Nationalists, who had denounced the Irish Judges in all the moods and tenses in that House; and was it wise to have these Judges in any risk whatever of being under the power of those gentlemen? As to the jurors, look at the unfortunate position in which they had been placed, and the number of instances which had been brought before that House of jurors being unable to do their duty owing to the state of intimidation in which they lived. Was it not well to try and tie the hands of the Irish Legislature, the Members of which would be returned by the electors who intimidated the jurors in Ireland? Was it not well that every possible safeguard should be applied to these jurors, in order that they might feel they could conscientiously fulfil their duties, as he believed they would desire conscientiously to do? As to witnesses, they might be required by a rule or law of the Irish Legislature to answer questions which would criminate themselves. They might be asked also to disclose the source of their information. It might be made a rule of the Irish Courts under the Irish Legislature that methods could be applied to witnesses in cross-examination that could not possibly be applied to witnesses in cross-examination in this country. He was sure the Solicitor General would say that the more independent the Judges, jurors, and witnesses were, the better it would be for the administration of justice in any country. [Sir J. RIGBY assented.] The Solicitor General assented to the proposition; and, that being so, was it not well to try and safeguard these persons in this Imperial Parliament, when there were several hundred Members entirely free from influences that were likely to act—and especially to act at first—on an Irish Parliament? They all knew perfectly well how Members of Parliament were, more or less, in the power of their constituents; and if these constituents were working in one particular way, and were making statements in one particular direction, how could Members who represented these constituencies do otherwise than go in the same direction? Surely, after the denunciations that had been hurled against the Judges, the Constabulary, and witnesses in Ireland for doing their duty, it was their duty in that House to see if it were possible to put in safeguards of this sort, which would be a real, substantial, and gratifying thing to the minority in Ireland. The Government desired that this Bill should be accepted with contentment by the whole Irish people. The Nationalist Members in this Bill had got a great deal of their own way. A large number of their demands had been satisfied to the full; and if there was to be any reconciliation between the Nationalists and Unionists in the acceptance of this Bill by the latter, was it not necessary that something should be done to meet them, and was there one thing that could be done which was more likely to be gratifying to the entire Unionist population of Ireland than if this Amendment were accepted? There was not an Amendment which had been moved to the Bill which would be received with a greater gratification and sense of security by the Unionists of Ireland than this Amendment, which he hoped would, therefore, be accepted by the Government.

Question put, and negatived.

MR. RENTOUL moved the following Amendment to Sub-clause (7): "Whereby the Law of Conspiracy may be altered." He said, that certainly the Irish Legislature, from one point of view, would be a Legislature that was eminently qualified to deal with conspiracy, because the Prime Minister had himself in that House on many occasions pointed out what splendid adepts those who were likely to form the Irish Parliament of the future were in this matter of conspiracy. They all knew that criminal conspiracies in Ireland had flourished to a very extreme degree; and when this matter was before the House on the Committee stage, the Chief Secretary said that nobody could devise a surer means of producing friction than if this Amendment were received. But if there was no desire to tamper with the Law of Conspiracy—if the Irish Legislature were desirous of keeping the Law of Conspiracy in Ireland in the same position as it stood here there could be no possible friction. If there was a clause put in this Bill preventing them touching the Law of Conspiracy, which governed the entire United Kingdom at the present time, why should they feel any friction? A very small change in the Law of Conspiracy as it at present existed would take away the entire chance from the Irish landlords of getting any rent at all. Allow conspiracies for the non-payment of rent to be rampant in Ireland; allow them to exist without any restraint whatever, and the chances of the landlord getting his rent would be as small as when the Chancellor of the Duchy spoke of it and said that in such a case the Irish landlord might whistle for his rent. The Irish Government would be made up, to a large extent, of Members who had been found guilty of conspiracy by the Parnell Commission. Surely the Law of Conspiracy was not an Irish matter, because one of the most fruitful sources of conspiracy might be a conspiracy affecting Great Britain, and which, from Great Britain's point of view, would not be an Irish affair. Was boycotting to be illegal in Ireland? Did the present Government desire that boycotting, which was illegal at the present time, should continue to be illegal in Ireland? If they did, did they believe for one single moment that any Irish Parliament would be strong enough—even if they desired—to pass a law declaring boycotting to be an illegal conspiracy? He could imagine that if they passed a law to the effect that boycotting was to be prosecuted as a criminal offence many Members would lose their seats in the South and West. The history of the Land Question had been a history of conspiracy for the last 10 or 15 years. It was by means of illegal conspiracy that the whole land battle had been fought. One prominent Member had said that if they were deprived of this weapon they would be deprived of means of fighting the battle at all. The future legislators of Ireland had been imprisoned for indulging in criminal conspiracy. They were declared by the Prime Minister to be members of a criminal combination, whose footsteps were dogged by crime. "Crime," said the Prime Minister, "dogged the footsteps of the Land League." The Land League was a criminal conspiracy by the law of this country; but what Member of an Irish Parliament would dare to rise in his place and propose that the Land League should be declared to be an illegal conspiracy and its members imprisoned? They (the Opposition) were sometimes accused of quoting old statements. For his part, he never quoted a single statement, old or new, if that statement had been withdrawn. The Prime Minister, however, had never withdrawn the statement that crime dogged the footsteps of the Land League. On one occasion he (Mr. Rentoul) made a quotation from a statement attributed to Mr. Davitt. Mr. Davitt afterwards met him and told him the statement was not accurate, and he (Mr. Rentoul) accordingly got the editor to withdraw the reference from the report of his speech in the official report. This statement of the Prime Minister, as he had said, had not been withdrawn. If these future Irish legislators had been members of that criminal conspiracy, what would be their views as regarded criminal conspiracy when they legislated for the people of Ireland? "Fellow-feeling makes us wondrous kind," and it was very unlikely these gentlemen who had indulged in this pastime would be very desirous of maintaining the law as it at present stood, and as it ought to be maintained, with regard to criminal conspiracy. There had been other conspiracies besides agrarian. In all sorts of ways the Irish people had shown themselves in the past very powerful; and now it was proposed to submit the Unionist minority in Ireland to those who had been members of these conspiracies in the past. The Prime Minister's one answer to almost all the Amendments was that he trusted the Nationalists. But the Prime Minister, more than any other man, was the one who taught them in the past seven or eight years to distrust the Nationalists, and all the strong statements of distrust were those which were made by the Prime Minister. The Parnell Commission, in one of their findings, said—

"The leaders of the Land League who combined to carry out a system of boycotting were guilty of criminal conspiracy, one of the objects of which was, by a system of coercion and intimidation, to promote an agrarian agitation against the payment of rent."

Was it any wonder, then, that the landlords of Ireland should have been so anxious in regard to having some safeguard applied to them? The Parnell Commission further found that the criminal conspiracy which these gentlemen were leading existed for the purpose of expelling landlords altogether from Ireland, and these very gentlemen were those who said if they gave up these methods they might give up the battle altogether. Seeing that the Law of Criminal Conspiracy was a law of great importance, which had been a subject of gradual growth through three stages in the development of the jurisprudence of this country, and seeing that it was a law very likely to be altered in Ireland, it was surely right that this matter should be kept in the hands of the Imperial Parliament, so that those who represented English, Welsh, and Scotch constituencies, who were impartial and who were away from Irish influences, should hold this matter in their control and should declare that the Law of Criminal Conspiracy should not be altered by the Irish Parliament, and that when any alteration were made it should be trusted to Members of the Imperial Parliament and not to those who had certainly one qualification for dealing with the Law of Conspiracy—namely, that they themselves had been largely engaged in the matter of conspiracy. He begged to move the Amendment.

Amendment proposed,

In page 3, line 12, after the word "or," to insert the words "(6) Whereby the Law of Conspiracy may be altered; or." — (Mr. Rentoul.)

Question, "That those words be there inserted," put, and negatived.

MR. J. MORLEY moved the following Amendment:—Page 3, line 14, leave out from "Parliament," to "may," in line 16.

Amendment agreed to.

The following Amendment also stood on the Paper in the name of Mr. J. MORLEY:—

Page 3, line 21, after the word "precedents," to insert the words "and so far as respects property without just compensation: Provided that nothing in this sub-section shall prevent the Irish Legislature from dealing with any Public Department, Municipal Corporation, or Local Authority."

MR. J. MORLEY moved the Amendment as it stood on the Paper, with the addition of the following words:—

"Or of any Corporation administering Public Funds so far as concerns such funds."

He said, the additional words referred to certain Bodies which had to administer Public Funds—such Bodies, for instance, as the Royal Dublin Society, which received a grant of £5,000 a year for improving the breed of horses, and, therefore, to that extent, administered a Public Fund. He proposed that nothing in this sub-section should prevent the Irish Legislature from dealing with any Corporation of that kind administering a Public Fund in that way so far as concerned the administration of such fund. He begged to move the Amendment.

Amendment proposed,

In page 3, line 21, after the word "precedents," to insert the words "and so far as respects property without just compensation: Provided that nothing in this sub-section shall prevent the Irish Legislature from dealing with any Public Department, Municipal Corporation, or Local Authority, or with any Corporation administering Public Funds so far as concerns such funds."—(Mr. J. Morley.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

MR. BARTLEY (Islington, N.) said, the right hon. Gentleman had referred to the grant of £5,000 to the Royal Dublin Society for horse breeding. He would point out that the Royal Dublin Society had, in addition to the grant of £5,000, the administration of large funds which were applied for other purposes than horse breeding. He would like to know whether this clause would safeguard those other funds? The Royal Dublin Society had been in existence for a very long time, and they should understand distinctly whether the whole of their funds were to be safeguarded, or only the portion derived from Public Funds for one purpose?

MR. J. MORLEY said, whatever could be defined as "Public Funds" would be within the purview of the Amendment.

SIR J. GORST said, that, of course, raised the question as to what were Public Funds. If by Public Funds the right hon. Gentleman meant funds derived from the Consolidated Fund in Ireland it would be better to say so.

MR. J. MORLEY: It is not necessary.

SIR J. GORST said, it would be necessary if this Bill was passed. The fund for horse breeding, which at present was paid out of the Consolidated Fund of the United Kingdom, would, if this Bill passed, be paid out of the public taxation of Ireland—

MR. J. MORLEY: The Votes of Parliament.

SIR J. GORST said, when this Bill became law, the funds would be derived from the taxation of Ireland.

MR. J. MORLEY: Yes.

SIR J. GORST said, if that were so, the fact might give the Irish Legislature power, in respect of that fund, to deal with the Society. But would "Public Funds" have no other meaning? Funds might be derived from endowments or manufactures, or in the same way in which Public Funds were dealt with by the Church of England. Was it not a fact that endowments from the public might give the Irish Parliament power to deal with this Society? Seeing that the words might give those powers, it appeared to him that they required further consideration.

MR. SEXTON said, the sub-section as it stood in the Bill was a formidable instrument—one of a very generous scope, and it was hard just at present to say or determine the force with which it would operate. They discussed the matter under somewhat unfavourable circumstances in Committee, and it was suggested that the sub-section should be drawn so as to show what Corporations were to be excluded from the domestic Legislature. It was believed that would be satisfactory to all the interests concerned. As it stood, the sub-section proceeded on general lines—there was no enumeration, and he confessed he felt great difficulty in determining what Corporations would be subject to the ordinary control of the Irish Legislature, and what Corporations would be subject to the special procedure provided in the sub-section. Practically, every Corporation which was within the sub-section would be subject to Imperial control. The Irish Legislature would, therefore, be unable to proceed in the ordinary way; they would have to get the consent of the Corporation, and afterwards Addresses of the two Chambers, and then the Assent of Her Majesty—that was, the Imperial Government. If the word “property” only had been mentioned, he should at once have conceded that the property of existing Corporations ought not to be dealt with except as provided in the sub-section; but “rights and privileges” were also referred to in connection with Corporations existing in the country, and thus a question of the widest scope and of the first importance was raised. He would ask the Solicitor General (Sir J. Rigby), if he took part in the Debate, to give the House a definition of “Corporation” as dealt with in the clause. “By Royal Charter or by local or general Act of Parliament”—that meant every Corporation or Institution that could possibly exist. It included all the great Institutions in Ireland, and he suspected that it included Railway, Gas, and Water Companies, and Chartered Companies at large. If so, such Bodies as the Trustees of the squares in Dublin and of Nelson’s Pillar, which were incorporated by local Act of Parliament, could not be dealt with by the Irish Parliament—their rights and privileges could not be interfered with—without the consent of the Imperial Parliament. In the case of local Acts, they had the Railway and Gas Companies established under them; and if the Municipalities of Dublin, Belfast, or Waterford desired, for the good of the citizens, to acquire the control of such companies, he thought they could not be dealt with without their consent, or without the Address of the two Houses and the leave of the Imperial Government. The condition of the railways in Ireland was one of the most grievous of the minor questions. The Directors did not even act wisely in their own interests. The general result would be better if there was power to deal with rates and charges, which, if they were all agreed, were too high. To levy fares and rates was one of the rights and privileges of a Railway Company; but if the Irish Legislature could not revise such fares or rates without the leave of the Imperial Parliament that certainly seemed to him to contravene the idea of autonomy. Again, there was an almost universal desire in Ireland that the railways should be consolidated. Some of them even thought they should be managed by the State. So long ago as 1848 a Conservative nobleman in this House proposed that £16,000,000 should be granted for the purpose of purchasing the Irish railways. Would it be possible for the Irish Parliament to pass a law to consolidate these railways, or to have them worked by the State—would it be possible to pass a law affecting the rights and privileges of the Railway Companies without the leave of the Imperial Parliament? He hesitated to think that the Government intended to exclude the ordinary Commercial Companies from the Irish Legislature. Dealings with Public Companies were a matter of Private Bill legislation, and he would be surprised to hear that matters of that kind were excluded from the Parliament of Ireland. The right hon. Gentleman proposed that Local Authorities should be subject to the Irish Parliament, but there was in the Bill no definition of “Local Authorities”; and the phrase might cover the Municipal Corporations, the Grand Juries, Boards of Guardians, Harbour Boards, Water Boards, Joint Sanitary Boards, Drainage Boards, and Burial Boards. He would be sorry to pin his faith to any Amendment that provided that those Bodies should not be subject to the Irish Legislature. The right hon. Gentleman now proposed to strike out words which he (Mr. Sexton) thought were valuable. He had expressed that opinion in Committee. The effect of striking out the words which the right hon. Gentleman proposed to strike out would be that even though the Corporation might not be a Public Department which administered funds, raised either locally or from the nation, it would be excluded from the Irish Legislature.

It was proposed at the end to insert words to the effect that nothing in the sub-section should prevent the Irish Parliament dealing with any Public Department, Municipal Corporations, or Local Authorities, or any Corporation administering public funds so far as concerned such funds. He admitted that these words went far to limit his objection to his Amendment; but he would prefer that the clause should be allowed to stand as it was, because, if amended as proposed, it would only give them control of funds raised from the public. Beyond those funds Parliament would have no control over the action of any Corporation. His chief concern was as to the general character of the clause—

MR. BARTLEY rose to a point of Order. Did he understand that they were now discussing, not the clause, but an Amendment?

*MR. SPEAKER: The discussion is upon the words suggested to be added to the clause.

MR. BARTLEY: At the end, Sir?

MR. SPEAKER: At the end. The words are—“Provided that nothing in this sub-section shall prevent the Irish Legislature from dealing with any Public Department, Municipal Corporation, or Local Authority, or with any Corporation administering Public Funds, so far as concerns such funds.”

MR. SEXTON said, if the hon. Member (Mr. Bartley) would not let his zeal outrun his discretion he might see that it was perfectly possible for him to argue the clause at large. He hoped that was quite satisfactory to the hon. Member. He had only to add that the question he had raised was one which the Government should reconsider. They should like to have the definition of “Public Authority,” and whether they were to have supervision of railways, and whether Commercial Companies were to be excluded? He trusted the right hon. Gentleman would give him an assurance upon these points.

MR. CARSON (Dublin University) said, on his side of the House they had considerable grounds for complaint of the way in which the Chief Secretary had brought forward this Amendment. It was supposed to carry out an undertaking that was given in Committee to put some common sense into the 6th sub-section. The Chief Secretary had sufficient time for placing his Amendment on the Paper; but what had he done? At the very last moment—in the dinner-hour—he had got up and proposed an Amendment in terms which might vitally change the whole meaning of the sub-section. He did that in the most casual way, and without argument or explanation. There could be little doubt that the explanation would be found in the fact that the hon. Member for North Kerry (Mr. Sexton) was not satisfied with the Amendment as it stood, and so, after a brief consultation, the right hon. Gentleman agreed to bring forward an addition to it.

MR. SEXTON: The hon. and learned Gentleman is quite wrong in supposing I had any consultation on the subject with the right hon. Gentleman. I had no consultation with him at all.

MR. CARSON said, he accepted the assurance of the hon. Member for Kerry. But here they were at the eleventh or twelfth hour, an Amendment being brought forward which would, he said, create confusion to the 6th sub-section. Having regard to what had passed in Committee the other night as to Trinity College, he could not but regard the action of the Chief Secretary as almost amounting to a breach of faith. Examining the matter as it stood, he found that there were at present two methods by which the Irish Legislature could deal with Corporations in any way they pleased; not only that, but they had a third method, by “due process of law.” Now it was proposed to exempt from the purview of the sub-section all cases of Public Funds, which meant funds belonging to Public Bodies—Municipal Corporations and other Bodies.

MR. J. MORLEY: No, no!

MR. CARSON said, in that case what was the argument? They had not even a copy of the Amendment so that they could see its wording, but he had endeavoured to take its meaning as best he could. The Chief Secretary got up in his most innocent mood, which always made the Opposition suspicious, and moved this Amendment. He should like to know what were the Public Funds to which the Amendment referred?

MR. J. MORLEY: The Amendment affects the administration of Public Funds “so far as concerns such funds.”

Mr. Sexton

MR. CARSON said, he would like to know what funds were alluded to. What was meant by "Public Fund"? Did that mean funds voted annually by the House of Commons?

MR. J. MORLEY: I define Public Funds as funds raised by taxation, or arising from property belonging to the estate.

MR. CARSON: What estate?

MR. J. MORLEY: Of any Municipal Corporation.

MR. CARSON said, the Chief Secretary did not say so in the Amendment. The words were "any Corporation administering Public Funds." That did not mean "Municipal Corporation." To take the very instance the right hon. Gentleman gave, the Dublin Society was not a Municipal Corporation. It showed the vast inconvenience of the situation that the right hon. Gentleman did not take the trouble to define in the Amendment what were the Corporations and what were the Public Funds aimed at. As the Amendment stood, every one of the endowments of Trinity College would come directly within the purview of the proposal except the private endowments.

An hon. MEMBER: It has an estate.

MR. CARSON said, yes; it certainly had an estate granted by the Crown. Was it meant to capture these endowments? If the Irish Legislature could deal with Municipal Corporations, surely they could deal with the funds of Municipal Corporations. Surely the Amendment was either unnecessary, or it went far and away beyond the words the right hon. Gentleman had thrown out since he (Mr. Carson) had commenced to speak. He would suggest to him that, so far as these were matters of Revenue raised by public taxation, the Irish Parliament would have complete control over their own powers of taxation. Therefore, the Government could not mean Municipal Corporations, or the funds of those Corporations, or any of the taxation over which the Parliament would have complete control. The matter required some elucidation; they should know what the Government were driving at. They should not have matters of such far-reaching consequence brought forward in this manner. There was one other observation he wished to make. The Chief Secretary said the Irish Legislature were to have power to deal with voluntary Corporations, such as the Royal Dublin Society, so far as they received Public Funds. Did that mean that they were to have power, so far as these particular funds were concerned, to alter the whole foundation and constitution of the Society? Did the words "so far as concern such funds" mean the granting of the funds?

MR. J. MORLEY: No.

MR. CARSON said, the right hon. Gentleman answered "No." What, then, was meant? Was it the administration of the funds?

MR. J. MORLEY: Yes, the administration of the funds.

MR. CARSON said, that if they were to interfere with the administration of the funds of the Royal Dublin Society they would go to the whole root of the administration of that Institution. The Irish Executive would have the power of appointing the persons who would be able to interfere with the whole Corporation. Having regard to the fact that this matter had already been discussed in Committee, that the Amendment was put down several days ago, and that the Irish Legislature had very slight restrictions put upon them by the sub-section, he must say that it was treating the House in a most extraordinary manner to spring this proposal upon it at the eleventh hour in this perfunctory manner.

SIR J. RIGBY said, he did not think there was much mystery about the Amendment. Long ago the Government pointed out at what they were aiming in the exceptions from this clause, although the words were not absolutely conclusive in their meaning. The general purport of the clause was that existing Corporations were not to be interfered with. But, obviously, that went too far, because there were many existing Corporations which had no sort of independent status or authority, and which were Governing Bodies. Of course, as regarded these, it was not intended that they should be in any wise independent of, or superior to, the Legislative Body. The words introduced would have the effect of preventing these Bodies from raising money by way of taxation and of administering such money. The Government had promised to take into consideration a better way of bringing about that effect. They set about considering how they could do it, and they concluded they had better omit words from the clause, and effect their purpose by a Proviso, because it would then show that the sub-section had nothing to do with that class of Corporation. When the words of the Proviso were put on the Paper, they thought they had secured their object by referring to a Public Department of the Government Municipal Corporations and Local Authorities. There was nothing more remarkable about it or mysterious than this: that on reconsideration they concluded that there were other Corporations which were within the meaning of the words already in the clause; and then it was suggested that wherever there were Corporations dealing with Public Funds, the control to the extent of those funds should be with the Irish Legislature. His hon. and learned Friend asked, what were Public Funds? Was that his mysterious matter? What was meant was, whatever could fairly be described as Public Funds should be within the control of the Irish Legislature.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: What are Public Funds?

SIR J. RIGBY said, the Government meant by "Public Funds" whatever could be fairly and properly described as Public Funds. They had taken words corresponding with words already contained in the sub-section, words which were intended to have a wide effect. He could not give a full account of what could properly and fairly be called Public Funds, because he did not know. He could not undertake to go into the case of every Corporation. A great many of them were unknown to him; but he did say that they were on safe grounds when they divided Public from Private Funds. He did not fear for the result. [Laughter.] The result would work itself out. Wherever there was a Public Fund they must be prepared for it being under the control of the Irish Legislature, and wherever there was a Private Fund they might rest assured that it would not be under such control.

*MR. D. PLUNKET (Dublin University) said, that perhaps someone on the Treasury Bench would answer the specific question of his hon. and learned Colleague (Mr. Carson) as to whether the new addition now proposed to the sub-section would affect such property as that of the Royal Dublin Society and of Trinity College. The only answer they had got to that was that these words were to have a wide effect and extent. Over and over again the property of Trinity College, Dublin, had been spoken of by Irish Members and others as public property, in the sense that it was property conferred by the Crown. The hon. and learned Solicitor General was challenged to give an answer of any kind. If they were to understand from the right hon. Gentleman's silence, and from the words he had used as to the wide extent and effect of the Proviso that the Irish Legislature would control Corporations with Public Funds, so far as those Public Funds were concerned, then they wanted to know whether the words proposed applied, or were intended to apply, to such Corporations as Trinity College and the Royal Dublin Society? If that was the intention, the effect of these additional words suddenly sprung upon the House would be to repeal the whole of the protection so long offered and so much relied upon in former discussions. [Mr. J. MORLEY dissented.] He understood from the gestures of the Chief Secretary that the words were not intended to have that effect. Then, would the right hon. Gentleman be good enough to give them some kind of definition of what "Public Funds" were supposed to be? The House had a right to know what was intended by the words before it accepted them.

MR. J. MORLEY said, the Government certainly did not intend by the words to include Trinity College, and as to the Royal Dublin Society hon. Members had not understood what he had said. The Royal Dublin Society at this moment received a grant of £5,000 under the Act of 1888. That they called Public Funds, and as the administrator of such funds the Society would be under the control of the Irish Legislature.

MR. DARLING (Deptford) said, he could not help thinking that the explanation of the Solicitor General had not conveyed as much to the Opposition side of the House as might have been expected; and he rose to supply an omission in the speech of the hon. and learned Gentleman. When the hon. and learned Gentleman said that that was public which could properly be so called he was using vague and inconclusive language. The hon. and learned Gentleman had been thinking of a maxim with which he was familiar in the Court of Chancery—namely, “that is certain which can be rendered certain.” No doubt the hon. and learned Gentleman meant that that was public property which by Act of the Irish Legislature could be rendered public property. They would only have to pass an Act of Parliament saying that which was private was public in order to render it so, just as that which was uncertain became certain by a decision of the Court of Chancery. “That is public which can properly be so called” said the Solicitor General; but who was to decide what could properly be called public property? The Irish Parliament could pass an Act making that which formerly was private property public property, and the Bill contained no provision by which anyone could decide whether the Irish Parliament used its powers properly or not. The Irish Legislature might make use of idioms that were not recognised in this Parliament. They might do that with regard to property. He hoped the Attorney General, or some other Member of the Government, would give some indication of what was meant by public property, in order that the House and those who had to construe the Act might know what was meant.

*SIR T. LEA (Londonderry, S.) said, that if hon. and learned Gentlemen had failed to understand the Solicitor General a layman could not be expected to do so. If they were not aware that the Chief Secretary was a man of the highest honour they would be disposed to believe he was endeavouring to obtain an advantage over the Opposition. He added words to the proposal before the House without notice or explanation. The right hon. Gentleman might have given some explanation. For once in his life he (Sir T. Lea) was in agreement with the hon. Member for North Kerry, who had said that railways ought to come under the State. A Bill to bring about the control of the Irish railways by the State would be far better worth discussing and supporting than any Home Rule scheme. Of course, Unionist Members would be suspicious of any Amendment adopted at the suggestion of the hon. Member for North Kerry. He believed the Amendment would seriously damage the prosperous Harbour Boards of Derry and Belfast; and he would, therefore, offer it an earnest and hearty opposition.

MR. TOMLINSON agreed that the obscurity of the Amendment was not cleared up by the speech of the Solicitor General. He would remind the hon. and learned Gentleman of a statement of his at an earlier stage of the Bill—that any words inserted must mean something, and what the meaning was would have to be determined by some internal authority. The only interpretation to be put upon that was that the meaning of these clauses would have to be determined by a long series of legal decisions. If the Public Funds referred to were funds to be provided by the Irish Legislature the Amendment ought to say so. He, therefore, moved to leave out “Public Funds” for the purpose of inserting “funds provided by the Irish Legislature.”

Amendment proposed to the proposed Amendment,

To leave out the words “Public Funds” in order to insert the words “funds provided by the Irish Legislature.”—(Mr. Tomlinson.)

Question proposed, “That the words ‘Public Funds’ stand part of the proposed Amendment.”

MR. GIBSON BOWLES said, the discussion showed the extreme inconvenience of dealing at this stage with matters that ought to have been dealt with in Committee, and the extreme inconvenience of the Government guillotining the Amendments. It showed, further, the inconvenience of the line pursued by the Government last night in insisting that the guillotine should be applied to the Amendments now on the Paper on Friday. Though it was decided that the Amendments of the Opposition were not worthy of being looked at it was assumed that the Amendments of the Government were perfect. But if all the Government Amendments stood as much in need of amendment as the present one, they would have made a pretty mess of their Bill. He doubted whether anyone could state from memory the effect of this Amendment sprung suddenly upon the House. It was not treating the House or the subject with proper consideration to submit an Amendment in this way within a few hours of the application of the Glad-stonian garotte. What was the origin of the Amendment to the Amendment they did not know ; but this they did know—that the hon. Member for North Kerry left his place ; that shortly afterwards the Solicitor General retired ; and that the hon. and learned Gentleman came back, like another Elisha, wearing the mantle of Elijah.

MR. SEXTON : The words were read out before the Solicitor General came back.

MR. GIBSON BOWLES said, that in that case he was wrong and Elijah still wore his mantle. He (Mr. Bowles) had risen mainly to emphasise the fact that within a few hours of the Government having declared, in effect, that their own Amendments were so perfect that they could be voted upon without discussion on Friday, they suddenly and most unexpectedly proposed an addition of a most important character to one of their Amendments. That being so, he thought the time had arrived when the Government ought to withdraw the monstrous Resolution passed last night with a view to the discussion of their own Amendments at least, if not of the Opposition.

*MR. BUTCHER (York) said, he found himself in cordial agreement with the hon. Member for North Kerry in thinking that the 6th sub-section was an ill-constructed provision. The House was to be congratulated upon the fact that, by a fortunate accident, they had the opportunity of considering the Amendment of the Government, or else this sub-section, with all its imperfections, would have been forced through the House without the opportunity for any discussion. The Solicitor General had been asked to define the important words proposed to be added to the section. What were the words ? The effect of the Chinese puzzle appeared to be that the Irish Legislature should be allowed to deal with any Corporation administering Public Funds so far as concerned such funds. He could imagine that that might mean that the Legislature might confiscate such funds. It was not unreasonable to ask the Solicitor General to offer some definition of the words "Public Funds." To-night, it must be confessed, they had received a lesson in the art of definition. If the Solicitor General was right, in future they would be saved the necessity for anything like definitions in Acts of Parliament. The Solicitor General said that "Public Funds" meant, not what might be improperly termed Public Funds, but what might be properly termed Public Funds. A more simple method of reasoning had never been presented to an astounded House. He should like to be informed whether, in the opinion of the Government, the phrase "Corporations administering Public Funds" included Corporations such as Trinity College, Dublin ? The Chief Secretary had said he did not think they would ; but if that was so, would he agree to insert words in the clause to make the point clear ? They knew that Trinity College had been before now, in the course of these discussions, in very serious danger ; and that unless it was very efficiently protected, it would certainly be attacked by the Irish Legislature. The hon. Member for East Mayo had said that if it had not been for an Amendment introduced by the Chief Secretary the other night, Trinity College would have been in danger, and that a determined attack would have been made on its privileges and property. The hon. Member for East Mayo had said—

"If the House will strike out Sub-section 6 altogether, we will agree that Trinity College and other threatened Institutions shall be adequately protected."

MR. DILLON said, that what he had said was that there were two methods of protecting these Institutions—namely, specifying each one, and adopting the proposal of the Government. The Government and the Irish Representatives believed that Trinity College was amply protected by the Bill as it stood ; but the Irish Members were willing that it should be completely protected by name on condition that Sub-section 6 was struck out.

*MR. BUTCHER said, that he had, therefore, correctly represented what the hon. Member had said. If Trinity College and other Institutions were protected by name, the hon. Member was prepared to permit spoliation in other cases. That was his quid pro quo. But since the hon. Member had made his speech the other night, this new Amendment had been brought forward by the Chief Secretary ; and he, therefore, appealed to the right hon. Gentleman to insert words which would clearly and completely remove all fears that were entertained with regard to Trinity College. It seemed to him that the most satisfactory way of dealing with the matter would be to strike out the words "Public Funds," and use the words in a previous portion of the clause—namely, "taxes, rates, cess, dues, or tolls."

*SIR C. RUSSELL said, that what had happened was this—when Sub-section 6 was being discussed, the right hon. Gentleman the Member for St. George's Division (Mr. Goschen) called attention to what he considered the bad drafting of the sub-section. He (Sir C. Russell) shared the right hon. Gentleman's view, and perhaps attached more importance to it than he ought to have done; and, as a mere drafting arrangement, he had undertaken that the matter should be dealt with on Report. Now, he would ask hon. Members to read the Amendment. He submitted that it did not in any way depart from the meaning of the clause as it originally stood, and did not extend its operation. The broad character of the sub-section was this—it divided Corporations into two main classes—such Corporations or Bodies as were concerned with the general government of the country it was intended by the Government should be under the control of the Irish Legislature in the ordinary way so far as any other subject was under their legislative control; but, as regarded all other existing Corporations which did not come under that class, one of two courses would have to be pursued. Either there must be Addresses from both Houses of the Legislature, followed by the assent of Her Majesty, before the Irish Legislature could deal with the bodies, or, if expropriation was involved, the Irish Legislature would have to give fair and just compensation. The Government were asked what was the class of Corporation or Body contemplated by the proposal. The Royal Dublin Society was an example of what was meant. That Society could not be dealt with under the clause as it stood, except in the two ways mentioned; but, as regarded the £5,000 voted to it by Parliament, it would be reserved to the Irish Legislative Body to say how it should be dealt with. No jot or tittle of the protection the clause was intended to afford to Trinity College was touched by any part of the Amendment. A question had been asked as to what was meant by "Public Funds." It was always very easy to claim the right to a definition; but it was not always the part of a prudent man to commit himself to a definition as being exhaustive. He thought, therefore, his hon. and learned Colleague (Sir J. Rigby) was quite right in refusing to commit himself. But he thought there was no lawyer in the House who could not suggest an approximation to what was meant. He should say that "Public Funds" might be described as funds raised by taxation, or arising from property belonging to the State, or to any Municipal Corporation or other Local Authority. That would not be very far from a close definition of "Public Funds." At all events, he could not agree that there would be any real difficulty in the Courts arriving at the intention of Parliament.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I think it will be admitted that the House stands, in relation to this Amendment, in rather a peculiar position. Yesterday the Government restricted our powers of discussion on the 36 remaining clauses of the Bill—or the 42 clauses, if the Schedules were counted as clauses—to the next three days. The least we could claim under these circumstances—and I am sure the least the Government desire to give us—is every facility during the brief hours still remaining to us to discuss the questions in the Bill of great public moment and importance. What actually happens is that on the very day after the Resolution has been passed, the Government, who have had plenty of time to think of the question—because they have complained bitterly of the interval which we have obliged them to spend between the days of the Committee and the days of this Report—have not succeeded in finding words which carry out their idea. In a very thin House, during the dinner hour, they suddenly add certain words which, I will do them the justice to say, are intended merely to clarify their meaning, but which have thoroughly befogged the House. They cannot blame us for regarding a step of that kind as one big with unknown meaning. With the limited time remaining for discussion, and with a great responsibility for the way in which it is spent, the Government would not drop casual Amendments upon the Table unless they had something to get by them. The question is what their object is. To that question we have yet received no satisfactory reply. The words "Public Funds" have never, so far as I know, been used in an Act of Parliament before. [Ministerial cries of "Yes!"] I am advised that they have not, and I am also advised that they have never been made the subject of any public decision. There is, therefore, hanging over them, from a legal point of view, very great obscurity. I have always held the view that when the meaning of words is plain to everybody lawyers hesitate too much in introducing them into Acts of Parliament, simply because Judges have never had to interpret such words. There is, however, clear common sense in the lawyers' objection to introduce into an Act new words which do not carry their meaning on their face, which have not been interpreted by the Courts, and which are ambiguous. Everyone must know that the words "Public Funds" are ambiguous. I appeal to hon. Members of this House whether they do not hear constantly, in ordinary political controversy, such funds as those belonging to great Educational Institutions, to Corporations like the City Companies, to Churches, and to Universities, rightly or wrongly described as Public Funds? If the Government do not include such funds, why will they not introduce words which would clearly exclude them? The Government have stated that they do not mean to include Trinity College, Dublin; but they have not explained how Trinity College is excluded. There are great Irish estates belonging to the London Companies. Are they to be regarded as Public Funds, or are they not? Many people call them Public Funds. Are they public or not? How are we to be guided? It is to be observed that the Government themselves, when they originally drafted this clause, must have known that ambiguity resided in these words, because, instead of "Public Funds," they deliberately used the words "taxes, rates, cess, dues, or tolls." Why did not the Government use in their Amendment the words they originally used in the Bill? Can they complain of us if we feel suspicious on the subject? Our suspicions would be even more justified if we felt inclined to entertain them by the single illustration which the ingenuity of the Government has already used. The three gentlemen who have spoken on behalf of the Government have not been able to produce a single solitary case covered by the words, except the case of the Dublin Society. I may remind those hon. Members who were not here earlier that the Dublin Society get £5,000 annually voted for the breeding of horses. Under the Bill that £5,000 will no longer be voted by this House, but it may be voted by the Irish Legislature. We are actually told that these additional words are required in order that the Irish Legislature may have control over the Dublin Society in so far as the £5,000 are concerned. The Irish Legislature will vote the £5,000 if they desire to do so, and they will vote it under any conditions they like. They may make it £10,000 if they like, or reduce it to a farthing, and they may vote it for cattle instead of horses if they like. The additional words are absolutely inoperative, useless, and childish as far as the Dublin Society is concerned. That being so, is it unreasonable to ask what other Corporations the Government have in view? The hon. Member for East Mayo (Mr. Dillon) expressed on the part of his friends their willingness to enumerate the Institutions which they desire to protect. I should like to put the converse, and ask whether the Government will enumerate the Corporations they desire to attack? If they do not mean to attack anything, why do they use the words at all? It was in their power to introduce these words into the original sub-section; but they did not do so. They now take a general and ambiguous expression; and all we can get out of the Solicitor General in the way of description or definition of what "Public Funds" are is that "Public Funds" are funds which may properly be described as public. That is the kind of elucidation of a difficult question given to us by the Advisers of the Crown. I think that if my hon. Friend who has moved the Amendment to the Amendment would consent to substitute for his terms—which are, perhaps, too narrow—the words actually contained in the Bill, we should be able to see exactly what the Government are driving at. The effect this would have would be to ease a great many of the fears entertained in the House, and to add something not immaterial to what is meant by the description of “Public Funds.”

MR. TOMLINSON said, he should be very glad to carry out the right hon. Gentleman's suggestion.

Amendment to Amendment, by leave, withdraw.

Amendment proposed to the proposed Amendment,

To leave out from the word “administering,” to the end of the proposed Amendment, in order to add the words “for public purposes, taxes, rates, cess, dues, or tolls, so far as concerns the same.”—(Mr. A. J. Balfour.)

Question proposed, “That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the proposed Amendment.”

MR. J. MORLEY: A great deal has been said by the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. A. J. Balfour) as to the sinister intentions of the Government in proposing this Amendment. The history of the Amendment, however, has been already given to the House by the Attorney General (Sir C. Russell). The late Chancellor of the Exchequer (Mr. Goschen) found some fault with the words in the Bill as they stood. It was in order to meet the objections of my right hon. Friend that my hon. and learned Friend promised to find better words; and the Amendment to which so many sinister purposes have been attributed has, therefore, been brought forward in order to fulfil that pledge. As, however, hon. Gentlemen opposite do not fall in with our proposal, and as they suspect all kinds of obnoxious meanings in the Amendment, we are quite willing to go back to our original proposal. The form in which the right hon. Gentleman proposes to take us back is one to which we have no objection.

MR. SEXTON said, he wished to know whether companies incorporated by Local Act—companies incorporated by the Companies Acts and companies incorporated by Charter—were, or were not, excluded from the sub-section? He wished also to know from the Government what was meant by “Local Authority”? Did the term include minor but still important Bodies like Harbour Boards, Water Boards, Drainage Boards, Joint Sanitary Boards, and Burial Boards, which raised money in some form or other from the public, and which, therefore, he assumed, ought to be included?

MR. DILLON (Mayo, E.) expressed the opinion that the alteration accepted by the Government would entirely alter the meaning of the sub-section as it originally stood in the clause.

MR. A. O'CONNOR (Donegal, E.) asked that the Amendment as it would stand, if the last proposal were adopted, might be read out to the House.

*MR. SPEAKER: It would read as follows:—

“And so far as respects property without just compensation: Provided that nothing in this sub-section shall prevent the Irish Legislature from dealing with any Public Department, Municipal Corporation, or Local Authority, or with any Corporation administering for public purposes, taxes, rates, cess, dues, or tolls, so far as concerns the same.”

Question put, and negatived.

Question proposed, “That the words ‘for public purposes, taxes, rates, cess, dues, or tolls, so far as concerns the same,’ be added to the proposed Amendment.”

MR. T. M. HEALY (Louth, N.) moved to omit the words “so far as concerns the same.” He said it was quite true that the Government had endeavoured to meet the views of the late Chancellor of the Exchequer; and, of course, instead of expressing any satisfaction whatever, the Opposition had turned round and proceeded to kick the Government for having made a concession to them. He had not had an opportunity of sufficiently considering the Amendment; and, as the Opposition objected to them, he thought the words “so far as concerns the same,” should be omitted. He did not remember the exact history of the Royal Dublin Society. His recollection was that in the last Parliament a proposition was made to the effect that the sum granted to the members of that Body, which had been founded for the benefit of agriculture, should be com-mutated by the Treasury into a lump sum. The late Colonel King-Harman proposed to give the Society £5,000 a year for the breeding of horses; and the late Chancellor of the Exchequer suddenly—towards Christmas, 1888—stuck in his Probate Duty Bill a grant for that purpose. The result had been that the £5,000 a year had been given to land-grabbers, land agents, and other members of the obnoxious classes of Ireland, whilst none of the money had gone to the honest farmers of the country.

Amendment proposed to the Amendment to the proposed Amendment, to leave out the words "so far as concerns the same."—(Mr. T. M. Healy.)

Question proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out of the Amendment to the proposed Amendment stand part of the Question."

SIR J. RIGBY said, the Government were not able to accept the Amendment, as it would not be reasonable. Wherever money was raised in the manner mentioned in the Amendment due control ought to be given to the Irish Legislature; but that control would necessarily stop at the point at which the administration of the funds ceased.

MR. KNOX (Cavan, W.) said, he thought it was worthy of consideration that there were a large number of Corporations in Ireland which did not exist in this country. He referred to the county infirmaries, which were incorporated by special Charters or special Acts. These infirmaries received money from the public cess. When it was desired to reform an Irish infirmary it was necessary to pass an Act through the Imperial Parliament; and he believed that in this Session a Public Act had been passed to remove a few abuses from the Galway Infirmary. Unless the words proposed to be left out were excluded from the sub-section, the Irish Parliament would not be able to reform abuses of administration in these infirmaries, although it would be able to stop the money. The consequence would be that year by year proposals would have to be made to Her Majesty's Government for assent to various Bills dealing with local Corporations. These were essentially questions which ought to be referred to a Home Rule Parliament. The Solicitor General said the Amendment was unreasonable; but it was precisely the same proposal as had been made by the Government themselves.

MR. J. MORLEY: In answer to my hon. and learned Friend, I would point out that, in such cases as he refers to, there would be no difficulty whatever in getting the two Houses of the Irish Legislature to agree to such an Address as is suggested.

MR. KNOX; There might be a difficulty in getting the assent of the Imperial Government.

Question put, and agreed to.

Question again proposed, "That the words 'for public purposes, taxes, rates, cess, dues, or tolls, so far as concerns the same,' be added to the proposed Amendment."

MR. SEXTON said, that for the third time that evening he had to ask for an answer to a question he had put. The Solicitor General had given him an answer respecting Local Authorities which was tolerably satisfactory; but he could not rest content without a reply to the question he had put respecting Public Companies. In order to obtain a reply, he moved to add to the Amendment, "or with any Public Company."

Amendment proposed to the Amendment to the proposed Amendment, to add at the end the words "or with any Public Company."—(Mr. Sexton.)

Question proposed, "That those words be added at the end of the Amendment to the proposed Amendment."

SIR J. RIGBY: I regret that by inadvertence I did not on a former occasion reply directly to the hon. Gentleman's question. I do not think that there can really be any difficulty about it. If you except, as is proposed by this Amendment, every Public Company, that would include Railway Companies and Gas Companies; and all the rights of such companies would be subject, with certain exceptions, to the absolute power of the Irish Legislature, which might deprive them of their rights without giving a farthing compensation, and without due process of law. Certainly, we never contemplated anything of the kind. As regards Railway and Canal Companies, we contemplate, and we understand that the clause as it will stand without this Amendment will provide, that you should only take their undertakings from them on giving them just compensation and providing the proper means by which that compensation should be estimated. With regard to regulations for the public benefit, in the way of the safety of the passengers and so on, I do not apprehend that any of these Companies has the right or the privilege of carrying on business in a way which would be disadvantageous to the public. As regards rates and tolls, they have by legislative enactment the right to make charges, and I apprehend that such rates could not be taken away from them except in the manner provided by the section for the protection of Corporations. The Irish Legislature would not be able to say that Public Companies should no longer be able to charge rates and tolls, and, by parity of reasoning, they would not be able to say that they should only claim one-half the authorised rate.

MR. KNOX said, he sincerely hoped that his hon. Friend would press his Amendment. The Nationalist Members had been told that they were to have power over gas, water, and electricity. It now seemed clear that they were not to have that power. As he understood, before the City of Dublin, for instance, would be able to obtain control of the Dublin gas undertaking, it would have to come to the Imperial Government for permission. It would have to draw up the heads of a Bill, and obtain the assent of the Imperial Government to them; and then the Bill would have to be passed through both Houses of the Irish Legislature without any Amendments. The same would be the case with regard to gas and water in every city in Ireland. So far as the property of a Corporation was concerned, he thought it quite fair that the Irish Legislature should be prohibited from taking it without due process of law: but he submitted that this was already provided for in Sub-section 5. The effect of his hon. and learned Friend's Amendment would be that the Irish Legislature might deal with Corporations in the same way that it might deal with ordinary individuals; and he thought it a strange thing that a limited or any other company carrying on business in Ireland was to have rights and privileges which would be denied to a private individual. The result of such a provision would be the extension of the system of forming Limited Companies whenever the business was of such a kind that the owners or promoters did not want it to be under direct public control. He hoped, therefore, the Government would see that the restriction should be removed.

*MR. BLAKE (Longford, S.) submitted that the question was one of very great importance. It was really a question whether a large class of matters which properly belong to a local Legislature should come under the operation of the Irish Parliament, or should be taken direct to the Imperial Parliament. He looked at this matter with some alarm, because he was not able to agree with the view suggested by the hon. Member for Dublin University (Mr. Carson) earlier in the Debate, when, pointing out that the preliminary procedure, before even approaching the Crown, was to obtain an Address from both Houses of the Irish Legislature, that hon. Member alleged that an Address could be got when a Bill could be got. If he rightly construed the clause, an Address could not be got whenever a Bill might be got, because there was no provision for collective action on the part of the two Houses of the Irish Legislature in regard to the Address to the Crown, such as there was in the case of a Bill; and, therefore, the Second Chamber might for all time prevent the Representatives of the people of Ireland from even approaching the Crown to ask its consideration of the question whether the Irish Legislature should be able to deal with local Irish Companies. He would submit, therefore, that there should be some provision for collective action with regard to Addresses to the Crown, so as to secure, as in the case of Bills, the reconciliation of divergencies of opinion on such matters. The proposal that would set up the Second Chamber with an absolute veto on Addresses to the Crown was wholly indefensible, at any rate from those quarters which had already recognised the propriety of providing a means, by collective vote, of overcoming divergence of opinion in the case of Bills.

MR. J. CHAMBERLAIN: I have listened to this Debate with very great interest and no little amusement. I would preface what I have to say by suggesting that the Prime Minister should devise some form of Closure which would give us some compensation for the time wasted by his own supporters. We are discussing one of the safeguards—Heaven save the mark!—which the Government had put into this Bill. It does not say that the Irish Parliament shall not deal with the Corporations, or Companies, or Local Authorities, or anything else. But it does say that the Irish Parliament shall not deprive these Corporations of their properties and rights without due process of law and just compensation, unless the consent of both Houses of the Legislature is given. So that it only protects these unfortunate companies to this extent—that they are not to be robbed—that is not too strong a word; that their property shall not be taken from them without just compensation and an Address from both Houses of the Legislature. I do not think that that is much of a protection. When it came to robbing these Bodies I am not certain that the Address will not be forthcoming. But what is the position of hon. Gentlemen from Ireland in regard to this safeguard? With one accord, including that great Constitutional authority the hon. Member for North Longford, they demand that as many Bodies as possible shall be excluded from this minimum of protection. And this Debate has occupied an hour and a half of the time which properly belongs to the Opposition. The hon. Member for Cavan actually says that, if this safeguard is adopted, the Irish Legislature shall have no power over gas, water, and electricity—

MR. KNOX: I expressly stated that one of the reasons why I supported the Amendment was because these Corporations could not, even if the Amendment were carried, be deprived of their property without due process and compensation, as that is provided for by Clause 5; and I say that it is an outrage for the right hon. Gentleman to accuse us of an intention to rob these Bodies when we have expressly stated that it was not our intention to interfere in any way with the protection of their property.

MR. J. CHAMBERLAIN: The explanation explains nothing. The explanation is a condemnation of the drafting of the Bill. The hon. Member for Cavan thinks that this section is absolutely unnecessary, as all the protection which it gives is given by Sub-section 5. Well, he differs with the Solicitor General and the Attorney General, who are responsible for drafting this part of the Bill—

MR. KNOX: I am sure the right hon. Gentleman does not wish to misinterpret me. If I may say so, my argument was this. There are three things raised—rights, privileges, and property. Property is fully dealt with in Clause 5. Rights and privileges are subordinate things, and the object of our Amendment is to remove the prohibition from the Irish Parliament of dealing with rights and privileges. I was not in any way questioning the general drafting of the Bill. I only said that we ought to have the power of dealing with the rights and privileges, even if restricted from taking away the property of those Bodies.

MR. J. CHAMBERLAIN: The explanation of the hon. and learned Gentleman is longer than his original speech. I really believe that he has not read the sub-section. I noticed when he got up that he was entirely ignorant of Sub-section 6 as drafted by the Chief Secretary, because he omitted altogether to deal with this question of just compensation until reminded of it by the hon. Member for North Kerry. Now, the hon. and learned Member gets up and tells us that all the protection that is afforded by Sub-section 6 would be afforded by Sub-section 5.

MR. KNOX: As regards property.

MR. J. CHAMBERLAIN: I have to point out to him that that is not the case. Sub-section 5 provides a qualified protection for persons and for private property, and Sub-section 6 deals with Corporations. The two are entirely distinct and separate. One deals with individuals, and the other deals with Corporations.

MR. KNOX: Persons include Corporations.

MR. J. CHAMBERLAIN: Having explained this matter to the hon. and learned Gentleman on behalf of the right hon. Gentlemen who have drafted the Bill, I proceed to consider the Amendment before the House. The hon. and learned Member gave us the impression that if this Amendment of the Chief Secretary were accepted in all its terms it would exclude the Irish Legislature from dealing with gas and water. Nothing of the kind. It would still be competent to the Irish Legislature to pass Bills regulating Gas and Water Companies in the interests of the public, and to take the property of such companies and transfer it to Local Authorities, provided that just compensation is given. I must say that, under these circumstances, the discussion raised by hon. Members below the Gangway opposite is an absolute waste of time and deliberate obstruction.

MR. T. M. HEALY said, as he understood the argument of the right hon. Gentleman who had just spoken, a Member, if he came from Sheffield or Birmingham or the Borders, was entitled to talk on this Home Rule Bill; but if he came from Tipperary, or Cork, or Louth, or Dublin, then his function was to hold his tongue, and to allow Birmingham and Sheffield and Partick—especially Partick—to deliver long speeches by the hour and a half. He had thought, after listening for 77 days to the right hon. Member for West Birmingham making 777 speeches, that really in the eleventh hour hon. Gentlemen from Ireland should be allowed upon this question to say a few words. When the right hon. Member for West Birmingham got up, he (Mr. Healy) thought he was going to say—"I am in favour, at any rate, of giving a Gas and Water Bill." He thought he was going to refer to the Amendment, for which he voted last week, of the hon. and learned Member for Harrow, and for which every Tory and Unionist voted, and said, "Here is our Home Rule Bill."

MR. J. CHAMBERLAIN: There was no Division on that Amendment.

MR. T. M. HEALY said, he wished to know, was the right hon. Member for West Birmingham blaming the hon. and learned Member for Harrow because he would not support him, who was going to give over education and land, and who now would not give them Private Bills? He would say, give them Home Rule according to Harrow. He had in his hand the Standing Orders of the House, from which he observed that the proposal of the hon. and learned Member for Harrow would give the Irish Parliament the power of dealing with Burial Boards, Charters, and Corporations, and enlarging or altering their powers; but they were told by the right hon. Member for West Birmingham and the Government that it would be robbery to give an Irish Parliament that power. The point now made by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Birmingham was that if the Irish Parliament got this power they would rob those Corporations. All they claimed was to have power to deal with those Corporations, and if they took their property they would pay them for it. He would give the right hon. Member for West Birmingham—who was, no doubt, very learned in all these matters—an illustration of the effect of this clause if carried. There was at present a bridge across the Suir at Waterford, built, he believed, in 1777, and bearing an inscription to the effect that in that year Catholics and Protestants in Ireland became united. The bridge had fallen into a bad state of repair, and though the Judges at Assizes had frequently complained of it, nothing could be done on account of the powers vested in the Local Authority in respect of it. Last year they experienced a similar difficulty in connection with some of the infirmaries in Ireland. He might further mention that there were at least four squares in Dublin incorporated under Local Acts passed by the Irish Parliament; and now, as he understood the proposal of the Government, it would be out of the power of an Irish Legislature even to deal with the paving of those squares. He would prove what he said, because, two years ago, when they wished to improve the squares of Dublin, they had to go to the Imperial Parliament for a Local Act. It might be said, in replying, that under similar circumstances they could easily come there again and get a Local Act; but surely they did not want the Irish Members coming there looking for Local Acts after they had got Home Rule. He regarded the clause under discussion as in an extremely unsatisfactory position, and he hoped the Government would reconsider it at some future time

Question put, and negatived.

Words added to the proposed Amendment.

Amendment, as amended, agreed to.

On Clause 5.

MR. PARKER SMITH moved to leave out the words "in Her Majesty's name," and to insert the words "as representing Her Majesty." That was not a mere verbal Amendment, for it would have the effect of altering the Advisers of the Lord Lieutenant in these matters from the Irish Parliament to the Imperial Parliament. The clause was a difficult one to understand, so far as the action of the Lord Lieutenant was concerned. There were three separate phrases used in the clause—"on behalf of Her Majesty"; "by Her Majesty"; and "in Her Majesty's name." As far as he could understand, the two phrases "on behalf of Her Majesty" and "in Her Majesty's name" were exactly the same; and he did not see why separate phrases should be used, except it was solely for the purpose of providing variety of expression.

It being Midnight, Further Proceeding on Consideration, as amended, stood adjourned.

ORDERS OF THE DAY.

GOVERNMENT OF IRELAND BILL.
(No. 428.)

CONSIDERATION. [TWELFTH NIGHT.]

Bill, as amended, further considered.

MR. PARKER SMITH (Lanark, Partick) said, he should require to recapitulate some of the observations he had made five minutes before midnight last night in introducing his Amendment. That Amendment was to the effect that the prerogatives of the Queen shall be exercised by the Lord Lieutenant, and that he shall, "as representing Her Majesty" (instead of "in Her Majesty's name," as provided in the clause), summon, prorogue, and dissolve the Irish Legislature. This might sound like a verbal Amendment, but he did not think the Government would so regard it. The scheme of the Bill was that two particular phrases should be used, so that when the Lord Lieutenant was to "represent Her Majesty" it meant that he was to act on the advice of the Imperial Government; but when the words "in Her Majesty's name" were employed they were intended to signify that whatever had to be done should be done on the advice of the Irish Executive. The particular prerogative given by the clause stood on a different footing from all the other prerogatives delegated to the Lord Lieutenant under the Bill, because the latter might be withdrawn from time to time; but in the present case the prerogative was not delegated; it was absolutely given by Act of Parliament, and could only be withdrawn by Act of Parliament. He wished to point out what would be the effect of his Amendment. There might be cases in which some foreign complication occurred as to which it might be of the first importance to the Imperial Parliament to prorogue the Sittings of the Irish Legislature. There might also be cases in which it might be important to summon the Irish Legislature; while in the case of a divergence between the two Governments it might be essential to the Imperial Government that it should have power to dissolve the Irish Legislature, so that an appeal might be made to the Irish constituencies. It seemed to him it would be a satisfactory solution of the difficulty if the prerogative were left on the footing of other prerogatives. If it were delegated, with the power of recalling it at any time, it would be satisfactory.

Amendment proposed,

In page 3, line 29, to leave out the words "in Her Majesty's name," in order to insert the words "as representing Her Majesty."—(Mr. Parker Smith.)

Question proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Bill."

THE CHIEF SECRETARY FOR IRELAND (Mr. J. MORLEY, Newcastle-upon-Tyne) said, as far as he understood the explanation of the hon. and learned Member, the object of the Amendment was to reserve to the Imperial Parliament the power of deciding when the Lord Lieutenant should dissolve the Irish Legislature. The hon. and learned Member contended that the Imperial Government ought to have the opportunity and the means of signifying when they thought the Irish Legislature should be dissolved. Apart from the other objections to this proposal, the hon. and learned Member must see that, if it were adopted, it would take away from the Irish Government or the advisers of the Lord Lieutenant the responsibility for what was undoubtedly one of the most important, solemn, and decisive acts in which any Government could take part in advising either the Sovereign or the Lord Lieutenant. What, he asked, would be the effect on the position of that House if there were some Body outside it—he wished it to be understood that he was not now thinking of "another place"—but some entirely different Body, the Ministers of which had the power of compelling the Government of Her Majesty to advise the Sovereign as to when it was proper to dissolve the Imperial Parliament. Such a state of things would entirely contravene the whole spirit and working of our Parliamentary Institutions. It was true that circumstances might arise in which according to the views expressed by the hon. and learned Member, a Dissolution of the Irish Legislature would be deemed necessary; but if such a crisis should arise, it would be easy for the Government or Imperial Parliament to signify to the Lord Lieutenant that such a view was entertained. He confessed, however, that he could not contemplate the possibility of such a power being exercised except under the most remarkable and extraordinary circumstances, and unless they arose he could not imagine a case in which such a power could ever be exercised. He should like to know, supposing the Irish Government were averse to a Dissolution, and a Dissolution were, nevertheless, forced upon them in the way the hon. and learned Member thought desirable, what would be the effect of such a step on the part of the Imperial Government upon the electorate of Ireland? He could hardly conceive anything that would be more certain to turn public opinion in Ireland against that Party in Ireland who were in the minority of the Irish Legislature, and who were accomplices in such an invasion of the natural and Constitutional privileges of the advisers of the Lord Lieutenant. On these practical grounds, and without going into the details referred to by the hon. Member, the Government must oppose the Amendment.

SIR H. JAMES (Bury, Lancashire) said, he thought that some protest ought to be made against one of the arguments used by his right hon. Friend the Chief Secretary. The right hon. Gentleman had said that they in the Imperial Parliament would not tolerate any other Body in interfering in such a way with the advice of the Imperial Ministers as to bring about a Dissolution of the Imperial Parliament. So far he agreed with his right hon. Friend; but he wished to know whether the right hon. Gentleman put it to the House that there was a complete analogy between the Imperial Parliament of the United Kingdom and a subordinate Parliament in Ireland?

MR. J. MORLEY was understood to reply in the negative.

SIR H. JAMES said, at any rate, for the purpose of the clause, the Irish Parliament was to be in an equal position to the supreme Parliament, but he (Sir H. James) had never before heard that there was any claim for announcing a Dissolution of the subordinate Parliament such as existed in the Imperial Parliament. His right hon. Friend had said the Imperial Government ought not to have the supreme power asked for by the Amendment, because the Lord Lieutenant might, on the advice of the Imperial Government, dissolve the Irish Parliament, and at the same time he had said what an extraordinary and repulsive thing it would be to the Irish Legislature if they should provide positively in this Bill that this power should be maintained by the Imperial Parliament. He (Sir H. James) could not see where his right hon. Friend's indignation should come, seeing that in the same breath he said that on a crisis the Lord Lieutenant might advise the Imperial Executive. He (Sir H. James) did not see what course the hon. and learned Gentleman would take in regard to dividing the House. He quite saw that there might be different views on the one side and the other, but he did not think that those of the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary were the views that should prevail.

*MR. BARTLEY (Islington, N.) said, this short discussion showed how they were drifting in this Bill. At the commencement of the Debates the Prime Minister had continually stated that the Irish Legislature was to be a subordinate one, and when he (Mr. Bartley) had brought forward an Amendment to secure that it should be actually styled in the Bill subordinate, it was distinctly stated that it would be such in reality, and that it was, therefore, unnecessary to put in the words. But an incidental remark just made by the Chief Secretary showed that the Government would not accept the proposed words, because in their own minds they meant that this was not to be a subordinate Legislature in all matters that concerned it, but was to be co-ordinate with the Parliament at Westminster.

MR. SEXTON (Kerry, N.) said, that if the Debate was short it had disclosed a great deal of ignorance also. He entirely failed to understand the hon. Member (Mr. Bartley) when he said the House was drifting in a certain direction. In what sense did the refusal of the Amendment show that the Irish Parliament was not to be a subordinate Parliament? The hon. Gentleman said the House was drifting, and that the admission that the Irish Parliament was a subordinate Parliament had been given away by the refusal to adopt the present Amendment, and that, consequently, the Irish Parliament would not be subordinate. The Irish Parliament, like every other Parliament of the Empire, except that in which they sat, would be a subordinate Parliament. He did not hear either from the hon. Gentleman (Mr. Bartley) or from the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Bury (Sir H. James) the fact or the usage of limiting the Session of Parliament in any of the Colonies by the will of the Imperial Ministry. This was no new experiment that was being engaged in—

MR. A. CHAMBERLAIN : Hear, hear !

MR. SEXTON : The gentleman who cheered that was very young. He might as well stay there and learn something. He showed more a willingness to follow parental example than a Constitutional knowledge to sneer at what he did not understand. The Irish Parliament would not be alone. There were about 20 others in the Empire. There were seven in Australia, one at the Cape, eight or nine in Canada, and there were others in various other places in the Empire.

VISCOUNT CRANBORNE : Hear, hear !

MR. SEXTON : Could the noble Lord who cheered ironically name one of these in which either the beginning of a Session, or the end of a Session, or the duration of a Session of Parliament was determined by the Imperial Ministry? If the noble Lord could not, he had better allow the argument, properly so-called, to proceed. Was it really seriously proposed that after a Parliament was established in Ireland to look after Irish affairs Ministers responsible to the Imperial Parliament, and knowing less then, he supposed, of Irish affairs than they did now—which was saying a great deal—that they were to say when the Session of the Irish Parliament was to begin and end, and when the Parliament, created by the electors in Ireland, was to be dissolved? The beginning and end of the Sessions should be determined by the convenience and necessities of Ireland. The Irish people knew better than the Imperial Parliament could know when their own Parliament should begin and end, and the Irish Ministers were the persons to say when the Irish Houses should meet, when their business was done, and when it was that it was expedient that their functions should cease. The proposal to place these matters in the jurisdiction of Ministers in England was absurd, and he thought it right that one Irish Member at least should speak in the Debate, and say that the proposal raised in the Amendment was one that would not be tolerated.

MR. BYRNE (Essex, Walthamstow) said, the hon. Member for North Kerry (Mr. Sexton) asked them to point out any other subordinate Parliament to which such a provision as that which it was now sought to incorporate in the Bill applied. Well, he (Mr. Byrne) would venture to suggest, by way of reply, that this was essentially a new experiment, and he would ask the hon. Member for North Kerry, in turn, if he could point to a single subordinate Legislature that had representation in the Imperial Parliament? The hon. Member said—"How can you know as well as Ireland when the Prorogation of the Irish Legislature should take place?" He (Mr. Byrne) begged to protest against that form of expression. Since Clause 9 had been passed Nationalist Members ought to use the expression "we," and not "you," in speaking of this House, for they would be Members of it, and the Imperial Executive would represent them equally with the other parts of the United Kingdom.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR (Manchester, E.) said, he did not think that the matter was so simple as the hon. Member (Mr. Sexton) seemed to suppose. The hon. Member had quoted Colonial precedents, as hon. Members invariably did when they suited their purpose, and repudiated them when they did not. But as the hon. Member who had just sat down had so well pointed out, in reality there was no analogy between Ireland and the Colonies. There was one difference that had escaped his hon. and learned Friend, to which attention should be invited—a difference that was vital. Here was an operative veto to be given on the advice of a Minister responsible to the Imperial Parliament. Let them suppose that the veto was used, and that the Ministry in Ireland resigned. The Lord Lieutenant would find himself saddled with an ex-Ministry that had the confidence of the Legislature, and to whom no successor would be found which would have that confidence. How were they to get out of the deadlock unless they allowed the Lords Lieutenant to ascertain whether the deliberate voice of the Irish people was or was not in harmony with the representation of the Legislative Assembly? He assented to what had fallen from the hon. Member for North Kerry as to those cases in which they would be dealing with purely Irish affairs—when the Viceroy, for instance, was acting on the advice of the Irish Cabinet, and on that alone, and where the matter was a purely domestic one. There would be a good deal then to be said for the hon. Member's view. But by the whole structure of the Bill it was evident that crises would arise in which the Lord Lieutenant would act as a Member not of the Irish Government, but of the Imperial Government, and he thought that when those crises did arise they ought to allow the Imperial Government, acting through the Lord Lieutenant, to have power not merely to say—"We will have this Bill and we will not have that Bill," but to say—"We will take the voice of the Irish people; we will dissolve the Legislature, and find out what their views are, and let them shape your future policy."

MR. SEXTON said, that if a Bill passed, it would not be open to the Lord Lieutenant to evade giving his assent by dissolving Parliament; but if the Government resigned, there would be no Irish Cabinet, and the Lord Lieutenant might, of course, dissolve.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR said, he was assuming that the Lord Lieutenant refused his assent, acting on the advice of his colleagues in Great Britain, saying—"We will not allow you to pass this Bill." Thereupon, he assumed that the Irish Ministry would resign or would be dismissed by the Lord Lieutenant, who, however, could not form another Government having the confidence of the Irish Assembly.

MR. SEXTON: He would dissolve.

MR. J. MORLEY: He would act on his own judgment.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: Then they were to have the Lord Lieutenant in three capacities. He found it hard enough to swallow the Lord Lieutenant in two capacities. Now, it appeared, they were to have him acting in three. If they were to have the Lord Lieutenant sometimes the mouthpiece of the Irish Government, sometimes the mouthpiece of the English Government, and sometimes acting on his own responsibility, he would be a veritable official Cerberus with three heads. The Lord Lieutenant would find it difficult to carry out the multifarious duties which would devolve upon him. It appeared to him that the case he had stated was one which deserved the attention of the Government, and which could not be so lightly dismissed as the hon. Member for Kerry (Mr. Sexton) had attempted to dismiss it.

MR. W. E. GLADSTONE: The right hon. Gentleman has spoken of the Lord Lieutenant acting in three capacities, and has referred to him as a Cerberus barking in Dublin. If that comparison holds good we have such a Cerberus in every self-governing colony, because in all such colonies the Lord Lieutenant will sometimes act on the advice of the local Executive, will sometimes exercise the veto on his own responsibility, and will sometimes refer to the Imperial Government for his instructions. So will it be in Ireland. I do not deny that the crisis, with the arrival of which the right hon. Gentleman feeds and entertains his imagination, may possibly in some remote case occur. He says it is a certainty. I do not admit it to be a certainty, but, at all events, the Bill provides for it. The right hon. Gentleman says that in consequence of some extremely rare and highly improbable case the exception now proposed ought to be agreed to. If we are to act upon that proposal it will be exactly like the case of a physician recommending all the Members of this House to be in a state of constant physis when they are in good health. We provide for the regular action of the Irish Government, and we decline to frame our Bill on the supposition that extreme and improbable cases will habitually occur.

*MR. BLAKE (Longford, S.) denied that in the suggested case of a conflict between the Viceroy and his Cabinet the latter would be called upon to resign. If the Irish Executive, upon whose responsibility a Bill had passed through both Houses of the Irish Legislature, felt that it had with it the Irish people, its position would not be weakened but strengthened by the circumstance of the supposed conflict. To suggest that because the Irish Government found that the Imperial Government declined to permit the Viceroy to give his assent they would resign was to put them in an illogical and utterly inconsequential position. In rare instances in the Colonies—and he believed such instances would be rare in Ireland—Bills had been disallowed or the Royal action had been reserved, but it had never been suggested that it then became the duty of the Colonial Government to resign. The Irish Government, instead of resigning in such a case, would rather adhere to their offices, and at the appropriate time decide whether they would take the judgment of the Irish people as to whether they should persist in presenting the measure to which the Imperial Government had refused to assent. If the Irish Ministry resigned for this or any other reason it would be the duty of the Viceroy to try and find other advisers, and if he failed to do so he would be bound to recall his old advisers; and so to act upon advice as to a Dissolution, or any other Irish political question.

COMMANDER BETHELL (York, E.R., Holderness) said, the argument used by the hon. Member who had just sat down was directed against the Irish Legislature being placed in any subordinate position at all. The hon. Gentleman said that in case of a difference of opinion between the Irish and the British Parliament it would be the duty of the Irish Parliament to persist in the course it had pursued and to appeal to the Irish people. It seemed to him (Commander Bethell) that the Amendment showed that the Constitutional system in vogue in Great Britain was not necessarily good for a country which was not a Sovereign Power. It was because Ireland was not a Sovereign Power that difficulties of this kind had perpetually cropped up.

Question put.

SIR H. JAMES (Bury, Lancashire) said, he wished to move an Amendment providing that there should be annual Sessions of the Irish Legislature. No doubt such a provision was made in the Schedule, but the difficulty was that under the 29th section of the Bill the Irish Legislature might repeal that provision. He wished to make it clear that the provision could not be repealed by the Irish Legislature. The Schedule which directed that the Irish Legislature should meet once a year, being merely a part of the Election Law, might, under the provisions of Clause 29, be repealed by the Irish Legislature, and then the Irish Government would have their hands free to summon or not to summon the Irish Legislature as they might think fit. Such a state of things they would all deplore. He hoped they would not have that proposal described as an insult to the Irish people, for this was a duty imposed on all subordinate Parliaments by the Statutes which created them. He had before him the Constitution of British North America, under which both the Dominion and the Provincial Parliaments were bound to meet every year, and a similar provision was embodied in the Constitution of New South Wales and Victoria. As it was evident that the Government intended that a like obligation should be imposed on the proposed Irish Parliament, he hoped that they would get rid of all doubt by accepting his Amendment.

Amendment proposed, in Clause 5, page 3, line 30, after the word "summon," to insert the words "at least once in every year."—(Sir H. James.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

MR. SEXTON (Kerry, N.) said, it was undoubtedly necessary, and it was indeed the intention of the Irish Members, that the Irish Legislature should assemble every year, but he thought that the provisions of the Bill as they stood in the 29th clause and in the Sixth Schedule would sufficiently secure that object. The right hon. Gentleman seemed to be under the impression that this was a matter of Election Law; but if he would look to the Definition Clause he would find that the point did not come within the Election Law, nor could that part of the Schedule that applied to it be altered by the Irish Legislature.

SIR H. JAMES said, the words of the 29th clause were to be read subject to the Sixth Schedule, which incorporated the Election Laws.

MR. SEXTON: But it is not Election Law.

SIR H. JAMES: I think it is.

*THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir C. RUSSELL, Hackney, S.) said, that while he agreed with the hon. Member for North Kerry (Mr. Sexton) that the summoning of the Irish Legislature did not come within the Election Law, and that the portion of the Schedule which related to it was sufficient, nevertheless, as the Amendment merely expressed what was undoubtedly the intention of all Parties—namely, that the Irish Legislature should sit every year, the Government saw no objection to accepting it.

Question put, and agreed to.

MR. AMBROSE (Middlesex, Harrow) said, he desired to move the addition of the following words at the end of the sub-section:—

“And at the expiration of forty days from the date of such instrument of delegation having been so presented to the two Houses of Parliament, but not before, such delegation shall become effective and binding, unless in the meantime an Address has been presented by both of the said Houses praying Her Majesty to revoke or cancel such delegation.”

The 3rd and 4th clauses proposed to codify the general powers conferred by the 2nd clause, and not a little jealousy was displayed in the exceptions made in reference to the Army and Navy and educational questions. But while the House had shown its appreciation of the importance of qualifying the powers of the Legislature, the framers of the Bill appeared to have utterly forgotten that the powers of the Executive were quite as important, if not more important, than the powers of the Parliament. By the 5th clause it was proposed to give to the Government of the day the power of delegating to the Lord Lieutenant the prerogatives of the Crown, and apparently there were no restrictions to that power of delegation; while the Lord Lieutenant, who would have the exercise of these prerogatives, would be subject to the control of the Irish Executive and of the Irish Parliament. The effect of delegating the prerogative of the Crown would be practically to place such a prerogative as that of the exercise of mercy in the hands of the Irish Legislature, who would thereby obtain the power of condoning such criminal offences as they might think fit. The framers of the Bill assuredly could not have realised the full extent of their 5th clause. These prerogatives covered an enormous field, and the House ought certainly to keep these matters in its own hands. When the Bill was in Committee he proposed that the delegation of these powers should be in a certain form, and should be laid upon the Table for a certain period before it took effect, so that the House and the country might know what powers were intended to be conferred on the Irish Executive. The right hon. Gentleman the Prime Minister, however, while not exactly accepting the Amendment, introduced some words by which, as he said, the object of his proposal was accomplished. These words at the end of Sub-section (1) of the clause read—

“And every instrument conveying any such delegation of any prerogative or any other Executive power shall be presented to the two Houses of Parliament as soon as conveniently may be.”

That, however, did not give to this House any control over the delegation, whatever it might be. He thought the House would object to any delegation of the prerogative of mercy, and it certainly would object to any delegation of the prerogatives of the Crown with reference to the Army and Navy, or in regard to education. The object of his Amendment was to give the House some control over the delegations before they should become effective; for when once the thing was done it would be very difficult to withdraw it, and such a withdrawal could only create a sense of injury on the part of the Irish people. The Amendment brought before the Committee was not the same as the present Amendment, which was based on Section 41 of the Endowed Schools Act, 1869, and it certainly seemed to him that what they were entitled to do in regard to the administration of a charity they ought certainly to do under the new Constitution the House was now creating. He begged to move the Amendment standing in his name.

Amendment proposed,

In page 3, line 33, after the words "may be," to insert the words "and at the expiration of forty days from the date of such instrument of delegation having been so presented to the two Houses of Parliament, but not before, such delegation shall become effective and binding, unless in the meantime an Address has been presented by both of the said Houses praying Her Majesty to revoke or cancel such delegation."—(Mr. Ambrose.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

MR. W. E. GLADSTONE: I think it is quite plain from the language of the 5th clause that these are delegations to the person and not to the office of the Lord Lieutenant. It appears to me that there are three objections to this Amendment, each of which is fatal. In the first place, there is no precedent for any provision in the slightest degree resembling that which is now proposed. It is perfectly true that in many cases of what may be termed subordinate legislation reservations of Parliamentary power are made which enable Parliament to intervene in cases where it is thought that powers which may be called into exercise and may arise out of circumstances involving an infinity of detail have not been judiciously used. But here the case is totally different. It is most proper that every facility should be given for appealing to the Imperial Parliament to intervene to prevent the misuse of its functions by the Executive Government. The hon. and learned Gentleman says that the provision made in the clause is not enough, and that these instruments of delegation should be submitted to this Parliament before they should come into effect. The hon. and learned Gentleman thereby raises a question of a high Constitutional nature, belonging exclusively to the functions of the Executive Government. It is provided in the clause that all such delegations shall be forthwith submitted to Parliament, but the hon. and learned Gentleman contends that the delegations must be submitted before they take effect. That is a very high Executive duty which the hon. and learned Member wishes to transfer to this Parliament. An important Constitutional question is involved in this proposal. Suppose a delegation is framed in a careless manner and escapes the notice of Parliament for 40 days owing to pressure of business, whose fault will it be if the faulty instrument becomes operative? It will be the fault of the Imperial Parliament, because that Parliament will have had the final determination of the matter. The business of a deliberative Assembly does not fit it for the discharge of Executive functions. The second objection is that if the Lord Lieutenant dies while this Parliament is not sitting no action can be taken under this Amendment until Parliament meets again, and until 40 days after that. The third objection has reference to public emergency, which is a circumstance which ought to be taken into view and provided for. How can the prompt meeting of such an emergency be reconciled with the stipulation that no action is to be taken until after the lapse of 40 days? In view of all these objections, which appear to me to be fatal, I can hardly believe that the proposal of the hon. and learned Gentleman will receive the general support of the House.

MR. TOMLINSON (Preston), said, the observations of the Prime Minister appeared to show what enormous confusion and difficulties would arise under this Bill. Apparently, if the Government had their way, they were to delegate any powers they might think proper, and all the House was to be allowed to do was at some subsequent period—perhaps months afterwards—to move a Vote of Censure, and the result would depend solely on whether the opponents of the excessive delegation could secure a majority. The Prime Minister had dealt with the Amendment as if it merely raised the question of a flaw in the delegation. But other questions than those relating to mere flaws were likely to arise, and no doubt the Mover of the Amendment had largely in his mind the question of what it was right to delegate. As to the difficulty suggested as likely to arise from the death of a Lord Lieutenant, surely that could be overcome by the insertion of words continuing existing powers until Parliament had an opportunity of deciding. And, finally, in regard to cases of public emergency, it was difficult to see how they could be provided against, especially in the event of a conflict of opinion between the subordinate Legislature and the Imperial Parliament. This Amendment exposed the dangers likely to arise from the passing of the Bill.

Question put, and negatived.

MR. HANBURY (Preston) rose to move—

In page 3, line 33, at end, to add,—“Provided always that the Lords Lieutenant of counties shall be appointed by the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland as representing Her Majesty.”

The Lord Lieutenant of a county held an essentially and entirely military office. He was the head of the reserved forces in the county; his position, indeed, was that of General of the district, reporting to the War Office, and recognising no other authority. Therefore, the Lord Lieutenant of a county was in a wholly and entirely different position from any other Executive officer. That being the case, he should have supposed that the Lord Lieutenant of a county, if there was no mention of him in the Bill, would have been appointed directly by the Secretary of State in England, or perhaps by the Secretary for War. But he understood the Chief Secretary to say the other day, in answer to a question put by him, that the Lords Lieutenant of counties would be appointed by the Lord Lieutenant, subject to instructions given by Her Majesty. He had three objections to raise to that mode of appointment. In the first place, he was not at all clear as to what “subject to instructions given by Her Majesty” might mean. That phrase was not to be found in the Bill; but, so far as he could gather from the Chief Secretary, it seemed to mean that the Lord Lieutenant, when he first went to Ireland, would have instructions given him by the Home Secretary. Those instructions were not, he understood, to be given to the Lord Lieutenant from time to time, but were general instructions given to the Lord Lieutenant when he first entered into Office. But it would be utterly impossible to give to the Lord Lieutenant general instructions beforehand as to the men whom he should appoint to the various offices; and, therefore, the Lord Lieutenant must clearly have instructions given to him from time to time. Then, again, these instructions were to be given by the Home Secretary. But the office of Lords Lieutenant of counties was a purely military office, with which the Home Secretary at present had nothing to do. There was a further difficulty. If he were correct in interpreting the words “subject to instructions given by Her Majesty,” the Lord Lieutenant would make these appointments on his own initiative, because he could not have instructions given to him beforehand. The result would be that the Lord Lieutenant would make appointments pleasing to the Executive of the Irish Government. But, as all military matters were taken out of the hands of the Irish Government, why should they enable the Lord Lieutenant to act on the advice of his Irish advisers in an essentially military matter? There was another reason why the Lord Lieutenant would be almost bound to consult the Irish Executive. In England, and he supposed in Ireland, the Lord Lieutenant of a county had a double capacity. He was a military officer reporting to the Secretary for War, and he was Custos Rotulorum, a purely civil office under the Home Secretary. That would happen in Ireland. As a military officer the Lord Lieutenant would be under the War Office, and as Custos Rotulorum he would be under the Lord Lieutenant. It would clearly be impossible to have two officers of State, for they might disagree, and if the offices were amalgamated the appointments must be put in the hands of either an Imperial Secretary of State or the Irish Executive. It was quite clear that the office was, and would always remain, a purely military office; and, that being so, he desired by the Amendment, which he begged to move, to secure that the appointment would continue to be made by the Imperial Government.

Amendment proposed,

In page 3, line 33, at end, add,—“Provided always that the Lords Lieutenant of counties shall be appointed by the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland as representing Her Majesty.”—(Mr. Hanbury.)

Question proposed, “That those words be there added.”

MR. SEXTON (Kerry, N.) said, that the hon. Member in the opening of his speech had stated that the Lords Lieutenant of counties in Ireland were essentially and entirely military officers, and at the end of his speech he distinctly showed that their functions were partly civil and partly military.

MR. HANBURY : I said that, as Custos Rotulorum, they were civil officers.

MR. SEXTON said that, therefore, the Amendment of the hon. Member could not be considered as if the functions of the Lord Lieutenant were purely and solely military. The hon. Member had spoken, in tones almost of horror, of the probability that the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland might choose the Lords Lieutenant of counties upon the advice of Ministers responsible to the people of Ireland. He should suppose that if such a thing were to happen it would be no great calamity. If the office were a purely military one, it would stand upon a different footing. But after the very lucid speech delivered the other day by the Secretary of State upon the question of the use of a military force in Ireland, he should imagine that no difficulty would arise, even if the Lords Lieutenant of counties were appointed by the Lord Lieutenant. The Home Secretary made it clear in that speech that when the question arises for the use of a military force, the power to call them out will rest on the Local Authorities ; and the question whether the force would be used or not would, he presumed, be one for the Secretary of State for War, acting on the advice of the Military Authorities. It was perfectly true that the functions attaching to the office of Lord Lieutenant were both military and civil ; but while the military functions attached to the office—which was the sole justification for this Amendment—were functions obsolete and unreal, his civil functions were very real and important to the welfare of the Irish people. The Lord Lieutenant of each county was Custos Rotulorum for the county. He might preside over meetings of local Magistrates—a function which was not only purely civil, but, to some extent, in opposition to military functions. The Lord Lieutenant of a county in Ireland, like the Lord Lieutenant of a county in England, advises the appointment of Justices of the Peace ; and not only does he advise them, but at the present time he practically controls them. [Nationalist cheers.] The House was familiar with the repeated and strenuous efforts made by Members in different parts of the House to accelerate the pace of the Lord Chancellor in dealing with appointments to the Commission of the Peace. That House during the present Session had found it necessary to pass a Resolution declaring in effect that the Lord Chancellor ought not to be, or need not be, controlled in the appointment of Justices of the Peace by the advice of the Lords Lieutenant. Some effect—not much—had followed. They in Ireland, who since the opening of the present Parliament had done all in their power with a view to having something done to popularise the Petty Sessions Bench by appointing persons to the Commission of the Peace who would have the confidence of the country, had found that after the lapse of a year or more a miserable and paltry addition of not quite 100 had been made to a Bench where there were already some 4,000 or 5,000 landlords and others—principally Tories. Why did he bring this matter before the House, and why was it relevant ? Because it showed that even the present Lord Chancellor, who was an official disposed to do what he could, found himself so hampered, controlled, and overpowered by this jurisdiction, and found himself unable to act fully up to the Resolution which had been passed. Therefore, he asserted that whilst the military functions of the Lord Lieutenant were obsolete, his civil functions, especially in regard to controlling appointments to the Commission of the Peace, were, at any rate in Ireland, a very real and important power. If the Amendment of the hon. Gentleman was accepted it was the Home Secretary, or some such officer, who would appoint the official who would control the appointments to the Commission of the Peace. Was that autonomy ? Was that Home Rule ? Was there anything more local, or was there anything which could be more fittingly controlled by a Government responsible to the people of Ireland, than the appointment of persons who, upon the local Benches, were to administer local law ? But the proposal was that the persons who still control this matter were to be appointed by the Home Secretary. So far as the office of Lord Lieutenant of a county could be held to be a military office, he had no objection that the functions should be exercised under Imperial control. But what about the civil functions ? If this officer was still to have those functions attached to his office they could not assent to the proposition that he should be appointed under Imperial authority. If, however, they agreed that he was to be appointed by the Home Secretary, then it would be necessary that the civil functions should be separate from his office, or that they would be assured that the Irish Parliament might pass an Act whereby the office of Custos Rotulorum might be an office separate from the Lord Chancellor of the county, and whereby the Lord Chancellor might act without advice in appointments to the Commission of the Peace, and that if he was to take any advice it should be the advice of persons other than those responsible to the Imperial Government.

*THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir C. RUSSELL, Hackney, S.): There is really no substantial difference between the hon. Member for Preston and the Government in this matter; and I think my hon. Friend who has just sat down has rather argued the question under a misapprehension as to the different functions discharged by Lieutenants of counties. My hon. Friend has argued as if the civil and military functions were necessarily combined in the same person. That is not so. Although the ordinary course is that the two functions are discharged by the same person, there are, I am informed, cases in which one person is the Lieutenant of the county and another the Custos Rotulorum. They are two separate offices, created by separate instruments, and each having distinct duties to perform in the county. The hon. Member for Kerry (Mr. Sexton) is right in saying that the military functions of the Lieutenants of counties would be under the direction of the Imperial Executive, and it is clearly so provided in the Bill. The hon. Member for Preston seems to doubt that. If he will look to the 3rd subsection of Clause 3, he will see that it reserves to the cognisance of the Imperial Government all matters relating to the Army, Navy, Militia, Volunteers, and other Military Forces. As to the question of the appointments of the Lieutenants of counties, I should say that they would be made by the Secretary of State for War, probably on his own Executive responsibility. If upon the advice of the Irish Government he should desire to invest in the same person the character of Custos Rotulorum, there is no reason why he should not do so; and if, on the other hand, there is a desire that different persons should be appointed, there is no reason why that should not be done. Again, the hon. Member for Preston seems to think that the instructions to the Lord Lieutenant from the Executive Government must be given once for all. That is not so. They will be given as the necessity for them arises. If, for instance, a question arose as to the appointment of a person to fulfil the military character of Lieutenant of a county, the Lord Lieutenant would be advised by the Executive officer in charge of military affairs.

MR. MACARTNEY (Antrim, S.) said, he should like to point out, in reference to what had fallen from the hon. and learned Gentleman, that it was not the case that in Ireland the offices held by the Lords Lieutenant of counties were divided, for there the Lords Lieutenant of counties, without an exception, also held the office of Custos Rotulorum. He understood that what the Attorney General said was that the Minister for War should appoint the Lord Lieutenant so far as his military duties were concerned; but who was the other Minister who was to recommend appointments so far as concerned the civil duties of a Lord Lieutenant of a county? The suggestion was that he should be appointed on the advice of an Irish Ministry. If the two duties were to be made separate, then the Lord Lieutenant would be appointed by the intervention of two Ministers; and, with great respect for the Attorney General, he might say that he had never heard of a case in Ireland where the office of Custos Rotulorum was separated from the other duties of the Lord Lieutenant. He could quite understand the difficulty the Government was in with reference to the filling up of such offices. If Home Rule should ever be established in Ireland, there would be some difficulty in finding gentlemen to discharge the duties of that important office. In future, either the Minister for War or the Irish Cabinet would have the appointment of Lords Lieutenant; but they would have to find them in some other strata than at present. He could quite understand what the selections would be like that would meet with the approval of the butchers and bakers and candlestick makers who were to constitute the majority of the two Houses of Parliament, and the fit and proper persons for the office of Lord Lieutenant of a county would no longer be found in Ireland.

MR. J. CHAMBERLAIN (Birmingham, W.): I rise to ask a question. I understand my hon. and learned Friend the Attorney General to say that the person who fulfils the military functions of the Lord Lieutenant of a county will in future be appointed in Ireland on the advice of the Imperial Government, but that the person who fulfils the function of Custos Rotulorum will be appointed in future on the advice of the Irish Government. Supposing that to be the case, it certainly seems to me to meet the claim of the hon. Member for Preston. Then I ask myself where in this Bill is it provided that the person who fulfils the military functions of the Lord Lieutenant of the county shall be appointed on the advice of the Imperial Government? My hon. and learned Friend says it is provided for by Sub-section 3 of Clause 3, which excludes from the purview of the Irish Parliament legislation connected with the Navy, Army, Militia, Volunteers, and other military matters. Then the question I want to ask my hon. and learned Friend is this—Does he say that with regard to every matter which is excluded from the purview of the Irish Legislature by Clauses 3 and 4, and as to which they are prohibited from legislating, that the Irish Executive is equally prohibited from advising? Is that the position? Does my hon. and learned Friend say that with regard to all these matters it will be illegal for the Irish Executive to advise or assist the Lord Lieutenant? If not, then his answer is no answer at all. We want to know whether Executive Acts are included in the provisions which deal with Legislative Acts?—whether, when you say that the Irish Parliament shall not legislate, do you also say that the Irish Executive shall not advise? Unless my hon. and learned Friend goes so far as to say that the Irish Executive will not have the power to advise the Lord Lieutenant upon any matter contained in Clauses 3 and 4 he has given no answer at all, and the Government will not have carried out what was stated to be their intention —namely, to preclude the Irish Executive from advising the Lord Lieutenant as to the appointment of persons who fulfil military functions.

MR. T. M. HEALY (Louth, N.) said, the right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Birmingham (Mr. J. Chamberlain) had laid down the strictest doctrine that he had ever heard. He had said that the Irish Government was to be prohibited from advising, and that it was to be made illegal if they did so.

MR. J. CHAMBERLAIN: I beg the hon. Gentleman's pardon. I did not say anything of the kind. I asked my hon. and learned Friend the Attorney General whether if, as he had stated, the Amendment was met by Sub-section 3 of Clause 3, the Irish Executive would not have the right of advice in all the matters contained in Clauses 3 and 4?

MR. T. M. HEALY said, that the right of advice was one thing, and the right of accepting or rejecting that advice was another thing; and what the right hon. Gentleman complained of was that it was not made illegal for the Irish Government to advise in these matters. What he understood the Attorney General to say was this—that the Lord Lieutenant would act upon the advice of the Imperial Government, and not on the advice of the Irish Government; but if all Birmingham was massed together it could not prevent the Irish Government, no matter what mean persons they might be in the royal estimation of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Birmingham, from tendering advice, and he presumed they all knew that there would be some anxiety on the part of the two Governments to run on the same lines. It did not follow that the advice would be taken at all. They might offer advice to the French or Chinese Government, or tender good advice to the Birmingham Town Council or the Warwickshire County Council; but it did not follow that the advice would be taken. There was no obligation on the part of the Imperial Government to accept the advice of the Irish Government. As he understood the view presented by the Attorney General, the Amendment was entirely out of Order, because it was already provided for in Clause 3. The hon. Member for Preston laid down the doctrine that this was a military office, and that, therefore, being a military office, it ought to he excluded from the control of the Irish Government. Why did the hon. Member not move an Amendment that drummer boys, or quartermaster sergeants, or corporals, or gentlemen connected with the Yeomanry or the Navy should not be appointed by the Irish Government? So far as the military functions of a Lord Lieutenant of a county were concerned, they were an anachronism. The Lord Lieutenant of the county which he represented was Lord Massereene. Well, he should like to get a sketch of Lord Massereene to discover how he spent his time; and he believed if they found out about Lord Massereene they would be far from consulting him in connection with any military function, although he believed he once held an appointment in the Antrim Militia. What the Opposition wanted was the control of the Magistrates. It was in the Lord Lieutenant's function of Custos Rotulorum that they wanted to attack him; and the hon. Member for Antrim, with his fine aristocratic qualities, like all the gentlemen who came over to Ireland a few years ago, said that under the Irish Parliament they would have to take these men out of a new strata. They all knew that that was the object of the Bill. The object of the Bill was, as he understood, to give to the Irish people as a whole the control of their own affairs, and to give the landlord such control as their numbers entitled them to, and no more.

[At the conclusion of the hon. Gentleman's speech there appeared to be some disorder in the Strangers' Gallery.]

*MR. SPEAKER: Serjeant, will you see who was clapping his hands, and exclude him from the House as a stranger?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: The hon. and learned Member who has just sat down gives us a very fair idea of the amount of sweetness and light that can be introduced into our Debates on this Bill, and I cannot honestly say that the loss the House has sustained from the long silence of Nationalist Members has been so great as at one time may have been supposed. I do not think there is any great divergence as to the broad principles upon which we ought to proceed. It is admitted, in the first place, that the Lord Lieutenant and Custos Rotulorum are two offices which are almost invariably associated in one individual; it is admitted he has a double function—a military and a civil function. If the view of gentlemen who are going to control the new Irish Government in the future is that they should return to the old system under which local justice on a large scale was administered by an unpaid Magistracy, appointed, as they are to be appointed, chiefly from one political Party, then the evils which Irish reformers had felt to be incidental to that system will probably re-appear in a new and aggravated form; and you will return to an ascendancy of a new order of men, and under conditions far more tyrannical than the form of magisterial ascendancy which was endeavoured to be put an end to by paid Magistrates. I will assume that you can distinguish between the Lord Lieutenant in his civil capacity and the Lord Lieutenant in his military capacity, and I will assume—though the case is doubtful—that it is the Lord Lieutenant in his civil capacity—or, I would rather say, the Custos Rotulorum—who recommends the Magistrates, and I will proceed to consider what you are going to do with the Lord Lieutenant in his military capacity. The learned Attorney General has laid down the proposition that the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland must never act upon the advice of his Irish Ministers in any of those cases which are excepted from their jurisdiction by Clause 3 and Clause 4 in this Bill. I hope that is the intention of the Government, but I see nothing whatever in this Bill to make that intention operative or effective. There is an Amendment lower down on the Paper standing in the name of the noble Lord the Member for Rochester (Viscount Crauborne) which puts in explicit language what I understand to be the implicit theory of the Government. He proposes to lay down that the Lord Lieutenant shall not do any act upon the advice of the Executive Committee until he has received Her Majesty's instructions in respect of any matters upon which the Irish Legislature are disabled from legislating under Sections 3 and 4. If that Amendment is accepted it appears to me the pious opinion of the Attorney General would be effectually carried out; but as the Bill stands it is only a pious opinion, and there is nothing to prevent the Lord Lieutenant from taking the advice of his Executive Committee, which nobody can prevent them from tendering, even though it relates to matters with which the Irish Government are not, by this Bill, allowed to meddle. I hope the Government will accept words to make the Bill square with the professions of the Attorney General. My hon. Friend who moved the Amendment has thought it right—and I agree with him—even if the proposition advanced by my hon. Friend were accepted, to mention explicitly the Lord Lieutenant. I think he has good reason to do so, because the functions of Lord Lieutenant and Custos Rotulorum are partly military, and therefore reserved to the Imperial Government, and partly civil, and therefore reserved to the Irish Executive. Unless you point out in the Bill that you mean to reserve the Lord Lieutenant as military officer to the Imperial Government great difficulty will be found in deciding between his duties. When these offices of Lord Lieutenant and Custos Rotulorum are always held by the same person, if you wish to introduce a new system in which the duties should be cut in half, one to be labelled “military” and the other “civil,” then I say you ought to have words in your Bill to indicate your intention. I hope the Government will carry out what they and we agree should be our policy, and if they do I do not see why we should not bring the discussion to a close satisfactory to every Party.

*MR. DANE (Fermanagh, N.) said, that, as had been stated by the hon. Member who moved this Amendment, these two offices were quite distinct. The Lieutenant of a county was more or less a military officer; the Custos Rotulorum in Ireland up to 1877 was the custodian of the Rolls of that Court. The office of Custos Rotulorum was a very ancient office, created so far back as the time of Henry VIII., and in the 1st of William and Mary there was a statutory enactment providing that the office of Custos Rotulorum should be created under the Sign Manual of the Sovereign, and prescribing that the duty of that office should be to appoint a fit and proper person as the Clerk of the Peace of the particular county, to be the custodian of the deeds enrolled in that county—in other words, the custodian of the Rolls of the particular county; and although it might be that was still the practice in England, he was not aware that it was the practice in Ireland. He was inclined to think that in Ireland, under the provisions of an Act passed by that House in 1877, the position, or at least the duties, of Custos Rotulorum were entirely taken away, because under that Act, which was entitled “The County Court Officers Act, 1877,” the duties which were formerly vested in the Custos Rotulorum of counties to appoint Clerks of the Peace and to carry out the duties appertaining to their offices were taken from the Custos Rotulorum and vested in the Government. Since 1877 the office of Clerk of the Peace had no longer belonged as of right to the Lieutenant of a county as Custos Rotulorum, but was now vested in the Government of the day, and the appointment to that office was now exercised by the Government under the hand of the Lord Lieutenant. He found that by 1 & 2 William IV., c. 17, the power of appointing Custodes Rotulorum in Ireland ceased to be under the Sign Manual of the Sovereign, and was delegated to the then Lord Lieutenant of the day. At all events, it was clear that up to 1877 the Lord Lieutenant in Ireland had the power by Letters Patent to appoint the Custodes Rotulorum of the several counties in Ireland, but his contention was that the office, or, at any rate, if not the office, the duties and position, of Custos Rotulorum in Ireland ceased on the passing of the County Court Officers Act of 1877. The duties of a Lieutenant of a County in Ireland were entirely different to those of Custos Rotulorum. The Lieutenants of counties were appointed under Patent by the Lord Lieutenant or Governor General of Ireland, and their duties were of a military character. They nominated to all the appointments in the Militia Force, and they submitted to the Lord Chancellor the names of gentlemen fit and proper to be appointed to the Commission of the Peace. The Commission of the Peace, which was issued by the Lord Chancellor, was, under the old régime, lodged in the office of the Custos Rotulorum of the county, and was gazetted in the Gazette as having been so lodged. There was practically no longer any Custos Rotulorum. What existed was simply the Lieutenant of the county appointed by the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland under the Patent of the Great Seal of Ireland. He thought it very desirable that the House should know what exactly would be the position of the Lieutenants of counties under this Bill. The Attorney General stated that these two offices might be filled by two different persons. That might be so in England, but in Ireland no one had ever known different persons to hold the offices of Lieutenant and Custos Rotulorum. They had always been held by the same person; therefore, it was very desirable they should know exactly how these offices would stand in future. It was a very important thing, having regard to the powers the Lieutenants of counties in Ireland had imposed on them, to know whether that power would be under the control of the Irish Executive acting on the advice of the Irish Privy Council, or whether those powers would be delegated from the Imperial Government to the Lieutenants of counties, who would, therefore, be answerable to that House for the appointments they made? If it should be thought desirable that the Lieutenants of counties should no longer have power to nominate Justices of the Peace, then some provision should be put in the Bill to that effect; but in the important office of Lieutenant of a county who had, as such, command of the local force and the nomination of the officers to the local Militia, it was essential they should know which Government was to have control of the Lieutenants in future. Were they to be under the control of the Imperial Government or of the War Department, or was the matter to be relegated to the Irish Lord Lieutenant acting upon the advice of his Irish Executive, the governing members of whose Privy Council would, no doubt, be some of the hon. Gentlemen below the Gangway, who had been so pronounced in their language as to what they would and would not do when this Bill became the law of the land? He should like to hear from the Treasury Bench how this matter was to be regulated. It would be some satisfaction to know that the Government who produced this Bill, which dealt so vitally with the interests of the loyal classes in Ireland, knew what it was they had been doing, and that when they proposed to confide to the Irish Executive and the Irish Lord Lieutenant the control and government of this matter the people of England and Scotland should, at any rate, know what it was it was intended should be left in the hands of the future Irish Parliament.

MR. J. MORLEY: The hon. and learned Gentleman has asked me under what authority at this moment the Lieutenants of counties are chosen by the Lord Lieutenant. The answer to the hon. and learned Member is a perfectly clear and simple one. The Lieutenants of counties in Ireland are appointed by the Lord Lieutenant under a section of the Militia Act, 1882, which vests power in Her Majesty with reference to the appointment of the Lieutenants and Vice Lieutenants of counties, this power, subject to any direction from Her Majesty, to be exercised by the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland. As the right hon. Gentleman the Leader of the Opposition has said, there is no difference whatever of views between the gentlemen opposite, ourselves, and the gentlemen below the Gangway so far as the Lieutenant of a county is a military officer, or represents the persons controlling, to some extent, the military forces of the Crown. There is no contention in any part of the House that the nomination of that officer should be withdrawn from the Imperial control. We do not think that the words of the hon. Member for Preston are necessary, and the words themselves are not strictly accurate. For instance, these are not Lords Lieutenant of counties, but Lieutenants. However, as we are agreed—though we do not think the words are necessary—we are willing to accept the Amendment of the hon. Member for Preston, making the words correct by leaving out the word “Lords” before “Lieutenant.”

MR. HANBURY said, he would at once agree to the omission of the word.

The word “Lords” omitted.

*MR. BLAKE (Longford, S.) thought that not a single person dissented from the view that, as far as the civil functions of persons who would be Lieutenants were concerned, those officers ought to be appointed on the advice of the Irish Executive; and nobody dissented from the view that in their military capacity the Irish Executive should have nothing whatever to do with the appointment. But there was a difference of opinion as to what the existing state of things was. They heard some hon. Gentlemen say that the Lord Lieutenant qua Lord Lieutenant had certain civil powers, and it was very important that they should not stereotype the powers of the Lord Lieutenant, if they comprised civil powers; in this Act while they were recognising the fact that the appointment of that personage as a military officer ought to be with the Imperial Executive. He trusted it was perfectly understood that the view upon which the Amendment was made was that the offices were now actually separate, or, if not separate, that no introduction of these words indicated that it should not be within the competence of the Irish Legislature to set up a separate officer for the discharge of all civil functions which might be found to be in the hands of the Lord Lieutenant at this day. They could not interfere with his military functions; but it must be understood that the Irish Legislature had full right to pass an Act which should deal with all those civil functions which were, in one way or another, exercised by the Lord Lieutenant, had full right to separate them and provide, if necessary, for their discharge, an officer who should be appointed under the advice of the Irish Executive.

MAJOR DARWIN (Staffordshire, Lichfield) said, as this was originally his Amendment, he hoped he might be allowed to say a few words upon it. He had endeavoured on every single stage of the Bill to bring this question before the House, and only two days before the conclusion of the whole subject had he been able to get any answer from the Government. He spoke at some length a week ago, and no reply was vouchsafed to him. With regard to what the hon. Member for North Kerry had said about the duties of a Lord Lieutenant being obsolete, he thought that was an entire mistake, because, under certain circumstances, these duties might become of very great importance. How it was possible to make it certain that the Lord Lieutenant, in appointing the Lord Lieutenant of a county, would act upon the advice of the Imperial and not the Irish Executive he could not conceive. It was a good thing to have this Amendment accepted, but it seemed to him by no means a certain safeguard that the Lord Lieutenant would not be influenced to a great extent by the Irish Executive. In the Amendment which he originally proposed he suggested that the Lords Lieutenant of counties should be in all cases appointed by the Secretary of State for War. That would have been a far better arrangement for carrying out the views of this Amendment.

Amendment, as amended, agreed to.

MR. T. H. BOLTON (St. Pancras, N.) moved the following Amendment:—Page 3, lines 37 and 38, leave out “or as may be directed by Irish Act.” This matter, he said, was, to a certain extent, discussed in Committee; but anyone who referred to the pages of the official Parliamentary Debates would see that the discussion was not a long discussion and was rather unsatisfactory, and it was in the hope that the Government might have possibly re-considered the matter, rather than with the view of having any lengthened discussion upon it, that he ventured to bring it before the House at this stage. The sub-section of the clause to which the Amendment referred provided—

“There shall be an Executive Committee of the Privy Council of Ireland to aid and advise in the government of Ireland, being of such numbers and comprising persons holding such offices under the Crown as Her Majesty may think fit, or as may be directed by Irish Act.”

The Amendment he was proposing was that the words, “or as may be directed by Irish Act,” might be omitted. He would remind the House that in the Home Rule Bill of 1886 there was no such provision as that which he was asking to have omitted. In the Bill of 1886 the words of the clause were—

“The Executive Government of Ireland shall continue vested in Her Majesty, and shall be carried on by the Lord Lieutenant on behalf of Her Majesty with the aid of such officers and such Council as to Her Majesty may from time to time seem fit.”

He did not find there was any such provision as that contained in the present Bill in any of those Colonial Constitutions which formed the subjects of Acts passed by this Parliament; therefore, there was no precedent, as far as the term “precedent” might apply, for this proposal of the Government. He considered that unless this Amendment were adopted there would be practical inconvenience connected with the proposal of the Government. If a hard-and-fast rule were laid down by the Irish Legislature that the holders of particular offices should ex officio be Members of the Cabinet, that would largely limit the discretion of the Lord Lieutenant in selecting the fittest men to fill these offices. Men might be fitted to fill administrative offices, whilst at the same time it might be undesirable that they should be Members of the Cabinet. The course he suggested would give greater freedom to the Lord Lieutenant in selecting Members of his Government and greater elasticity in the Party arrangements which would be necessary to a responsible Government; therefore, for practical purposes, it would be much more convenient that this clause should be amended as he proposed. Why insert it at all? What good did it do? Whether the offices were selected by the Lord Lieutenant for Cabinet rank or fixed by the Irish Legislature, the Government as a whole, and every Member of it, must have the confidence of the Representative Body, and it was perfectly unnecessary to limit or put restrictions on the discretion of the Viceroy in selecting his Council. The Prime Minister a short time since made some observations on another Amendment which bore to a certain extent on this question. The right hon. Gentleman doubted whether it was desirable to transfer Executive duties to Parliament. He (Mr. Bolton) could not imagine higher Executive functions than the chief Executive Authority of a country selecting the Ministers to carry out Executive duties, and he understood from what the right hon. Gentleman said that he was not favourable to the transfer of Executive powers to a representative Assembly. That argument bore upon the present subject, because the proposal in the Bill was that the Queen should not have full power to select her advisers—having the confidence of the Irish Legislature, of course—but that the Legislature itself should limit that discretionary control by fixing the particular offices which should confer Cabinet rank. Another serious objection was that as the sub-section at present stood it was uncertain what it meant. In the sub-section the words were—

Mr. T. H. Bolton

“Comprising persons holding such offices under the Crown as Her Majesty may think fit, or as may be directed by Irish Act.”

Which of these two alternatives was it to be? The Solicitor General read it as—

“Holding such offices under the Crown as Her Majesty may think fit until the Irish Legislature shall otherwise enact.”

That was the reading which the Solicitor General put before the House when the subject was considered in Committee on July 4. He had the greatest possible respect for the Solicitor General and for his opinion, but he must say he did not follow him in his reading of the sub-section. He supposed the English language had some definite meaning even in Acts of Parliament. Here the words were clear and precise; and if they were to give the grammatical meaning to those words, the meaning was that these duties should be discharged by officers appointed by Her Majesty or under Irish Act. If the Solicitor General intended that the appointment should rest with Her Majesty until the Irish Legislature should pass an Act to take this matter from the entire control of Her Majesty and provide for it in another way, then words should be used to carry that intention out. At present it was uncertain; and as the words seemed to him to be useless, unnecessary, and objectionable, he ventured to move that they be omitted.

Amendment proposed,

In page 3, lines 37 and 38, to leave out the words “or as may be directed by Irish Act.”—(Mr. T. H. Bolton.)

Question proposed, “That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Bill.”

MR. W. E. GLADSTONE, who was indistinctly heard, said: I am very sorry the hon. Member has thought it necessary to take the course he has. This question was decided in July last, and I am bound to say that the hon. Member has done nothing on the present occasion to render the views he entertains more satisfactory. If the Irish Privy Council were under the control of the Executive, as that of England is, there would be no necessity for a clause of this kind, but some provision has to be made, or else the Lord Lieutenant might, on occasions, be without advisers. Consequently,

Her Majesty intervenes in her Imperial capacity, and supplies the deficiency. This is a provision that grows out of the necessity of the case, and it is intended as a temporary provision ; but the hon. Member for North St. Pancras (Mr. T. H. Bolton) desires to make it permanent. The doctrine of the hon. Member is that, though a responsible Irish Government is to be recognised, yet the Irish Legislature is to be deprived of the powers necessary for responsible Government. Is that a rational proposition ? The hon. Gentleman has, in support of his proposition, advanced no argument except that the Irish Legislature might pass an absurd Act. That is the charitable supposition of the hon. Member, and that is the policy which the hon. Member has thought fit to pursue all along in regard to this Bill in his irresponsible capacity, and this comes from an hon. Member who, it was understood, was returned to Parliament to support the Bill. That is the position the hon. Gentleman assumes in his irresponsible capacity, which I presume will last for a certain time. It is impossible for the House to know what constitution of the Irish Executive Committee will be found desirable ; but we may assume that some grains of common sense, which abound so much in the mind of the hon. Gentleman, may prevail even in the minds of the Members of the Irish Legislature, and we may hope that his perception and his charity—if it can—will be enlarged. The business, functions, and offices of the Executive Committee are purely Irish affairs, and ought to be placed within the competency of the Irish Legislature. If the Irish Legislature passes absurd Bills it will itself in the first instance suffer, and it will have the same means for mending its way as is possessed by other Legislative Bodies. The British Parliament has made shameful mistakes in the past, and it must be remembered that in Ireland, as in England, we can rely upon the people to correct the mistakes of the Legislature. The Amendment completely traverses the whole intention of the Bill, and we cannot be parties to reversing the decision already arrived at.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR : I fail, Sir, entirely to understand the line which the right hon. Gentleman has thought proper to take. He has attacked, I will not say with unusual violence—because he not infrequently shows a good deal of violence in his attacks—but he has attacked with great violence the hon. Member opposite for bringing forward a subject which was undoubtedly discussed on the Committee stage. This is, however, exactly one of the topics on which discussion ought to be repeated, because it is one of those on which the Government have never attempted a rational reply, on which they have not even now succeeded in finding a rational reply, and on which we might have had some reason to suppose that the consideration of the plain meaning of the English language would have induced the Government to attach some weight to the arguments which have been advanced. The solitary answer given by the Prime Minister is that this Amendment is very improper, because the Irish Government, if they are to be illumined by any rays of common sense, must be thought sufficiently endowed with that valuable quality to be able to make some regulation as regards the holders of office. The right hon. Gentleman is angry with anyone who supposes that the Irish Legislature could make mistakes in this matter, but he has been unable to finish his own speech without telling us that the British Government has made infamous mistakes.

MR. W. E. GLADSTONE : I did not say “infamous.” That is a favourite word of the right hon. Gentleman.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR : I used the word “infamous,” but I learn from my friends near me that the exact word employed by the right hon. Gentleman was “shameful.” I give the right hon. Gentleman any benefit he may derive from that substitution of the Anglo-Saxon for the Latin. The right hon. Gentleman thinks it absolutely absurd for us to suggest for a moment that the Irish Legislature would be guilty of folly.

MR. W. E. GLADSTONE : I suggested it myself.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR : Why does the right hon. Gentleman allow a licence to himself which he will not allow to the hon. Gentleman the Member for North St. Pancras ? The fact remains that we are not allowed to contemplate these grave errors of judgment by the new Irish Legislature. I do not wish again to raise the question of policy involved in the sub-section. For my own part, I shall be prepared to accept—not to agree with, but to accept—more or less the decision the House arrived at in Committee. What we say is that the words of the Government do not carry out their own view. The intentions of the Government, as expressed on the Committee stage, and as repeated by the right hon. Gentleman to-day, are these—that after the Bill is passed, and before the new Constitution begins to work, there must evidently be an interval in which there will not be a Committee of the Privy Council to advise the Lord Lieutenant, and they would provide for that interval by enabling the Crown in the first instance to appoint the officers who are to constitute the new Irish Cabinet; but that when the Irish Government is fully equipped the Irish Legislature should name the officers which are to carry Cabinet rank. That may be a good or a bad policy, but it is not the policy of the Bill. The policy of the Bill is that there are to be two co-ordinate powers—Her Majesty and the Irish Legislature—and that each is to have an equal finger in the pie in settling the constitution of the Irish Cabinet. That is an absurd position. We have pointed out before, and point out again, that according to no known interpretation of the English language does the word “or” mean “until.” If the Government mean “until” why do they not say so? During the seven weeks that have elapsed since this matter was discussed before surely the Government could have studied the grammar of their own Bill and seen what must be the inevitable conclusion to be drawn from the words they have adopted, and it is not too much for us to ask them on this the proper stage to put the Bill in a shape in which it will carry out, at all events, their own intentions. Why the right hon. Gentleman should think this a favourable opportunity for attacking the hon. Member for St. Pancras simply because he has endeavoured to make sense of the right hon. Gentleman’s own measure really passes my comprehension.

SIR H. JAMES (Bury, Lancashire): I should like to say that I think the Prime Minister was very ungrateful to the hon. Member for North St. Pancras. This Amendment will have the effect, it may be, of saving a great deal of confusion and conflict again hereafter. I cannot conceive that the Government can do other than listen to arguments to show how that condition of things can be avoided. The Prime Minister said, as I understand, that the Member for North St. Pancras should not have brought forward this Amendment, because he had been returned to Parliament to support this Bill. Well, I do not know what pledges hon. Members could have given to support this Bill. I know there were two Members who declined to support the Bill; one of them was the present Secretary of State for Scotland, who, when asked whether he would pledge himself to support the Bill that was to be brought in by the Prime Minister for the better government of Ireland, declined to do so until he had seen the Bill, and he said it would be very unreasonable for anybody to pledge himself until he knew its contents. The other Member who refused to pledge himself was the hon. Member for North St. Pancras, who refused altogether to give any adhesion to any Home Rule Bill, and who came into Parliament free in respect to that matter. I am sure if the Prime Minister had known the position the hon. Member occupied he would not have wished to introduce into this discussion such an assertion respecting the hon. Member. May I point out, in addition to what has fallen from the Leader of the Opposition, that I have never been able to understand the construction put upon this clause by the Solicitor General. We pointed out before that you must look at the words not only as they appear here, but at other words that are now introduced into this sub-section, so that after the words “as Her Majesty may think fit” you must introduce the words “from time to time,” and so the section will read—that these officers are to be nominated—

“As Her Majesty may from time to time think fit, or as may be directed by Irish Act.”

I am sure the Solicitor General has good reason for what he says, and I do not wish now to come into conflict with him; but I do say that any ordinary human being reading these words “as Her Majesty may from time to time think fit, or as may be directed by Irish Act” could never put that construction upon them which the hon. and learned Gentleman and the Prime Minister have put upon them. I have no doubt of the intentions of the Government, but they are not expressed in the Bill, and you cannot ask the Judges to get rid of what would be nonsensical. Judges cannot remedy the error on the part of the House by making what is nonsense into sense. The result of the clause as it stands will be alternate nominations to these offices—one by the advisers of the Crown and another by the Legislature. This will give rise to immense conflict. It is this friction and conflict that we anticipate. With their eyes open the Government are adding this to the others. The Executive Government is a Government to advise the Crown; the Crown is responsible, according to the Constitution, for the nomination of persons whose duty it is to advise the Crown, and it should not be left in the hands of the Legislature to say who should be the advisers of the Crown. That selection should be made by the Crown under the Constitutional rule of seeking those advisers from the majority of the Irish Legislature. This extraordinary departure from the Bill of 1886, which is said to have been introduced for a temporary purpose only, will create a permanent change. For all time you are going to say the Crown shall be fettered by the choice of individuals, and they make the designation of office equivalent to the choice of individuals. If you limit the elasticity of the choice of individuals, and go on and say that the Irish Legislature shall choose the office and the Crown shall not, then again comes the limitation upon the Crown. I say is it an exceptional thing. We have no such power. We have never said that holders of certain offices must be advisers of the Crown. Under the circumstances, it is wrong for the hon. Member for North St. Pancras to ask the Government to do something to prevent the confusion that will inevitably arise if this Amendment is not accepted?

MR. SEXTON (Kerry, N.): Notwithstanding what the right hon. and learned Gentleman has said, I think it is somewhat surprising that the hon. Member for North St. Pancras should be the Member of this House to move this Amendment, having already moved it in Committee.

MR. T. H. BOLTON said, he did not move it in Committee.

MR. SEXTON: He supported it in Committee, and there is very little difference in the two. If the hon. Gentleman had not the originality to move it in Committee—

MR. T. H. BOLTON said, he had the Amendment on the Paper, but there was another Amendment dealing with the same point which had priority.

MR. SEXTON: The distinction upon a matter of fact has now been greatly reduced, because it appears he put the Amendment down in Committee, and now returns to it on Report. The hon. Member was returned to this House by the electors of North St. Pancras after a discussion of this question which lasted for several years; we discussed nothing else for several years; upon the basis that Ireland was to have a Legislature of her own and an Executive Government responsible to that Legislature—and I greatly mistake the Liberal electors of North St. Pancras if they did not intend, when they elected the hon. Gentleman, that the Executive Government responsible to the Irish Legislature was to be chosen by the will of the Irish Legislature as the Executive Governments for every colony and dominion of the Crown are chosen.

MR. T. H. BOLTON: I should be allowed to explain.

MR. SEXTON: After I have done.

*MR. SPEAKER: The whole matter is rather a digression. It is not relevant to the matter before the House what the electors understood when they elected the hon. Gentleman.

MR. SEXTON: I presume one is entitled to comment on the action of a Member of this House from the point of view of those who elected him. [Cries of "Order!"] The Speaker's language has been carefully guarded, and I intend to obey the Speaker in a larger sense than even he imposes upon me, and I shall not pursue the question. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Bury appears to me to have misapprehended the force of the clause. He says the Executive Committee in Ireland will be the Ministers of the Crown, and the Crown is responsible for their appointment, and that this clause proposes to fetter the choice of individuals by the Crown. I submit with every confidence this clause does nothing of the kind. This clause only says what offices are to be held by persons who are to be the Executive Government of Ireland. Suppose even an Irish Act had been passed dictating what offices should be held by the persons who are to be the Government of Ireland even after the Act had been passed, the appointment of individuals that fill these offices will still be the act of the Crown. Therefore, there is nothing whatever in the clause limiting the choice of the Crown in the appointment of individuals.

SIR H. JAMES: Suppose the Irish Government passed an Act saying there should be only three officers, that would fetter the choice of the Crown, because there would be only three advisers.

MR. SEXTON: In the first place, the Crown could veto the Act. One cannot fail to observe in the course of these discussions how very frequently gentlemen, even right hon. and learned Gentlemen, ignore the powers and safeguards of the Act which it is not convenient for them to refer to, and fix themselves entirely on others. I am entitled to take all the powers of the Act into view, and to say that if the Irish Parliament did pass an Act as I think so unsuitable as one providing only three offices entitling persons to Cabinet rank in Ireland, the Imperial Government would be here; they would review the Act, and if it fettered the Crown, veto it, and thereby urge the Irish Legislature to make a more fitting enactment. To return to the main argument of the right hon. Gentleman, that this clause fetters the discretion of the Crown in the choice of individuals, again I submit with every confidence it does nothing of the kind, because the power contemplated is only to enable the Irish Legislature to pass an Act to say what offices shall be Cabinet offices. And even if the Act had become law the function of appointing individuals to fill these offices would still be the function of the Crown. Apart from legal formularism, what is practically the course of the Constitution in regard to the appointment of the Cabinet in England and in every Colony and Dominion of the Crown? You say the appointment is with the Crown. How is it in practice? Why, the Crown has no choice in the matter either here or anywhere else. The people elect the Chamber and dictate who are to be the Government. That excites merriment amongst the minor politicians of the Birmingham school. But the people elect the majority of this House, and the Crown—put it in what form you please—the Crown has to appoint the Ministers whom the majority will accept. What is the rule in England and in every Colony and Dominion and Dependency of the British Empire will also be the rule in Ireland, and that is the substance of the matter. The right and the power of the Irish Legislature to say what persons shall be the Ministers of the Crown in Ireland is their inevitable right according to Government usage. At the same time, this clause does not in form withdraw from the Crown the right of nominating individuals, yet in substance, whatever the language of the clause, the power in operation will be the same as the power in Canada, Australia, the Cape, or anywhere else. As to the grammar of this clause, of which a great deal has been said, it is suggested that as the clause is drawn it simply gives an alternative between Her Majesty and the Irish Act, and that they may come into conflict with each other. The one reply is that Her Majesty may veto any Irish Act, and that puts an end to any chance of conflict. If you are to have two powers one must necessarily act first, and the other comes second. For some time after the passing of the Home Rule Act an Irish Act cannot be passed. There will be a Government in Ireland for some months before there is a Legislature; and after there is a Legislature some time will elapse—years may elapse—before an Act can be passed; therefore, it is evident that within that period Her Majesty, and Her Majesty alone, can exercise the power designated in this clause, because no other authority will be in existence for the purpose, or, at any rate, can make its will effective. Therefore, the power of Her Majesty stands first, and that disposes of the argument that this is simply an alternative. On the contrary, it gives Her Majesty priority. Then comes the Irish Act, and it is evident that the intention, whatever astute grammarians may say, is that there is a period within which Her Majesty will act first, and then comes the Irish Act. I submit that this is not the simple alternative, but the provision of two powers, one to act within the period when there is no second power, and the second acts after the legislative function comes into existence, and it cannot be contended that the power of Her Majesty comes after the passing of the Irish Act. The power will remain after the passing of the Irish Act, because Her Majesty will have to assent to that Act. The supposition put forward by the right hon. and learned Gentleman (Sir H. James), that under the clause as it is drawn, and after Her Majesty has assented to the Irish Act giving Ireland the same powers as are exercised in every Colony of the Crown with regard to the Cabinet, Her Majesty would desire again to interfere with the operation of an Act to which the Royal Assent has been given—which is the argument of the grammarians in this matter—is a useless and somewhat irritating artifice. The language of the clause is as clear as need be, as clear as it usually is in an Act of Parliament, and much more clear than in many of the Acts with the framing of which the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Bury had a good deal to do.

MR. T. H. BOLTON: I would ask to be allowed to make a quotation from my election address.

*MR. SPEAKER: Order, order! The hon. Member will not pursue that question. There is no necessity.

MR. BYRNE said, he thought it a great pity that a discussion should be necessary as to the true meaning of the clause. As far as he was concerned, he differed entirely from the last speaker, who, he thought, put a wrong construction on the words as they stood. The question was one of principle, and the powers were not alternative but collateral. That, to his mind, speaking as a lawyer, was quite clear. But to put the matter beyond doubt the words might be altered so as to read—

“And comprising persons holding such offices under the Crown in the first instance as Her Majesty may think fit, and afterwards as may be directed by Irish Act.”

If the Government would accept those words they would express what the Government had declared they meant, and what the hon. Member for North Kerry thought they meant. If those words were adopted they would then be able to divide on the question of principle, and not on the question of obscure English. He would move to insert those words.

*MR. SPEAKER: The hon. Member cannot move those words here. They would come before the Amendment already before the House.

MR. BYRNE: I put them forward for the consideration of the Government.

MR. MACARTNEY (Antrim, S.) said, that whatever substance there might be in the Constitutional theory of the hon. Member for North Kerry it was not the principle on which the Prime Minister had based his opposition to the Amendment. The right hon. Gentleman had distinctly told them that the clause was drafted in this particular way in order to meet the peculiarities of the Irish Privy Council, and he had told them that in the previous discussion those peculiarities had been fully ventilated, and that the House had decided on them. He (Mr. Macartney) must demur most strongly to that presentation of the case. The Government, in opposing the Amendment, had said nothing at all about the peculiarities of the Irish Privy Council. There were no such peculiarities, and no Member of the Government had been able to point any out. Even supposing that the Irish Privy Council was a Body vicious in its character, and origin, and practice, that would be no ground for drafting a clause which was ridiculous and nonsensical, and which was without precedent. There were two plain courses, either of which the Government might have taken. They might have followed the precedent the House had set in regard to all other subordinate Constitutions—that was to say, they might have left the regulation of the Cabinet Offices in the Irish Legislature to the Crown, or they might have left it entirely to the Irish Legislature; but they had not taken either of those plain courses. They had taken a course most incongruous and inconvenient, and which threw upon the whole of this important section the most obvious criticism. The hon. Member for North Kerry had attempted to argue—as the Solicitor General had done previously—that there could be no possibility of conflict between Her Majesty's Representative in the exercise of the veto and the Irish Parliament. He (Mr. Macartney) could not agree with that. Supposing the Irish Legislature proposed, from motives of economy, to reduce the number of Cabinet Offices to three—the Crown having previously appointed eight — and supposing the Crown thought that was not a competent number of advisers, would the hon. Member for Kerry be prepared to say that would not be not only a probable but a reasonable cause of friction between the Lord Lieutenant, as representing Her Majesty, and the Irish Parliament?

MR. SEXTON was understood to dissent.

MR. MACARTNEY: Putting aside motives of economy, supposing from motives which they might easily imagine to prevail in Ireland the Irish Government wanted to find a large number of offices of dignity, with fat salaries attached, for supporters who could not easily be left out—for there were many leaders of the Irish race, not only here, but in the United States, South America, and elsewhere—one of the first acts of the Legislature would be to promote a Bill, which would, of course, pass through both Houses without the slightest difficulty, to enlarge the offices which would give Cabinet rank. That would be the converse of the economical theory which had been urged. It might be Her Majesty's Government would say that in the interests of economy the Imperial Parliament through the Crown would have to enforce the veto. There, again, was a probable cause of friction. The clause as it stood was drawn in such a way that even from the Prime Minister's point of view it was objectionable, because it would create at the very commencement of the new Government in Ireland a situation in which friction might arise between the Irish Executive and the official who would represent the Crown in Ireland. On these grounds he thought the Amendment of the hon. Member for North St. Pancras a reasonable one. Either that ought to be accepted or the Prime Minister ought deliberately to say that they would not retain under the control of the Imperial authority any method of interfering with the suggestions and wishes of the Irish Parliament, and would allow that Parliament not only to nominate those who were to fill the offices of Cabinet rank, but to create the offices which were to carry Cabinet rank. That would be plain and distinct, and would wipe away a cause of friction. What was the cause of the ambiguity in the clause? It could not rest on the peculiarity of the Irish Privy Council; therefore, it must in some way be a reservation to the Imperial power. It, however, was manifestly impotent.

MR. J. MORLEY said, he had listened very carefully to the criticisms passed upon the wording of the sub-section, and to the suggestions which had been made—by the hon. Member for Essex amongst others—for more clearly setting forth what they had declared to be the intentions of the Government in the sub-section. So far as the chief argument of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Bury (Sir H. James) was concerned—namely, that there might be concurrent nominations under an Irish Act and by Her Majesty, it had been answered sufficiently by the hon. Member for North Kerry, who had pointed out that an Irish Act must first receive the assent of Her Majesty. He thought the argument was a good one, but he would not go into it further. There were three ways of fixing these offices: By Her Majesty acting on the advice of the Secretary of State; by the Irish Legislature; and, what would be the most probable course, by Her Majesty authorising the Lord Lieutenant, in the first instance, to do what was contemplated in the sub-section. The Government thought that this would be met by amending the clause as follows:—

“Comprising persons holding such offices under the Crown as Her Majesty, or, if so authorised, the Lord Lieutenant, may think fit, save as may be otherwise directed by Irish Act.”

When the proper time came, he would move that Amendment.

MR. BOUSFIELD (Hackney, N.) said, the course the Government had taken was, no doubt, strictly in accordance with the precedent that had been set by them, and which had been followed almost from day to day throughout the Sittings on the Bill, in their treatment of Amendments. An Amendment was moved. Then, first of all, the Prime Minister got up and jumped upon the Mover of it, treated him with contumely and scorn, dragged in a number of personalities that had nothing to do with the question, and said in the strongest terms that he objected to the Amendment, and would have nothing to do with it. Then after a time one Law

Mr. Macartney

Officer rose to bolster up the position, to the best of his ability—poor, unfortunate man, he hoped they pitied him! Another Law Officer followed, as a rule, to take part in the same uncongenial work—though that precedent had not been exactly followed to-day—and in the end the epidermis of the Government having been thoroughly penetrated by the arguments of the Opposition, they consented to do what from the first they refused to do. The hon. Member for St. Pancras had pointed out that there was an ambiguity in the words of the clause, and the Leader of the Opposition had referred to the drafting; but the Prime Minister and the hon. Member for North Kerry had brought in all sorts of Constitutional questions, and had treated the Amendment as raising the question of the Prerogative of the Crown, though that had nothing to do with the matter.

*SIR C. RUSSELL said, the hon. Member had been but a short time in the House. If he had been more familiar with their proceedings he probably would not have made the observations they had just heard from him. While he (Sir C. Russell) admitted that some of the Amendments had been directed to improving the drafting of the Bill, he did not admit that any one Amendment that had been accepted had in any material sense altered the main outline and character of the measure. The hon. Member did not appear to have read the Amendment.

MR. BOUSFIELD: Oh, yes, I have.

SIR C. RUSSELL: Then it was all the worse for the hon. Gentleman's memory. The hon. Member appeared to think that the Government had accepted the Amendment.

MR. BOUSFIELD rose. [Cries of "Order!"]

SIR C. RUSSELL refused to give way.

*MR. SPEAKER: The Attorney General is in possession of the House.

*SIR C. RUSSELL said that, so far from being an acceptance of the Amendment of the hon. Member for North St. Pancras, the Amendment of the Government was a negation of it. He did not think that when the Government showed a desire to meet the criticisms of the opponents of the Bill consistently with the maintenance of the spirit of the clauses they should be met with observations such as those of the hon. Member opposite.

MR. BOUSFIELD stated that he had risen to make a statement, though, on reflection, he feared that it would not come within the limits of a personal explanation.

*MR. GIBSON BOWLES (Lynn Regis) said, he had heard great pretensions put forward by old Members; but he had never before heard the pretension that old Members had a monopoly of irrelevancy and strong language. He thought that the Parliamentary apprentices might claim some freedom in discussion. When the example of travelling into personalities and irrelevancy was set by so old and eminent a Member as the Prime Minister some of the poor apprentices might be excused for wandering into the same paths; but he (Mr. Gibson Bowles) would not do so. He hoped to set a better and more courteous example than that set by the Prime Minister, the Attorney General, or even the Solicitor General. The Attorney General had truly said that the words proposed by the Irish Secretary were by no means an acceptance of the Amendment. They not only did not make the clause better than it was before in regard to the point to which the Amendment was addressed, but they made it worse. They first proposed that the Executive Committee of the Privy Council should be composed of such persons holding such offices as Her Majesty or the Lord Lieutenant might think fit; but Her Majesty and the Lord Lieutenant were thrown overboard, for they went on to say—

"Save as may be otherwise directed by Irish Act."

Under those words Her Majesty and the Lord Lieutenant would only be able to do that which they were permitted to do by Irish Act; therefore, the Amendment of the hon. Member for North St. Pancras was the more necessary. The insincerity of the clause was as palpable as its inconvenience. It professed to set up a Committee of the Privy Council, but nothing was more certain than that the Privy Council would have nothing to do with its nomination, and would commit nothing to it. It was no Committee of the Privy Council. They might call it a Cabal or a Committee of the Irish Legislature. That would be comprehensible and in keeping with its character, but it would never be a Committee of the Privy Council. The persons composing the Committee were not to be nominated by the Crown, but were to be the holders of certain offices. It was not the person, but the officer, who became ex officio a Councillor; and this difficulty would arise: If the Postmaster General were an ex officio Councillor the gentleman who held the office might be eminently qualified as a Postmaster General and not eminently qualified as a Privy Councillor. What were they going to do?—to nominate the man because he would make a good Postmaster General, or refrain from nominating him because he would make a bad Privy Councillor? This showed the inconvenience of the proposal. It was practically preventing the Sovereign from calling to her Council a person whom she might think to be a good Councillor. Further, it would impose a man upon her as Councillor because he held a certain specified office—and the specification of the office was not to rest with Her Majesty or with the Lord Lieutenant save in so far as the Irish Legislature might think fit. He was surprised to find the Government, instead of endeavouring to meet the views of the hon. Member for St. Pancras, offering suggestions which would have the effect of rendering the clause even worse than it was.

Mr. DARLING (Deptford) could not agree with the hon. Member who had just sat down as to the effect of the word "save" introduced by the Chief Secretary—no doubt on the advice of the Attorney General. He did not believe it would have the disastrous consequences the hon. and learned Gentleman anticipated. It reserved to the Crown the power to appoint the Ministers in the first instance, and it appeared to him that the Chief Secretary had been well advised in using the word "save." He did not think the hon. Member for North St. Pancras had anything to complain of, as the Chief Secretary's proposal would go a long way towards bringing about the result he desired to effect.

*Mr. SPEAKER: Does the hon. Gentleman propose to withdraw the Amendment?

Mr. T. H. BOLTON: No, Sir.

Mr. Gibson Bowles

Mr. COURTNEY (Cornwall, Bodmin) said, he should like to point out to the hon. Member that if the Amendment were not withdrawn the Government's Amendment could not be moved. He thought it would be worth while to try and get rid of the present obscurity; and the Amendment of the Government, although it was not very elegant, would have that effect.

Mr. J. CHAMBERLAIN (Birmingham, W.): I rise with some hesitation to support the view of my right hon. Friend, and to suggest to the hon. Member that he should follow his advice and withdraw the Amendment, in order that we may discuss the suggested Amendment of the Chief Secretary.

Mr. T. M. HEALY (Louth, N.) remarked that the Nationalist Members might refuse to allow the Amendment to be withdrawn.

Mr. SPEAKER: It can only be withdrawn with the consent of the House. Does the hon. Gentleman consent to withdraw?

Mr. T. H. BOLTON: In deference to the advice of the right hon. Gentleman, I ask leave to withdraw my Amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Mr. J. MORLEY: I now propose my Amendment.

Amendment proposed,

To leave out from "Crown" to "Act," in order to insert—"As Her Majesty, or, if so authorised, the Lord Lieutenant may think fit, save as may be otherwise directed by Irish Act."
—(Mr. J. Morley.)

Question proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Question."

Mr. W. E. GLADSTONE: I am anxious to say a pacifying word with reference to the speech I contributed to the Debate. When I heard the speech of my right hon. Friend the Member for Bury (Sir H. James) I at once saw I might have gone too far. After a little further consideration, I say frankly I think I was wrong in making a distinction between the hon. Gentleman (Mr. T. H. Bolton) and his constituents. If the hon. Gentleman has taken the precautions my right hon. Friend suggested he stands rightly enough with his constituents; but, if he has not, it is not a matter on which I am entitled to call him to account. I, therefore, think the remark I made in haste was ultra vires. I withdraw it, and I regret it.

MR. SEXTON (Kerry, N.) said, the Amendment unquestionably made clear what had always been the intention—namely, that when an Irish Act was passed it alone should be the directing power.

DR. MACGREGOR (Inverness-shire) said, there was such a division of opinion between the lawyers on the one side of the House and the other that he thought a new Member like himself might draw attention to it. He thought it was Sydney Smith who said—"When doctors differ who shall decide?" He supposed that by doctors were meant Doctors of Law. He did not imagine that the world had ever before seen such a division of opinion among lawyers as had been apparent on this Bill. He used to think it strange that it was possible to drive a coach and horses through an Act of Parliament. He now saw a reason for it—there were too many lawyers in the House.

MR. SPEAKER: The remarks of the hon. Gentleman are not very pertinent to the Amendment before the House.

DR. MACGREGOR said, he was coming to the Amendment; but he thought that, on Report, one might make general remarks.

MR. SPEAKER: The hon. Gentleman is mistaken. There is a specific Amendment now before the House. The hon. Member's remarks must be confined to that Amendment.

DR. MACGREGOR: Then I beg to be excused.

Question put, and negatived.

Question, "That those words be there inserted," put, and agreed to.

*VISCOUNT CRANBORNE (Rochester) rose to move the following Amendment:—

Page 3, line 38, after "Act," insert, "(3) The Lord Lieutenant shall not do or omit to do any act upon the advice of the Executive Committee, or until he has received Her Majesty's instructions thereupon—

(a) in respect of any of the matters upon which the Irish Legislature are disabled from legislating under Section 3 of this Act; nor

(b) Whereby any person or corporation would be injuriously affected in respect of any of the matters in regard to which they are protected as against legislation by the Irish Legislature under Section 4 of this Act;

and it shall be unlawful for any Executive officer in Ireland, except by the direction of the Lord Lieutenant acting under Her Majesty's instructions as aforesaid, to do or omit to do any such act."

He said he did not think any Member of the House had any doubt that the matters which were excluded from the cognisance of the Irish Legislature ought likewise to be excluded from the Irish Executive. Much difficulty, however, arose from the fact that the Lord Lieutenant had two or three different capacities under the Bill, and the Amendment was an attempt to distinguish between the Imperial capacity and the local capacity of the Lord Lieutenant. There was no doubt that the Irish Executive ought to be debarred from dealing with the excepted subjects. The right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Duchy (Mr. Bryce) appeared to be under the impression that the Irish Executive must either act in virtue of an Irish law, or in virtue of no law at all. The right hon. Gentleman was, therefore, of opinion that it was impossible for the Irish Executive to deal with the excepted subjects.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE DUCHY OF LANCASTER (Mr. BRYCE, Aberdeen, S.): I do not assent to that description of my views.

*VISCOUNT CRANBORNE said, the statement made by the right hon. Gentleman in a former Debate was—

"The Irish Executive could not have protection in an Irish Act for violating the rights and liberties safeguarded by those clauses. Such an Act would be ipso facto void, and if without such an Act they took action they would violate the law."

That having been the right hon. Gentleman's language, he did not think he had misquoted him, and he thought the right hon. Gentleman was entirely wrong in his view. The law did not take account of the discretion of the Irish Executive. Of course, if that Executive broke the law it might be called to account; but he submitted that it was in the matter of the discretion of the Executive that the difficulty would arise. Take, for example, Sub-section 2 of Clause 3. That sub-section made it impossible for the Irish Legislature to deal with the conduct of Her Majesty's subjects in respect of the powers granted to Her Majesty for preventing war. A case might arise similar to that of the Alabama. War might break out between France and Italy with reference to the temporal power of the Pope. A privateer might be fitted out in an Irish port for the purpose of assisting France against the Italian Government. He submitted that unless the Lord Lieutenant exercised a great deal of care and put the law into operation, Great Britain might be made responsible for his inaction to the tune of £3,000,000 sterling at a subsequent period of our history. He wanted to make it clear in the Bill that the Irish Executive must not give advice to the Lord Lieutenant, and that the Lord Lieutenant could not take any advice from that Executive on such a subject; but that he must consult the Imperial Government on the matter. Extradition was also included among the excepted subjects. No doubt, the Law of Extradition was, at the present moment, put in force by the Secretary of State; but the precautions taken by the police in order to arrest a man on extradition really depended upon the way in which the Executive did their duty in Ireland. In a case of extradition the sympathy of the Irish people might be enlisted, and the Irish Executive might advise the Lord Lieutenant not to exercise his authority with sufficient care. The result might be that the criminal might escape, and the Imperial Government would be held responsible. The same argument applied to a case of treason, and to a case of armed and drilled forces. Unless the Lord Lieutenant put the law in force there would be no advantage whatever in excluding those subjects from the purview of the Irish Legislature. With reference to Clause 4, he thought it had been assumed by Members of the Government that any oppressive action taken under an Act of the Irish Legislature would render that Act invalid. It would be in the power of the Irish Legislature to forbid Party processions in Ireland, and the Legislature might go to the length of interfering with free speech in Ireland. He ventured to assert that if the Irish Executive liked it could oppress the minority in Ireland to a most tremendous extent, and could put an end to free speech altogether, so far as that minority was concerned. That was the political aspect of the question; he now came to the individual side of it. Not long since the Chief Secretary held that he had a right to refuse police assistance to the Sheriff. The Courts of Justice, however, held a different view, and the Chief Secretary in consequence proposed to make a little change in the law in order to put himself in the right. What the right hon. Gentleman proposed to do could undoubtedly be done by an Irish Legislature; and there was nothing in Clause 4 to prevent the Lord Lieutenant, in virtue of such a change in the law, from limiting or even refusing police protection altogether in these cases. An Act of that nature would be perfectly legal as this Bill stood; but it might be made to work the greatest hardship in many cases. The most grievous wrong might be inflicted on owners of property, and on persons desirous of performing their legal obligations. He would like to cite some cases in which oppression might take place. Let them take a case in which disputes had occurred in Ireland in regard to the payment of rents, and relative to the administration of the Land Laws. It was easy to imagine what might take place under an Irish Executive. An unpopular or unsympathetic landlord might wish to enforce payment of his rents on what might be called a hard plan. There were such landlords in England and Scotland as well as in Ireland. Public opinion in Ireland would be arrayed against him; pressure would be brought to bear upon him to abstain from doing that which he was legally entitled to do; pressure would also be applied to the tenants to prevent them meeting their legal obligations; public meetings would be held to denounce the landlord, and eventually the Government itself would be approached with a view to inducing it not to allow this oppressive man to evict his tenants for non-payment of their rents, and the Irish Members would be reminded of all they had said on this subject in bye-gone days. In the end, police assistance would be refused, and the Executive would strain every nerve to use their discretionary powers in order to beat down the resistance of the landlord and to assist his tenants in ignoring their legal obligations. The Irish Executive would approach the Lord Lieutenant ; and, if he acted on their advice, the tenants would have to submit to intimidation, and the landlord would be deprived of his rights. But if the Lord Lieutenant had to act upon the responsibility of an English Ministry this House would have that control over the Government of the day which the House knew so well how to exercise, and they would be able to prevent popular feeling in Ireland from committing a grievous wrong on those desirous to fulfil their legal obligations or to exact their legal rights. There was one other branch of the subject upon which he desired to address the House. Under the existing law, without any change whatever, the Executive possessed enormous powers of oppression. How, he would ask, were the powers of the Court of Exchequer in criminal matters to be carried out in defiance of the declared wishes of the Irish Executive? The Executive Government of the day had only to enter a nolle prosequi in order to put an end to a prosecution ; in a case in which they might be in reality the defendants they would be able to bring to a summary end the whole procedure. The Exchequer Judges, or any other Court in Ireland, might commit a man to prison for default in payment of a fine, or for disobedience to their orders ; but the Executive would be able forthwith to release the offender. Therefore, if the exercise of the prerogative of mercy was to be left to the Lord Lieutenant, acting on the advice of the Irish Executive, it would be useless to send a man to prison for contumacy, as he might be at once released. Surely this was a matter in which the Lord Lieutenant should be compelled to act on the responsibility of Imperial Ministers. He did not wish to destroy the discretion of the Lord Lieutenant, but he did desire to make him responsible to this House. It was said that Parliament was omnipotent, and that it could override any legislation passed by the Imperial Parliament. That, no doubt, was technically accurate ; but, even under these circumstances, the Government had felt it necessary to put into the Bill most careful provisions, limiting the legislative power of the Irish Parliament. If it was the intention of the Government that the Lord Lieutenant should act on the responsibility of the Imperial Government, the drafting of their Bill did not show it ; and as this Bill, if it ever became law, would be, as it were, a Treaty between the two nations, and would be referred to whenever any difference of opinion arose between them, he desired that the matters which he had referred to should be made clear upon the face of the Bill itself. He ventured to say that the protection of direct responsibility to the Imperial Government was in this matter necessary in the highest degree, and that right hon. Gentlemen opposite, in view of all their professions, were not justified in refusing to accept his proposal, the terms of which had been purposely made as wide as possible. He begged to move the Amendment.

Amendment proposed,

In page 3, line 38, after the word "Act," to insert the words—" (3) The Lord Lieutenant shall not do or omit to do any act upon the advice of the Executive Committee, or otherwise than as representing Her Majesty—

- (a) In respect of any of the matters upon which the Irish Legislature are disabled from legislating under section three of this Act ; nor
- (b) Whereby any person or corporation would be injuriously affected in respect of any of the matters in regard to which they are protected as against legislation by the Irish Legislature under section four of this Act ;
